The prosecutor is trying to prevent Libby's attorneys from making the argument that Libby had no reason to lie because, if he had leaked classified information, prosecutors would have charged him with it.

Similarly, Libby's attorneys said it would be unfair for prosecutors to discuss Miller's refusal to testify or the lengthy court fight involving other reporters. Miller cooperated with investigators after serving 85 days in jail.

"The introduction of these issues would undoubtedly cause jurors to wonder whether Ms. Miller went to jail in an effort to shield Mr. Libby from liability, and whether Mr. Libby is to blame for her incarceration," defense attorneys wrote.

If such testimony is allowed at trial, defense attorneys said they might have to call Fitzgerald as a witness to discuss his role in getting Miller and others to testify.

Plame believes her identity was leaked as retribution for her husband's criticism of the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq. Defense attorneys also asked a federal judge to block discussions about whether Plame's CIA status was classified or whether releasing that information jeopardized her safety or national security.

Judge Is Asked To Block Libby Defense From Discussing Lack Of Stronger Charges (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 31, 2006

Prosecutors are asking a federal judge to preclude lawyers for a former White House aide facing trial for lying and obstruction of justice, I. Lewis Libby, from telling jurors that the government failed to charge Mr. Libby or anyone else in connection with the event that triggered the probe, the disclosure of the identity of a veteran CIA officer in 2003.

Meanwhile, defense attorneys are seeking to prevent jurors from learning about any damage caused by the leak about the CIA operative, Valerie Plame. The defense also wants to keep the jury in the dark about the 85-day incarceration of a New York Times reporter, Judith Miller, after she was cited for contempt for refusing to testify about her contacts with Mr. Libby, who was then chief of staff to Vice President Cheney.

The legal maneuvering came as the two sides faced a deadline yesterday to file motions aimed at restricting evidence or arguments to be presented at Mr. Libby's trial, which is set for January.

The special prosecutor assigned to the inquiry, Patrick Fitzgerald, asked Judge Reggie Walton to preclude defense attorneys from discussing during the trial why Mr. Libby was not charged with deliberately outing Ms. Plame. Mr. Fitzgerald also asked to exclude any evidence about why others were not charged in the case.

"The fact that neither Libby nor anyone else has been charged with a crime for the disclosure of classified information is irrelevant to whether Libby committed the crimes charged in the indictment," Mr. Fitzgerald argued. He wrote that discussion of the government's charging decisions could lead to "unfair prejudice" and "jury nullification."

"The jury might impute to the government certain beliefs based on the decisions not to charge certain crimes and improperly draw inferences regarding the government's view of the conduct, such as the conclusion that the government believes the defendant's behavior in disclosing information was proper," Mr. Fitzgerald said.

The Justice Department selected Mr. Fitzgerald, the top federal prosecutor in Chicago, to examine whether any laws were broken in the disclosure of Ms. Plame's identity in a newspaper column by Robert Novak in 2003. Initial speculation suggested that White House officials engineered the leak because Ms. Plame's husband, Joseph Wilson, had criticized President Bush for claiming that Iraq sought nuclear materials in Africa.

It emerged recently that the initial leak to Mr. Novak came from the deputy secretary of state at the time, Richard Armitage, though other reporters have testified that they learned of or confirmed Ms. Plame's CIA employment from Mr. Libby and another White House aide, Karl Rove.

No one has been charged criminally in connection with the leak itself, though Ms. Plame has brought a civil suit against various officials.

Mr. Libby resigned after being indicted last year on charges that he lied about his contacts with reporters and about his knowledge that Ms. Plame's status was classified. He has pleaded not guilty.

Defense lawyers asked Judge Walton to block all testimony about the legal maelstrom that surrounded the government's efforts to get testimony from reporters believed to have learned of Ms. Plame's identity from officials in the government.

The defense filing revisits a dispute about how clearly Mr. Libby informed Ms. Miller, who later left the Times, that he wanted her to testify about their discussions. Mr. Libby's attorneys have insisted that they left no doubt about the White House aide's position. Ms. Miller and one of her lawyers, Floyd Abrams, have said they picked up signals that Mr. Libby's waiver was less than voluntary. The reporter spent nearly three months in jail in Virginia before the waiver was clarified and she testified that she was told about Ms. Plame by Mr. Libby.

Defense lawyers said the details might lead the jury to think, unfairly, that Mr. Libby engineered a cover-up. "The introduction of these issues would undoubtedly cause jurors to wonder whether Ms. Miller went to jail in an effort to shield Mr. Libby from liability, and whether Mr. Libby is to blame for her incarceration," the defense team wrote.

Mr. Libby's attorneys are also seeking to exclude from the trial any talk that Ms. Plame's employment at the CIA was classified or covert. Such a ruling would leave jurors with little or no understanding of why Mr. Fitzgerald's investigation began. Instead, Mr. Libby's trial would become a sterile, seemingly-random discussion of inconsistent recollections between a former White House official and several reporters about conversations four years earlier.

However, the defense argued that such a constrained trial is the necessary result of the government's refusal to hand over documents detailing the secrecy surrounding Ms. Plame's employment. "It would be manifestly unfair to allow the government to put into issue a matter that Mr. Libby has been denied any real opportunity to investigate and contest," the defense lawyers wrote.

Mr. Libby's legal team also wants to block Mr. Fitzgerald from suggesting that Mr. Libby did anything wrong when he discussed contents of a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq with journalists, including Ms. Miller. Mr. Libby has claimed that he was told by Vice President Cheney that Mr. Bush authorized the release of key findings in the report, which was highly-classified until that point.

One of yesterday's defense filings discloses that two other White House employees were privy to at least part of another conversation where Mr. Libby allegedly discussed Ms. Plame's CIA post with a reporter. The defense said Mr. Cheney's spokesman, Catherine Martin, and Mr. Libby's assistant, Jennifer Mayfield, were present when Mr. Libby spoke by phone with Matthew Cooper of Time magazine.

However, it's unclear whether Ms. Martin and Ms. Mayfield would have understood the import of Mr. Libby's alleged comment about the CIA operative. Mr. Cooper has said that when he said he'd been told Ms. Plame worked at CIA, Mr. Libby replied something to the effect of, "Yeah, I've heard that, too."

Mr. Cooper got his initial tip about Ms. Plame from President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove. Mr. Rove was investigated intensely by Mr. Fitzgerald, who ultimately decided not to seek charges.

Democrats have urged Mr. Bush to fire Mr. Rove or strip him of his security clearance. The White House has not responded to the suggestion.

Judge Walton has said he wants all written arguments on the pre-trial motions wrapped up by Nov. 17 because he is scheduled to leave for Jamaica the next day. "It is particularly important for the expeditious resolution of these motions that Judge Walton have something to work on while relaxing on the beach," he wrote in an order earlier this month.

Masilotti Grand Jury Highlights Lobbyist's Role (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), November 1, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — William Boose, one of Palm Beach County's most influential lobbyists, is a central figure in the biggest corruption scandal to rock county government in nearly a century.

A federal grand jury that indicted former County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti in a land-deal conspiracy also is looking at Boose.

In the criminal information filed against Masilotti, the grand jury found Boose helped Masilotti hide his interest in a government land deal in Martin County. When FBI agents started asking questions, Boose falsified legal bills to disguise the fact that he didn't charge Masilotti full price for legal services, according to the court record. He worked on Masilotti's land deal while lobbying the county commission for other developer clients. His business relationship with the commissioner never was disclosed, the grand jury reported.

No criminal charges against Boose, 62, have been made public, but he has hired attorney Jack Goldberger - a legal powerhouse who has a reputation for working with authorities to negotiate plea deals for high-profile clients. Goldberger and his client aren't talking.

Boose's friends are worried. "I talked to him about 10 days ago, roughly when he realized something major was up," said George Elmore, a long-time friend and lobbying client. "Be kind to him."

Like scores of major landowners in the county, Elmore, the multimillionaire founder of Delray Beach-based Hardrives construction, credits Boose with getting government agencies to approve large, problem-plagued projects that would have flummoxed other attorneys.

Masilotti reached out to Boose in 2002 as the commissioner plotted a scheme to profit from a Martin County land purchase by the South Florida Water Management District, a well-publicized acquisition to help clean up the Loxahatchee River. Masilotti wanted to secretly own land that the district would buy. Boose provided the vehicle: a secret land trust, prosecutors alleged.

The land deal hit a snag when the district required disclosure of who was behind the land trust. Boose, according to the grand jury, helped engineer a land swap that would hide Masilotti's $1.3 million profit.

Boose has weathered adversity before.

In the 1980s, Boose was a tanned, fit and good-looking farm boy who had a wildly successful law practice, a two-story Colonial-style house along the Intracoastal Waterway in West Palm Beach and a reputation as the man high-rollers should see if they wanted to develop property in Palm Beach County.

Then came the late-'80s real-estate crash.

"He would have been a lot better off to file for bankruptcy," Elmore recalled. "But he wouldn't because it was against his principles."

Then Elmore added with a rueful laugh, "He's concerned about his image."

The image Boose carefully cultivated, the one that kept his financial problems hidden, allowed him to weather a financial storm that might have sunk lesser men.

It's a reputation Boose developed early in his multifaceted career, which took him from a $20,000 job as the county's first planning director to the height of his profession. After graduating from law school at the University of Florida, he got real-estate and general contractor's licenses and eventually became a developer himself.

Boose helped found the company that became Touchstone-Webb Realty. He was in a partnership that developed the Northbridge Centre, the black high-rise in downtown West Palm Beach known as the Darth Vader building. He was one of the owners of the Amtrak station on Tamarind Avenue before selling it to the city of West Palm Beach for $2.5 million. He has handled scores of large-scale rezoning requests.

"He's a workaholic," said County Commissioner Karen Marcus, who has known Boose since she was a commission aide.

Her first memory of him was when she was 19 and he and another young lawyer tried to pick up her and a friend as they were leaving the courthouse. Neither she nor her friend became romantically involved with either of the attorneys, but she and Boose became fast friends.

His friendship with commissioners has been both his strength and a sore point among those who question whether it made him uniquely qualified to persuade the commission to embrace unchecked development.

"He had an inordinate amount of influence with them because he knew them," said Dorothy Wilken, a former county commissioner and clerk of courts.

After serving as the county's first director of planning, zoning and building, he opened a private land-use law practice and began lobbying the commission. Based in part on his actions, Wilken unsuccessfully pushed for a law to restrict the ability of former county staffers to lobby the commission.

It was a time when county government was ruled by a group of young men and women dubbed the Kiddie Car Gang. Though some, such as current Airports Director Bruce Pelly and Assistant County Administrator Vince Bonvento, made careers in county offices, many turned up on the other side of the podium as lobbyists.

Boose's change of uniform was noteworthy because he had authored the county first comprehensive land-use plan, a document that won awards and rave reviews from managed-growth advocates.

"The ironic part is after assisting the county commission in adopting an award-winning land-use plan in the 1970s, he went to the other side and began to dismantle it," Wilken said. "He knew where all the loopholes were."

Former Commissioner Dennis Koehler, who was a member of the Kiddie Car Gang, said Wilken's criticism is unfounded.

In many respects, Boose was ahead of his time, he said. Long before impact fees were required of developers, Boose would force clients to donate land for parks or schools or pay for multimillion-dollar road projects to get development approval.

And, Koehler said, Boose wouldn't let his clients forget promises. "I don't think he created any loopholes," Koehler said. "He played the game straight up. I would credit Bill with influencing those kind of development contributions, and I would think that's a fine legacy."

And, those who knew him said, his rise wasn't happenstance. He set five-year plans for himself. A native of Nebraska, he went to law school in Florida because he knew it was a high-growth state. He planned his moves carefully and then worked hard to achieve his goals.

He once described himself this way: "I consider myself a B-skill player who tries to participate at an A level through intensive preparation."

The divorced father of an adult daughter, he lives with a longtime girlfriend in Palm Beach Gardens.

"He's gone through it all," Elmore said. "He's had trials and tribulations in his personal life. He takes on challenges and finds a way to solve them. He perseveres."

Fraud Charges Against 35 In Sting (PHI)

By Vernon Clark

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 1, 2006

A Center City lawyer and 34 other people were charged with fraud yesterday in an elaborate sting operation that focused on personal injury claims from supposed vehicular accidents, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced.

U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said his office and the FBI set up a bogus chiropractic clinic, known as Injury Associates, on Roosevelt Boulevard in Northeast Philadelphia as the center of the sting, which was conducted over about three years.

Officials said those charged were divided into three groups: the lawyer, Jordan B. Luber, who obtained a legal settlement on behalf of two FBI agents posing as injured patients from a vehicular accident; 31 "patients" who sought financial recovery based on false medical diagnoses and nonexistent medical treatment for supposed injuries from vehicle accidents; and "runners" who received referral fees from Injury Associates for recruiting "patients" to the clinic while knowing the clinic was a fraudulent operation.

In the scheme, the runners got kickbacks, and the patients received paperwork that could be used to file injury claims in hopes of receiving a settlement.

Meehan said the fraud caused harm to insurance companies and their customers.

"This goes back to the ratepayers, each and every one of us who pay insurance premiums," Meehan said.

Officials said the fraudulent personal injury actions pursued by the defendants yielded more than $1.5 million in settlement demands and more than $350,000 in insurance company payments. They provided no breakdown of individual payments.

The clinic offered no medical treatments, and the patients were told up front that they were going to be part of a fraud, officials said.

Meehan said the "patients" were given ample opportunity to back out of the fraud. "Instead, they went forward," he said.

"It was simply a paper-processing mill," Meehan said of Injury Associates.

He said the paperwork was primarily false treatment records and false medical diagnoses.

The undercover agents explained to the "patients" that Injury Associates' goal was to help them support their personal injury claims by preparing paperwork to make it appear as if they were receiving treatment even though they were not, officials said.

The clinic allowed people who were in real or staged car accidents a chance to seek compensation for personal injuries based on fake or exaggerated claims, officials said.

The defendants face maximum sentences from 60 to 210 years in prison, officials said.

35 Facing Charges In Insurance Claim Scam (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 1, 2006

Injury Associates was not just another chiropractic clinic. In fact, it wasn't a chiropractic clinic at all.

It was part of an elaborate FBI sting carried out from 2003 to June 2006 that targeted individuals participating in phony personal-injury claims against auto insurers arising out of supposed car accidents.

A federal grand jury yesterday charged 35 individuals with mail and health-care fraud in the scheme.

Among those charged was Philadelphia lawyer Jordan B. Luber, 40, of Lafayette Hill, a partner in the firm of Luber & Cataldi, which specializes in personal-injury cases, including those received from automobile accidents.

The feds say Luber sought and obtained legal settlement on behalf of two FBI undercover agents posing as patients injured in a car accident.

Prosecutors allege Luber knew that their injuries were either fabricated or exaggerated and that they had received no medical treatment. He then allegedly negotiated a $15,000 settlement with St. Paul Travelers insurance company.

Luber allegedly pocketed a $6,000 fee and split the rest of the proceeds with the two agents. The feds want him to forfeit the money.

Luber was arraigned yesterday before U.S. Magistrate Judge David R. Strawbridge and pleaded not guilty. He was released on $100,000 bail secured by his property in Lafayette Hill.

The grand jury also charged 31 people who tried to recover claims and three "runners" who received referral fees for recruiting patients to the clinic.

Most of those charged were arraigned yesterday and pleaded not guilty.

"It was explained to these defendants up front that they were going to be part of a fraud," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said yesterday. "They were given a chance to bail out and they chose to keep going."

The fake clinic offered people who claimed to have been in real or staged automobile accidents an opportunity to pursue fraudulent personal-injury claims based upon fake or exaggerated injuries.

The defendants should have been wary of the sting from the get-go. Injury Associates made clear to anyone who wanted to use their facilities that it did not provide any medical treatment or therapy but existed solely to create paperwork to support the bogus injury claims.

The paperwork consisted of false medical records and reports.

Each individual sting operation began with a meeting between patients and undercover agents. In some cases, the runner who referred the patients also attended.

Injury Associates appeared to be a legitimate clinic, operating at a storefront on Roosevelt Boulevard near Rhawn Street in Northeast Philadelphia.

Arriving patients were greeted by a receptionist and then were taken into an inner office for an initial consultation.

FBI agents then explained to potential patients how the scam worked. The meetings were both audio- and videotaped.

If a patient wanted to proceed, agents would assign injuries to the patient that would maximize the value of the patient's claim.

Agents then told the patients to report to the clinic at least once a week to sign in for the entire work week so it would appear they received treatment on numerous days each week.

Patients also were told that agents would use the sign-in sheets to describe the fake injuries which they would later submit to the patient's attorney to bolster the patient's claim.

The feds said the sting resulted in more than $1.5 million in settlement demands and $350,000 in actual insurance payments on the bogus claims.

The money was held in an escrow account maintained by the feds and later was returned to insurers.

Meehan said yesterday that the investigation is ongoing.

According to the Insurance Information Institute, bogus property and casualty claims cost insurers about $30 billion a year, a cost that is passed on to consumers in the form of higher rates.

35 Charged In Philly Insurance Fraud Sting (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Nearly three dozen people face fraud charges after federal authorities set up a phony chiropractic clinic as part of a sting operation that focused on personal-injury claims from supposed automobile accidents, authorities said Tuesday.

A lawyer, Jordan B. Luber, obtained a legal settlement on behalf of two FBI agents posing as injured patients from a traffic accident, according to federal authorities.

The 35 people charged also include 31 who sought payments based on false diagnoses and nonexistent treatment, and others who got fees from the clinic for bringing in phony patients, authorities said.

Patients at the Northeast Philadelphia clinic, called Injury Associates, were told up front that they were going to be part of a fraud, authorities said.

The scheme resulted in more than $1.5 million in settlement demands, and over $350,000 in insurance company payments on fraudulent claims, according to prosecutors.

"This kind of fraud affects the bottom line for all of us," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said in a statement. "We see higher insurance rates because some choose to exploit the system."

Messages left after business hours Tuesday at Luber's office and at a number provided to reach him after hours were not immediately returned.

Safety Margin For Tunnel Was Smaller Than Most, US Says (BOS)

By Sean P. Murphy And Scott Allen, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 1, 2006

Preliminary report issued

The Big Dig tunnel ceiling that collapsed in July was designed with a smaller margin of safety than other tunnel ceilings around the country, leaving nothing to prevent heavy concrete slabs from falling on a passing car when ceiling bolts fell out, according to a preliminary report by federal investigators obtained by the Globe.

The Interstate 90 connector's drop ceiling was held up by steel hangers, which were suspended from bolts that had been glued into the tunnel roof. But there were no beams attaching the ceiling to the walls, and the ceiling was constructed with half as many ceiling bolts as in the original design. "No redundancy was built into the ceiling in the event the hangers failed," the National Transportation Safety Board states in its report. "The NTSB has researched other tunnels throughout the country and has found that significant redundancy is built into the ceiling design" so that the ceilings would not collapse when bolts fall out.

The report does not reach conclusions about the cause of the ceiling collapse, because the investigation is not finished. But it shows reveals that the federal agency is looking into the adequacy of tests done to ensure the strength of the ceiling bolts and says notes that an employee of the testing contractor told investigators that testing procedures differed from what was required by the contruction contract.

The accident, which killed Milena Del Valle as she rode in a car to Logan International Airport with her husband late on July 10, already has triggered federal and state criminal investigations, a wrongful death lawsuit filed by Del Valle's family, and the resignation of the chief of the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority. But the investigation by the NTSB will carry enormous weight in assessing what went wrong and who should be punished, because of the agency's expertise in reconstructing disasters.

The preliminary report, sent to key federal officials yesterday, describes paints a picture of significant lapses by on the part of both the state government and private companies involved in the $14.6 billion Big Dig project. From the tunnel's original design in the mid-1990s to the moment of the accident, the report suggests that people involved in the project made decisions or mistakes that increased the risk of disaster, the report suggests.

For instance, the report said, officials from Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff, the joint venture overseeing the Big Dig, decided to use epoxy bolts to suspend the ceiling from the tunnel's roof, even after they had switched from a lightweight material used for the ceiling in the adjacent Ted Williams Tunnel to much heavier concrete ceiling panels to save money. Epoxy bolts, which are held in place by a kind of super glue, are rarely used to suspend such heavy objects over people's heads, according to Globe interviews with engineers who specialize in the low-cost, but somewhat delicate bolts.

Then in 1997, the NTSB found, Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff managers in 1997 directed the company designing the ceiling to follow a design that "provides little or no redundancy" to prevent a ceiling collapse if more than one hanger, each held up by two bolts, comes loose. NTSB researchers found that other US tunnels around the United States commonly feature side supports or other methods that back up the primary suspension system. if ceiling bolts come out.

By contrast, the connector tunnel had no side supports, and Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff persuaded the designers at Gannett Fleming to cut in half the overall number of ceiling bolts holding up the connector ceiling, according to a 1998 memo previously reported disclosed by the Globe. After the accident, state investigators found that ceiling panels in the connector tunnel could collapse if as few as four ceiling bolts fail.

The NTSB report also suggests that flaws in construction of the ceiling, carried out by Modern Continental Construction Co., may have made the design more hazardous. While offering few details, the report said FBI and State Police interviews with Modern Continental workers point to "potential problems in the procedures used during installation." In addition, epoxy samples taken from parts of the tunnel away from the accident site showed "dark brown discoloration," a sign that the epoxy was mixed improperly, diminishing weakening its strength.

The NTSB also said safety tests carried out to prove the ceiling bolts were securely in place may have damaged some bolts. An inspector from the bolt-testing company, ConAm Testing, told NTSB investigators that some bolts were tested while the concrete ceiling panels hung from them, which required workers to lift the weight off the bolt being tested - and shift it onto nearby bolts. That extra weight could have weakened weaken the strength of the bolts not undergoing the test, say engineers not connected to the Big Dig or the investigation.

The NTSB investigators also are looking at whether the bolt safety tests were rigorous enough. The Globe has reported that during construction in 1999, at least five bolts came loose soon after the connector ceiling was suspended from them, even though they had passed earlier safety tests. At the time, Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff officials required Modern Continental to retest bolts in parts of the connector using stricter safety standards, but bolts in the eastbound lane, where the ceiling caved in, were not retested.

Federal investigators have found no evidence that the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority ever rechecked the ceiling bolts after the connector opened to the public in 2003, to make sure they were not slipping out, the report said. If they had, the report finds, they would have seen some bolts showing "extreme displacement." under the stress of holding up the ceiling. Some of the 5Æ-inch-long bolts had come more than an inch out of their holes, the report said.

A lot of work remains to determine what happened and who is responsible. NTSB officials plan to interview more workers who built the ceiling, and lab analysts are testing the epoxy and how it was installed.

U.S. Supreme Court Considers Death Row Case In Florida (FINDLAW/AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A death row inmate's attorney argued Tuesday that the U.S. Supreme Court should allow the prisoner's appeal to continue despite a federal court ruling that he had missed a deadline for pursuing the case.

The lawyer for Gary Lawrence said Florida courts were to blame for the tardy appeal, not the inmate.

Attorney Mary Bonner told the justices that Lawrence did not receive a court-appointed counsel to handle his appeal for 10 months, wiping out most of the time that he had under federal law to seek review of his death sentence.

The issue involves the interpretation of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, which places limits on the prolonged appeals process in capital punishment cases. It imposes a one-year deadline for petitioning federal courts in death cases after final judgments in state courts.

Under questioning by Chief Justice John Roberts, Bonner agreed with Roberts that her interpretation of the law would involve a process lasting up to six months.

"This is not a frolic" that would last years, Bonner told the court.

The state of Florida said Lawrence had just one day remaining to petition the federal courts after the Florida Supreme Court ended the case on Nov. 18, 2002. The lawyer for the convicted killer says the deadline under the law did not expire until the U.S. Supreme Court refused to consider the case several months later.

Lawrence's appeal of his conviction came up in the Florida courts at a time when the state was reforming its post-conviction review process. It took the state three attempts and 10 months to find a lawyer to represent Lawrence.

Lawrence was convicted of beating his wife's lover to death with a pipe and baseball bat, then setting the body on fire 12 years ago.

Death Penalty In Limbo For Robinson (TOPCAPJ)

By Steve Fry, The Capital-Journal

Topeka (KS) Capitol-Journal, November 1, 2006

Federal prosecutors have one month to make decision

Frank Jerome "Chicago" Robinson, a Topekan charged with starting a fire that killed Marvina Washington last summer, will have another month before learning whether he will face possible imposition of the death penalty.

A federal district judge late last week gave federal prosecutors until Nov. 30 to decide whether to seek the federal death penalty against Robinson if he is convicted of a federal count of arson.

If Robinson is convicted, the maximum penalties for arson resulting in a death are life in prison or under certain circumstances, the death penalty, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office has said.

Marvina Washington, 53, was killed during a fire that destroyed the apartment house she lived in at 427 S.W. Tyler. After the fire was extinguished on Aug. 8, Washington's body was recovered from her second-floor apartment.

U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson said the delay wouldn't prejudice Frank Robinson and gave prosecutors until the close of business on Nov. 30 to file notice of the prosecution's intent to seek the death penalty. Before the judge's ruling, the deadline to file the notice had been Oct. 30.

In the prosecution request for more time, U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren and assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Mattivi didn't anticipate a decision would be made by federal prosecutors by the Oct. 30 deadline.

"As the court is undoubtedly aware, the process within the Department of Justice for determining whether or not to seek the death penalty in a particular case is both lengthy and cumbersome," the prosecution motion for more time said.

Any decision to seek the death penalty must be approved by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The judge granted the postponement motion on Oct. 26. The judge will hear the motion on Dec. 18, and Frank Robinson is to be tried starting Feb. 6.

One of two tenants who jumped from a second-story window, Sheila Ansley, 43, suffered serious injuries, an affidavit said. Washington's family identified Ansley as Washington's caretaker. Ansley had told an investigator that two other people, a blind woman and a man, remained in the building, but only Washington's body was found in the debris.

A Molotov cocktail was used to set fire to the four-unit apartment house, according to court records. The fire was started in a stairwell at the front entrance of the two-story apartment house at 427 S.W. Tyler, according to an investigator's affidavit filed in federal court. The stairway led to the apartment where Washington lived.

A federal magistrate judge denied setting bond for Frank Robinson, saying that Robinson would be a serious risk to flee if released and was a danger to the community.

Investigators probing the cause of the fire and arresting Robinson were from the Topeka Police Department, Topeka Fire Department, the Kansas Fire Marshal's Office and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Before it burned, the apartment house was the site of drug sales, fights, prostitution and drug use, two neighbors said. The neighbors said they witnessed people smoking crack cocaine on the porch, the brandishing of guns and knives by residents, and fights and arguing, all at 427 S.W. Tyler.

Since July 14, two men have been shot to death and a third was seriously wounded, all within a block of the fire.

Is A Trial Unfair If Accused Can't Confront Accuser? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON

In 1988, Marvin Bockting was accused of sexually abusing his 6-year-old stepdaughter. The little girl told her mother and a police detective about the alleged abuse, but she became too upset to testify at Mr. Bockting's trial in Nevada.

Instead, the girl's mother and the detective testified about what she had told them of the alleged sexual assault. Bockting was convicted and sentenced to life in prison.

Now, 18 years later, Bockting is seeking to overturn his conviction based on a 2004 US Supreme Court decision in a case called Crawford v. Washington. In that case, the Supreme Court strongly reaffirmed the constitutional right to confront one's accusers in court. At the same time, the court struck down a rule that had allowed the introduction at trial of testimonial statements made by a potential witness prior to the trial.

Bockting says his trial was unfair because his jury was never allowed to gauge the veracity of his stepdaughter's accusations through the crucible of cross-examination in open court.

Wednesday, the Supreme Court takes up Bockting's case to decide whether the high court's 2004 ruling should be applied retroactively to his 1988 child-abuse trial.

If it does apply retroactively, the case would also open the courthouse doors potentially for thousands of other individuals convicted under similar circumstances, where a key piece of testimonial evidence was allowed into the trial without the constitutional safeguard of cross-examination.

Since the Crawford decision was announced, it has been cited in roughly 20 cases each week seeking reversal of a conviction, according to a friend-of-the-court brief filed by 38 state attorneys general.

"The sheer volume of judicial citations to Crawford attests to the magnitude of the potential fallout if its holding applies retroactively," the brief says. "As of July 7, 2006, nearly 1,900 reported court decisions had cited Crawford."

A decision applying the ruling retroactively could trigger not only direct appeals in criminal cases, but also subsequent appeals under the federal habeas corpus statute. "The resulting litigation would be staggering, straining the capacity of the state and federal courts," the attorneys general warn.

Bockting's lawyer, Franny Forsman, the federal public defender in Las Vegas, says such warnings are overblown. Of 49 judicial opinions dealing with the Crawford issue handed down in state and federal courts within the Ninth US Circuit Court of Appeals' jurisdiction, only five resulted in defendants being granted some form of relief, Ms. Forsman writes in her brief.

In Bockting's case, a divided Ninth Circuit panel ruled that the Crawford decision does apply retroactively. Prosecutors in Nevada appealed that decision to the Supreme Court.

Nevada Attorney General George Chanos and US Solicitor General Paul Clement are urging the high court to reject the Ninth Circuit's reasoning. They say the Crawford decision established a new procedural rule rather than the kind of monumental watershed rule whose application is indispensable to a fair trial. To trigger retroactive application, a new rule must rise to a level of such constitutional import that not applying it would be fundamentally unfair to defendants convicted under the prior legal regime.

Six federal circuit courts and numerous state appellate courts have ruled that Crawford does not apply retroactively, says Mr. Chanos. "The Ninth Circuit stands alone in its conclusion that Crawford is retroactive," he writes in his brief.

At its core, the Bockting case presents the high court with a conundrum, according to some analysts: how to acknowledge the constitutional significance of the Crawford decision without opening a Pandora's box of criminal appeals.

"I don't see how the court could say this is not a watershed rule. It is such a fundamentally different way of thinking about the problem than anything we had before," says Richard Friedman, a professor at the University of Michigan Law School and a leading confrontation-clause scholar.

But he says it would damage the development of this area of law if the high court declared its Crawford decision retroactive.

Professor Friedman stresses that he is not an expert in legal retroactivity. But he says if the court rules in favor of retroactivity, many judges would probably embrace a more restrictive view of the right to confront one's accusers at trial.

"I would be sorry to see Crawford held retroactive because I think it would just be a dead weight around the clause," he says. "The tendency [of judges] would be to construe the confrontation right narrowly because of the horror about what the consequences would be if all these cases that had been long decided had to be opened up."

2 Men Found Guilty Of Murder In Slaying Of 14-Year-Old Witness (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

A man accused of ordering a hit on a 14-year-old witness was convicted of murder yesterday, along with the gunman he hired to kill the girl.

The slaying of Jahkema "Princess" Hansen was as brazen a witness attack as the city had experienced, and the trial, which began in late September, cast an unsettling light on the netherworld that Hansen -- and her killers -- inhabited. Just a seventh-grader, Hansen hung out with people a lot older, and she was out buying drugs with some of them at 3 a.m. when she saw a killing that later would cost her her life.

Franklin Thompson and Marquette Ward were convicted after a trial in D.C. Superior Court that took many strange turns. Last week, the judge removed a juror in the middle of deliberations after she tried to use numbers and colors to decide the case. Earlier, Hansen's mother had to stop attending the trial after the judge rebuked her for following a juror home.

Hansen was shot in January 2004 in the rough-and-tumble Sursum Corda housing complex, off North Capitol Street, where the two defendants were familiar faces. Ward was known as Corleone, for the Mafia family portrayed in the "Godfather" films, and Thompson was known as Frank Nitti, for the feared accomplice to Al Capone.

Yesterday, as the jury foreman answered guilty again and again -- 31 times in all -- Thompson, 24, and Ward, 31, betrayed no emotion as they sat behind their attorneys. Both were convicted of first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit murder, obstruction of justice and other offenses tied to Hansen's death.

Ward also was convicted of killing a drug dealer named Mario J. Evans, 21, just five days before Hansen was slain. It was that act that set in motion the chain of violence that would end in the girl's death, argued the prosecutors, assistant U.S. attorneys Deborah Sines and Michelle Jackson.

Thompson and Ward, who will be sentenced Jan. 19, could spend the rest of their lives in prison. Arrested soon after Hansen's death, they have been jailed since.

"I feel like they got what they deserved," one juror, a 65-year-old federal employee, said afterward. "It was a heinous crime."

The trial was full of horrible images and grim testimony about sex, drugs and violence. But it also had a bit of the bizarre.

A key government witness, despite his residence in a supposedly secure D.C. jail, turned out to have been high on marijuana when he showed up to testify, prompting an unsuccessful defense effort to strike the man's testimony. Judyann Hansen, the victim's mother, drew the judge's attention after she followed a juror home one day after court and introduced herself. Nothing more apparently was said.

And then there was the juror with the interest in numerology. Soon after deliberations began, the woman started talking to her fellow jurors about birth dates and names and colors and the significance of each in predicting the outcome of the case. Talks stalled until the other jurors alerted Judge Wendell P. Gardner Jr., who replaced the juror with an alternate.

But in the end, the trial was about a precocious girl named Princess. The teenager styled herself as a sex object of Sursum Corda, sleeping with older men, according to testimony. At one point, not long before she was killed, she even boasted that her prowess was her ultimate protection. One of the men she was having sex with was Ward, who was 28 at the time.

But after he fatally shot Evans in the hallway of an apartment building, with Hansen and others looking on, Ward grew worried that she was going to talk. After secretly following her to a police station, where she had been summoned by detectives, he was convinced of it.

In fact, it wasn't Hansen who was talking; she angrily gave police the brushoff. Another witness, Timika Holiday, was aiding police. She, too, had seen Evans slain, and she would see her friend Hansen killed as well.

In the small community in and around Sursum Corda, everyone seemed to know everyone else's business, and that made talking to the police a perilous practice.

It was a world that Hansen and her killers were part of, prosecutors say, and it was the world from which prosecutors had to draw many of their witnesses, including their star, Holiday.

But Holiday had issues of her own. She absconded from the witness protection program, and for a time prosecutors feared that she would be killed. They had her deposed so her testimony would be available for the jury to hear if she died before the trial began.

Ward's attorney, Steven D. Kupferberg, and Thompson's attorney, Rudolph Acree, did everything they could to undermine Holiday's credibility during her two days on the witness stand.

Like her friend Hansen, Holiday, now 22, was known around Sursum Corda for sleeping with older men, among them Thompson and Ward, sometimes for money, according to testimony in the trial.

"Even exchange," she called it, when asked during her testimony if what she was engaging in was prostitution.

In the days after Evans was killed, Ward was focused only on what Hansen might tell the police.

So, prosecutors said, he enlisted his friend Thompson, who lived in the neighborhood surrounding Sursum Corda and knew Hansen, to kill the girl for $8,000 -- even as Ward and Thompson were promising her money to keep quiet.

"Little sis, you best not be snitching," Thompson was alleged to have told Hansen hours before he would kill her.

What might have sounded to her like a tough-love admonition was in fact a sinister premonition of what would unfold shortly after 11 p.m. Jan. 23, 2004, in a townhouse in the 100 block of First Terrace NW.

Hansen and other children were gathered around a dining table at a friend's residence, laughing the evening away.

Sent along to make sure the hit went down, Ward's cousin peeked into the house to make sure Hansen was inside, prosecutors said.

Then, Thompson burst through the door and opened fire, prosecutors said. A 12-year-old girl was wounded. But she was not the target. Hansen was, and Thompson chased her through the house and ultimately shot her twice in the back of the head, prosecutors said.

The crime, barely a mile from the Capitol, made national headlines. The police chief ordered a crackdown on the drugs and violence that had overtaken Sursum Corda. And Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) pushed to turn around the neighborhood for good. Over the summer, Williams gave the green light to a plan that would replace Sursum Corda with a much larger, mixed-income development of 1,600 units.

DNA Clears Man In Rape, Judge Rules (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

DALLAS, Oct. 31 (AP) — A man convicted of rape 25 years ago walked out of a courtroom a free man Tuesday after a judge ruled that he would probably not have been found guilty if DNA testing been available.

“My faith was tested, and I won,” said the man, Larry Fuller, 57, who trembled slightly as he left the courthouse carrying two worn Bibles.

After the ruling by Judge Lana McDaniel of District Court, supporters of Mr. Fuller broke out in applause. The assistant district attorney, John Rolater, who was not involved in the original case, apologized to Mr. Fuller.

“Thank you,” Mr. Fuller said. “Apology accepted.”

Mr. Fuller was sentenced to 50 years after jurors convicted him of aggravated rape in 1981, finding that he had broken into a woman’s apartment and raped her, using a butcher knife to cut her thumb, neck and back as she struggled.

The victim looked at two photo lineups, both of which included Mr. Fuller. She picked him in the second one, even though Mr. Fuller was bearded in the picture and she said her attacker had no facial hair.

At the time Mr. Fuller was a 32-year-old Vietnam veteran who had received the Air Medal for taking care of his crew. He was pursing a career in art and had worked as a driver and warehouse employee.

Mr. Fuller had no convictions for sexual assault, but he had pleaded guilty to robbing a convenience store in 1975 and had been sentenced to three years in prison. He served 18 years on the rape conviction. He was released in 1999 but sent back last year for a parole violation.

All the while, Mr. Fuller professed his innocence in the rape case and tried to prove it through DNA. This year, the Dallas County district attorney's office agreed to allow the additional testing.

Mr. Fuller's subsequent exoneration makes him the 10th Dallas County man in five years cleared by DNA testing. More than 20 men have been exonerated in Texas by such testing, according to the Innocence Project. Nationwide, 185 people have been cleared through DNA after their convictions, according to the Innocence Project. In most cases, testimony from mistaken witness identification led to the wrongful conviction, the group said.

Duke Rape Case Shadows An Unusual Campaign (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

DURHAM, N.C., Oct. 31 — The Democratic candidate is the prosecutor who brought the rape case against three Duke University lacrosse players.

His opponent on the ballot is a county commissioner who filed as an independent but refuses to campaign and says that if elected, he will not serve.

The third candidate is a Republican lawyer who is mounting a write-in campaign and promising to review the rape case, but is being pressured by the prosecutor's opponents to drop out in favor of the independent.

A week before Election Day, the race for Durham County district attorney is as odd a political campaign as anyone here can recall. The controversial lacrosse case looms over the incumbent, Michael B. Nifong. The opposition, under the banner of Anyone but Nifong, is fractured.

"The whole thing is very strange," said Joseph H. Collie, a retired businessman and supporter of the write-in Republican, Steve Monks.

Mr. Nifong's campaign director, Julie Linehan, remarked: "We have a saying here — O.I.D. Only in Durham."

After all the accusations and commentary that the case has generated around the country, there is mostly silence at the heart of the campaign: little advertising, no debates and no platform by the leading opponent except that if he should win, the governor will pick somebody else. Still, to the extent there is any campaign at all, it is because of Mr. Nifong's handling of the case against the three players, all white, accused of rape by a black woman hired to strip at a team party in March.

In a normal year in this heavily Democratic city, the Democrat would be a shoo-in. But this is not a normal year. Although Mr. Nifong by all appearances is the clear front-runner, a recent survey of 600 likely voters by WRAL-TV and The News & Observer of Raleigh found that 28 percent favored Lewis A. Cheek, the candidate who says he will not serve if elected. Forty-six percent favored Mr. Nifong, but 24 percent were undecided. (Mr. Monks got only 2 percent.)

An Oct. 5 fund-raising letter from the Cheek campaign, signed by a retired sheriff, Roland W. Leary, and the campaign manager, Beth Brewer, said, "We deserve honesty, integrity, good judgment and a sense of fair play."

In an interview, Ms. Brewer was blunter, saying Mr. Nifong "twisted evidence he may or may not have to indict what I think are some pretty demonstrably innocent young men."

Out-of-state money from Duke supporters has also entered the campaign. Parents of two unindicted lacrosse players donated $5,000 to establish a group called Duke Students for an Ethical Durham, aimed at registering Duke students to vote against Mr. Nifong. The group's treasurer, Stefanie Anne Sparks, a paralegal in a law firm that has represented unindicted players, said the group had registered more than 1,000 new voters.

Mr. Nifong has been under attack for months by the defense and supporters of the lacrosse players for aggressively pursuing a case based almost entirely on the account of the accuser, which he acknowledges he has heard only from police reports and written statements, and not directly by speaking to her.

The flaws and gaps in the evidence have mounted. No DNA from the defendants was found on the dancer. At least one of the accused appears to have a strong alibi. A second woman hired to strip at the party has said she saw no evidence of an attack. And the array of photographs that led to the identification of the three defendants was not presented according to federal, state and local police guidelines for lineups.

The accusation against the players, by a student at predominantly black North Carolina Central University here, broke last March in the midst of a tough Democratic primary campaign for district attorney, and Mr. Nifong, who ultimately won that election, has been accused of seizing on the case to win black support. At the time, he asserted that he had "no doubt" a rape had occurred, and called the lacrosse players "a bunch of hooligans" whose "daddies could buy them expensive lawyers" whenever they got into trouble.

"I'm not going to allow Durham's view in the minds of the world to be a bunch of lacrosse players at Duke raping a black girl from Durham," he told a local television station.

In a recent interview, Mr. Nifong was defiant about pursuing the case in the face of defense attacks and questions about the strength of the evidence.

"They've come out really strong with the idea they would either scare me or the victim away," he said. "That's never worked for me, which they should know by now, and it didn't work for her, either. And so here we are."

Even if Mr. Nifong loses, it is unclear how the case will be affected. Mr. Cheek said that he tried twice this year to get Mr. Nifong to hand off the case to the state attorney general, and that he allowed the anti-Nifong campaign to put him up as a candidate when the district attorney refused. But because he has decided that he does not want to leave private practice, a victory by Mr. Cheek would mean that Gov. Michael F. Easley would have to pick a successor to Mr. Nifong. The governor, a Democrat, has not made his views on the case known publicly.

Mr. Monks, the Republican candidate, who is running on the slogan "It's Your Choice. Not the Governor's," said that if elected he would review the evidence carefully to make his own determination, but that "this case might very well have to go to trial."

Meanwhile, Mr. Nifong's supporters are trying to cast him as an experienced prosecutor and a neophyte politician. He has been a prosecutor for 28 years and says he has handled about 300 felony cases, but he is engaged in his first political race, having been appointed acting district attorney in April 2005.

"He's a good person, he's a good lawyer, but he's in a situation he has never been in before," said Ronald L. Stephens, a local judge who was district attorney before Mr. Nifong.

Last month Mr. Nifong won the endorsement of the city's most influential political group, the Durham Committee on the Affairs of Black People. His supporters are predicting that whatever controversy the case has generated will not determine the outcome at the polls.

"People who are upset about the lacrosse case, they will be vocal but I don't think significant," said Frank Hyman, a former city councilman and longtime political observer, who backs Mr. Nifong. "I think most people are going to recognize this needs to be settled in court and not in the press."

Boy, 15, Arrested After 'Bottle Bomb' Blows Up Near School Bus (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

A 15-year-old Rockville student was arrested yesterday afternoon after a homemade "bottle bomb" he was about to bring onto a school bus exploded as a teacher discarded it, Montgomery County Fire and Rescue Service officials said.

A teacher at Mark Twain School who saw something suspicious approached the student -- whom authorities did not identify because he was charged as a juvenile -- as he was getting ready to board a school bus. As the teacher seized the two-liter bottle, its contents were activated by the movement, leading to an explosive chemical reaction.

The homemade bombs are unusual but easy to make, officials said.

"They're made to explode and can cause significant damage," said Pete Piringer, a spokesman for the fire and rescue service. "They're very dangerous to first-responders."

Firefighters were called to the school, at 14501 Avery Rd., shortly after the bottle detonated at 2:30 p.m. Investigators believe the bomb was made with common household products. It is unclear what the teenager sought to do with the bomb, Piringer said.

The student was charged with manufacturing and possession of an explosive device -- a felony punishable by up to 25 years in jail -- and reckless endangerment.

Most students who attend Mark Twain have special education needs, such as learning disabilities and behavioral problems

Auditor Reports Contract Lapses By Reiner Panel (LAT)

By Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

SACRAMENTO — A state commission chaired by Hollywood entertainer Rob Reiner suffered from lapses in its contracting, failed to properly award millions of dollars and did not adequately justify many of its payments, according to a state audit released today.

The nonpartisan California Bureau of State Audits found that the California Children and Families Commission, also known as the California First 5 Commission, used tax money to overpay for some services and failed to follow state rules when it awarded some contracts.

"We found a number of problems with the way it awards and manages these contracts," the report said, referring to the tens of millions in advertising and public relations contracts awarded since the commission was created after voters approved Proposition 10 in 1998.

"As a result, the state commission paid for services it had not contracted for, effectively preventing that money from being used to further the other activities allowed by the contract, namely purchasing printed ad space or broadcast media time," the audit said.

After a six-month investigation, the audit team concluded that the commission violated no laws when it aired television commercials last winter touting the benefits of preschool at the same time Reiner began a campaign to place an initiative on the state ballot to create universal preschool. Voters rejected that initiative, Proposition 82, in June.

"Our review determined that the state commission had clear legal authority to conduct its public advertising campaigns related to preschool," the auditors found.

Legislators requested the audit after The Times reported that the commission had used public money to pay for $23 million in preschool ads as the initiative campaign was launched.

Reiner resigned as the commission's chairman in March. He had created the First 5 Commission by sponsoring Proposition 10, which raised tobacco taxes to pay for early childhood health and education programs.

The audit said the "content of these advertisements and their timing were consistent with applicable legal restrictions related to the use of public funds for political purposes and confirmed that the state commission did not contribute any of its public funds to campaign accounts used to support the various ballot measures."

News accounts and criticism from politicians had raised two questions: Did the commission use public money to promote Reiner's political goals of creating universal preschool and did the commission's outside advertising and public relations firms get involved in the campaigns?

"On those two issues, the state audit confirms what we've said all along: that the First 5 Commission's advertising to promote universal preschool was appropriate and legal," said Reiner's spokesman, Mark Fabiani, adding that the commission never confused its public work with Reiner's political advocacy.

Reiner could not be reached for comment.

The commission answered the auditors by saying it "is deeply committed to making itself a model for state contracting practices, and has already begun to implement new policies and practices and improve staff training."

Among its findings, the audit said the commission:

Did not follow state policy when it used a competitive process to award three contracts valued at more than $47.7 million and failed to provide sufficient justification for awarding one $3 million contract and six amendments totaling $27.6 million using the noncompetitive process.

Paid $1.2 million more than it should have for administrative overhead because it did not follow state policy that limits such payments.

Paid invoices totaling $673,000 in 2002 and 2003 for fees and expenses of a contractor's employees. These payments violated the contract, "effectively preventing these funds from being used to further other activities that were allowable under the terms of the contract."

Such problems "caused the state commission to make some questionable payments to contractors for items such as laptop computers valued at $10,000, food catering costs and monthly parking fees," the audit said.

Security Firm's Founder Gets Detention For Fraud (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The founder of a D.C. security firm that has become bankrupt was sentenced yesterday to eight months' home detention and five years' probation for illegally diverting hundreds of thousands of dollars from a payroll account.

Jeffrey N. Jackson, 44, a former chief executive of Unlimited Security Inc. and part-time boxing promoter, also was ordered to pay $361,000 in restitution.

He was sentenced in U.S. District Court in the District.

Jackson and his brother founded Unlimited Security in the early 1990s. Within a decade, the company had hundreds of employees and tens of millions of dollars in federal and city security contracts.

But the company went bankrupt in 2002. According to bankruptcy filings, the company's finances were entangled with Jackson's boxing-promotions business.

Earlier this year, Jackson pleaded guilty to one count of bankruptcy fraud, admitting that in 2003, he illegally diverted more than $370,000 from a payroll account.

Charging documents stated that Jackson took the money "for his personal use, primarily for the funding of a private professional boxing promotion business."

The Washington Times first reported on the company's questionable expenses and financial troubles last year.

Yesterday, Jackson, the one-time promoter for former heavyweight boxing champion Riddick Bowe, said that he took the payroll money to help keep the company afloat.

"I wanted to do something to get the company out of bankruptcy," he said.

He said he wasn't prepared for his company's fast rise and fall.

"Success came so quickly that I didn't realize the situation I was in," Jackson said.

In allowing Jackson to remain out of prison, U.S. District Court Judge Ricardo M. Urbina departed significantly from federal sentencing guidelines.

The guidelines had called for Jackson to receive at least two years in prison.

Prosecutors thought Jackson should go to prison.

"This case, although it is a financial case, involves the integrity of the bankruptcy system," Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Butler said.

Defense attorney G. Allen Dale said that Jackson quickly admitted his guilt and has been making restitution.

"The crime was not one to benefit himself personally," Mr. Dale said.

Judge Urbina cited a recommendation from U.S. probation officer Kelly Kraemer-Soares that Jackson should not go to prison.

He also said Jackson's job as an executive at District-based Innovative Security would help him repay his debt faster.

The judge warned Jackson that he would sentence him to the maximum five years in prison if Jackson fails to adhere to guidelines of probation.

Jackson also was sentenced to undergo weekly drug tests and complete 250 hours of community service.

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Hears Appeal Of $79.5M Judgment (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — An attorney for a smoker's widow urged the Supreme Court on Tuesday to uphold a 1999 jury verdict that imposed a huge penalty on Philip Morris based on the tobacco giant's publicity campaign that played down the dangers of smoking.

Robert Peck told the justices that an Oregon jury that assessed punitive damages in the lung cancer death of Jesse Williams rightly considered how other smokers across the state were affected by Philip Morris' campaign. "This was a massive, market-directed fraud … to deceive customers and knowingly endanger their health," said Peck, asking the justices to spurn an appeal of a $79.5 million punitive damages award.

Mayola Williams sued the cigarette-maker for fraud and negligence after her husband, Jesse Williams, a Portland school janitor and three-pack-a-day Marlboro smoker, died in 1997. The jury's punitive damages award was 97 times the award it gave for actual damages. (Punitive damages are intended to punish a defendant and deter future wrongdoing.)

The Oregon Supreme Court upheld the verdict, saying the huge punitive damages award was permissible because of Philip Morris' "extraordinarily reprehensible" conduct.

Philip Morris, which makes Marlboros, contends the punitive damages were unconstitutionally excessive because they were so disproportionate to the actual damages and because jurors considered the company's impact on smokers not part of the case.

The dispute gives the justices a chance to clarify guidelines for awarding punitive damages. For decades, the court gave great leeway to state juries. In recent years, however, the court has begun to rein in damage awards. In 2003, the court said punitive damages that are more than 10 times the actual damages could be presumed excessive and in violation of the 14th Amendment's guarantee of due process of law. A question in this case is whether Philip Morris' conduct was so egregious that it justified an award beyond those guidelines.

On Tuesday, however, much of the hour-long session for oral arguments revolved around what Oregon jurors may have weighed as they levied the damages. There appeared to be a chance the justices would return the case to Oregon for more hearings.

Peck said the jury properly looked at how Philip Morris' publicity campaign endangered smokers who were as addicted as Williams, but it did not look at individual harms to other smokers.

Andrew Frey, representing Philip Morris, said jurors should have been specifically warned that they could not try to punish the company for harm to others who might end up bringing lawsuits.

Justice David Souter said it was difficult to know what the jury had in mind. He also said that a jury instruction proposed by Philip Morris at trial was unclear, so it would be difficult to fault the judge for disallowing it. Chief Justice John Roberts observed that juries must follow "a fine line" between considering the "reprehensibility" of a company's misconduct but not punishing it for specific harm to parties outside the case.

Philip Morris Asks Court For Relief (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

The Supreme Court heard a tobacco company's plea for relief from a $79.5 million punitive damages award yesterday, in a case that could illuminate the Roberts court's approach to tort reform.

In recent years, the court has helped the business community on the punitive-damages issue, ruling that excessive awards violate companies' constitutional rights. But yesterday's case may be especially significant because the firm seeking help is tobacco company Philip Morris, and it has been found liable not for bilking a consumer out of money, but for actually killing him.

A ruling in Philip Morris's favor would suggest that the court is so concerned about high punitive damages that it would protect even an unpopular corporate defendant. For their part, consumer and anti-smoking groups hope that the court will rule against Philip Morris -- and show thatpunitive-damage limits do not apply to especially reprehensible conduct.

By the end of oral arguments yesterday, however, it seemed that the court was reluctant to rule broadly in either direction.

Instead, several members of the court, including some who had supported its recent limits on punitive damages, suggested that the best way to handle the case would be to send it back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification of technical state law issues.

"What's worrying me about this case is . . . that we're going to be in a kind of bog of mixtures of constitutional law, unclear Oregon state law, not certain exactly what was meant by whom in the context of the trial, et cetera," said Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who voted in favor of the court's previous decisions limiting punitive damages.

Justices Antonin Scalia and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who dissented from those decisions, made similar points, as did Justice David H. Souter.

Compensatory damages are usually awarded to compensate for economic losses or pain and suffering. About six states do not have punitive damages. Elsewhere, punitive damages may be added -- subject to statutory limits in some states -- to deter and punish corporate misconduct.

Businesses say that the patchwork of state laws, coupled with the unpredictable behavior of juries, has left them at the mercy of an expensive and arbitrary system. Consumer organizations and trial lawyers say punitive damages are often the only effective means to combat corporations' wrongdoing.

In 1996, the Supreme Court sided with business. It overturned a $4 million punitive-damage award to an Alabama man who had sued a BMW dealer for selling him a repainted car instead of a new one.

For the first time, the court declared that the constitutional right to due process of law meant that companies may not be subject to disproportionate punitive damages.

In 2003, the court broadly defined what qualifies as an excessive award, suggesting that punitive damages should normally be no more than nine times as large as compensatory damages.

Yesterday's case, Philip Morris v. Williams , No. 05-1256, began with a lawsuit in Oregon by Mayola Williams, the widow of Jesse Williams, a lifelong Marlboro smoker who died of lung cancer in 1997.

She alleged that the company had knowingly lied when it minimized the health risks of smoking in public statements beginning in the 1950s and stretching over four decades thereafter. Jesse Williams repeatedly referred to those statements in explaining his refusal to quit smoking.

In 1999, an Oregon jury found Philip Morris liable for fraud. It awarded Mayola Williams $821,000 in compensation and assessed the company $79.5 million in punitive damages, a ratio of punitive to compensatory damages of 97 to 1 .

The Oregon Supreme Court has upheld the award, even after the Supreme Court asked it to reconsider in light of its ruling outlining a maximum punitive-compensatory ratio of 9 to 1.

"This was a massive, market-directed fraud driven by their rational and deliberate decisions at the highest levels of the company to deceive customers and knowingly endanger their health," Williams's lawyer, Robert S. Peck, said yesterday. "And so this is the misconduct Oregon is seeking to deter."

Philip Morris alleges that the trial judge violated the Constitution when he refused Philip Morris's request to bar the jury from punishing the company for harm it caused other smokers than Jesse Williams.

The jury instruction Philip Morris had proposed would have told jurors that they could "consider" the impact of the company's conduct on other smokers but not punish it.

Several justices thought the instruction was so unclear that it would not have necessarily helped Philip Morris anyway.

"I don't know how a juror is supposed to figure this out," Souter said.

DOJ_NMG_0089340

Members of the court also pointed out that the instruction might have violated an Oregon law allowing jurors to assess punitive damages based on probable harm to others in the state.

High Court Appears Reluctant To Alter Punitive-Damage Law Several Justices Suggest Philip Morris's Appeal Be Returned To Lower Court By JESS BRAVIN (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court seemed reluctant to move the law on punitive damages, with several justices suggesting during oral arguments on the term's most closely watched business case that it could be returned to a lower court for clarification rather than decided here along constitutional principles.

At issue is a $79.5 million punitive damage award to a cigarette smoker's widow who sued Philip Morris USA, a division of Altria Group Inc. A state court jury in Oregon made the award, about 97 times the compensatory damages it also awarded, after the trial judge rejected Philip Morris's request to instruct jurors to ignore "alleged harms suffered by nonparties." Oregon's high court upheld the verdict, finding it comported with U.S. Supreme Court rulings that imposed constitutional limits on punitive awards.

CASE DOCKET

Philip Morris felt otherwise, and the justices agreed to consider two grounds of appeal: whether the jury could award damages for harm to nonparties and, in any case, if a 97-to-1 punitive-to-compensatory damage ratio is automatically excessive.

In the past decade, business has won two major rulings that rolled back blockbuster punitive damage awards, money intended to punish a defendant for its behavior and deter repetition. In each case, the court ruled the awards violated the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause.

The justices in 1996 threw out a $2 million punitive award a consumer won after learning that the seller concealed the fact that his new BMW had been damaged and repainted before sale. A 5-4 court, in an opinion by Justice John Paul Stevens, found the amount "grossly excessive" after considering the actual damages the plaintiff suffered, civil penalties for similar misconduct and the defendant's "degree of reprehensibility."

Then in 2003, in a 6-3 opinion by Justice Anthony Kennedy, the court rejected a 145-to-1 punitive-to-compensatory damage ratio. A Utah court had awarded the damages to a policyholder who contended State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. had misled her into believing it would cover her liability for a car accident. The court suggested that "single digit multipliers are more likely to comport with due process" than larger ones.

The Philip Morris case promised to be the third act in punitive damages, presenting issues absent from the previous two opinions. Only financial losses were at issue there, but the cigarette lawsuit dealt with sickness and death, in what the jury found to be a decades-long fraud to mislead the public about the dangers of smoking. The outcome could affect tobacco companies and other industries whose long-term conduct potentially harmed large numbers of victims.

WSJ.com's Law Blogger Peter Lattman4 talks with Legal Editor Ashby Jones about arguments before the Supreme Court involving the constitutionality of punitive damages in a tobacco case.

Philip Morris's attorney, Andrew Frey, told the justices that the Oregon Supreme Court had rejected the proposed jury instruction because it improperly held it acceptable to award damages for harm to nonparties. Several justices weren't so sure, and Justice Antonin Scalia, who agreed that nonparty harm can't be a factor, nonetheless suggested the Oregon court could have found Philip Morris's instruction improper for other reasons.

"We can say that was error and remand it to them," Justice Scalia said. "That might not make anybody happy," but it would dispose of the case by letting the Oregon court clarify its reasoning.

The justices barely reached the second issue -- whether there was an absolute rule against damages beyond a certain formula. No justice disagreed when Justice Stephen Breyer, who voted with the BMW and State Farm majorities to limit punitive damages, suggested that some conduct could be so reprehensible as to warrant a 100-to-1 punitive damage ratio.

Justices Weigh Limits On Punitive Damages (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 31 — The Supreme Court is accustomed to drawing fine lines. But during arguments on Tuesday on the limits the Constitution places on punitive damages, the proposed line between the permissible and the unconstitutional was so fine that the justices appeared close to giving up.

The result was that a case widely anticipated to produce the most important business ruling of the Roberts court so far looked likely instead to end with a trip back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification.

That court upheld an award of $79.5 million in punitive damages against the cigarette maker Philip Morris in a lawsuit brought by the widow of a man who smoked two packs of Marlboros every day for 45 years. The man, Jesse Williams, died five months after a diagnosis of inoperable lung cancer in 1996.

The jury had awarded his widow, Mayola, compensatory damages of $821,000, meaning that the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages was 97 to 1. That was far greater than the "single digit" ratio the Supreme Court placed at the outer limit of constitutionality three years ago, the last time it decided a punitive damages case.

Philip Morris's lawyer, Andrew L. Frey, argued that the Oregon courts had allowed the jury to punish the company for the harm to other Oregon smokers who had not filed suit. Mr. Frey said this had allowed a single plaintiff's case to be turned into "a one-way class action in which Philip Morris was exposed to global punishment by the jury without any of the protections of a class action."

There was general agreement during the argument, including by Mrs. Williams's lawyer, Robert S. Peck, that awarding damages on the basis of injury to nonplaintiffs was impermissible under the Supreme Court's recent precedents.

But there was no agreement on whether that actually happened. Mr. Peck argued that the Oregon courts had simply permitted the jury to consider harm to others, not to impose "global punishment" but as part of its assessment of the "reprehensibility" of the cigarette company's behavior, a factor that the Supreme Court's precedents permit juries in punitive damages cases to consider.

The basis for the lawsuit was the claim that Philip Morris's strategy of denying the connection between smoking and cancer deceived Mr. Williams into believing that he could safely keep smoking.

"This was a massive market-directed fraud driven by their rational and deliberate decisions at the highest levels of the company to deceive customers and knowingly endanger their health," Mr. Peck told the justices. The Oregon Supreme Court, in upholding the award, called Philip Morris's conduct "extraordinarily reprehensible, by any measure of which we are aware."

The United States Supreme Court has been deeply split on the punitive damages question, with three justices, Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, rejecting the idea that the Constitution's guarantee of due process places a limit on what states can permit juries to award.

With the departure of William H. Rehnquist, the former chief justice, and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, both of whom supported due process limits on punitive damages, the known margin of support for the court's precedents fell to 4 to 3, with the views of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. unknown.

The court's decision last May to hear the Philip Morris appeal, Philip Morris USA v. Williams, No. 05-1256, suggested an effort to find a new center of gravity on an issue of considerable interest to the business community.

But the problem that emerged during Tuesday's argument was the justices' evident concern that they lacked a basis for deciding whether, on the one hand, the Oregon courts had improperly allowed jurors to take into account the harm to nonplaintiffs, or on the other hand, had properly allowed consideration of the reprehensibility of the conduct by Philip Morris, a unit of Altria. Finding the Oregon Supreme Court's opinion insufficiently clear on this basic point, the justices would be unable to use the case as a vehicle for taking their consideration of punitive damages to the next level.

"What's worrying me," Justice Stephen G. Breyer said to Mr. Frey, "is that we're going to be in a kind of bog of mixtures of constitutional law, unclear Oregon state law, not certain exactly what was meant by whom in the context of the trial, et cetera."

And Justice David H. Souter, referring to the Oregon Supreme Court, asked Mr. Peck: "Isn't perhaps the better course to send this back to them and say, 'We don't know what you mean?' And let them tell us clearly."

The confusion was evident at the beginning of the argument, when Mr. Frey said the Oregon trial court had improperly refused to use a jury instruction proposed by Philip Morris "which would have told the jury that it was not to punish for harm to nonparties."

The proposed instruction said that "although you may consider the extent of harm suffered by others" in deciding whether the punishment bore a "reasonable relationship" to the injury to Mr. Williams, "you are not to punish the defendant for the impact of its alleged misconduct on other persons, who may bring lawsuits of their own."

The failure to give this instruction was part of the denial of Philip Morris's right to due process, Mr. Frey said.

But several justices said they found the instruction confusing and unlikely to have steered jurors away from an improper basis for awarding damages.

"You don't think that would confuse the jury if they are first told that they may consider the extent of harm suffered by others, and then the next instruction seems to say they can't?" Justice Ginsburg asked Mr. Frey.

"The concept may be abstract," Mr. Frey replied, insisting that there was a "difference between considering and punishing" that a proper jury instruction would have made "quite clear to the jury."

Tobacco Judgment Blocked

WASHINGTON, Oct. 31 (AP) — A federal appeals court blocked a landmark judgment against the tobacco industry on Tuesday, allowing the companies to continue selling "light" and "low tar" cigarettes until their appeals can be reviewed.

The decision by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia also allows the companies to continue for now the advertising campaigns that a federal judge in August ruled were misleading.

Without comment, the appeals court granted the tobacco companies' request to put Judge Gladys Kessler's order on hold. They have argued that her far-reaching ruling could cost them millions of dollars and lead to a loss of customers.

In mid-August, Judge Kessler ruled that the companies had violated racketeering laws and conspired for decades to mislead the public about the health hazards of smoking.

She ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as "low tar," "light," "ultra light" or "mild," because such cigarettes have been found to be no safer than others because of how people smoke them.

Judge Kessler's ruling was appealed by Philip Morris USA, Lorillard Inc., Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation and British American Tobacco.

Justices May Return Punitive Damages Case To Oregon High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 1, 2006

The Supreme Court's long-awaited oral argument in the "Big Tobacco" punitive damages case appeared to fizzle on Tuesday, with several justices hinting that they'd like to kick the case back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification.

Instead of delving deeply into the contentious debate over the constitutionality of high punitive damages in the context of tobacco litigation, the justices seemed troubled over more technical matters during hourlong arguments in Philip Morris USA v. Williams.

But there were some signs that if the high court decides to keep the case and rule on it, the justices might be willing to uphold the large verdict in the Philip Morris case, in spite of Court precedents that point toward limiting punitive damages.

In the State Farm v. Campbell decision in 2003, the high court suggested that a 9-to-1 ratio between punitive and compensatory damages was the outer limit of acceptability under the Constitution, though it said some cases could warrant higher punitive damages.

But at oral argument Tuesday, there was scant mention of ratios and a greater climate of deference toward state courts and how they handle punitive damages without federal strictures. The result could be the Court tolerating a "tobacco exception" to State Farm that would allow higher damages because of evidence of decades of industry fraud and deception over the dangers of smoking.

But much of the argument Tuesday was taken up with the smaller-gauge issue of jury instructions that were not allowed in the 1999 trial at issue in the case. Portland, Ore., jurors awarded Mayola Williams $821,485 in compensatory and $79.5 million in punitive damages levied against Philip Morris -- a 97-to-1 ratio between punitives and compensatories. Her husband, Jesse, died in 1997 after four decades of smoking Marlboros.

Philip Morris had sought a jury instruction at trial that would keep jurors from imposing punitive damages for harm suffered by nonparties, namely other Oregon smokers besides Williams. The trial judge's denial of that request figured in the tobacco company's appeal of the verdict, but the Oregon Supreme Court said the trial judge's decision was proper under state law.

Justices on Tuesday seemed bothered by the fact that the jury instruction sought by Philip Morris would have told jurors that they could consider the harm to others inflicted by Philip Morris but could not punish the company for that harm. That seemingly confusing instruction led in turn to puzzlement over the Oregon Supreme Court's basis for rejecting it.

"I don't know how a juror is supposed to figure this out," said Justice David Souter, adding later, "Isn't perhaps the better course to send this back to them [the Oregon Supreme Court] and say, 'We don't know what you mean'?" He and other justices appeared reluctant to supersede the Oregon court's reading of Oregon law, but they wanted to be sure exactly what the Oregon Supreme Court was saying about that law.

"We're going to be in a kind of bog of mixtures of constitutional law, unclear Oregon state law, not certain exactly what was meant by whom in the context of the trial," said Justice Stephen Breyer at one point.

Andrew Frey, the Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw partner arguing on behalf of Philip Morris, tried with mixed success to steer the debate back to his main argument that punishing his client for harm to nonparties violates the due process clause of the 14th Amendment. "What you're doing is ... you're allowing a potentially aberrational verdict to pre-empt the work of other juries," Frey said.

Pressed by Justice Antonin Scalia, Frey acknowledged that if a jury found that actions by a defendant risked harming other people, "they could punish this more severely. What they cannot do is punish it globally."

In advance of the arguments, there was suspense over how the Court's new members, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr., would respond to the case, because they do not have much of a track record on the punitive damages issue. But their comments did not tip their hands. Alito seemed concerned about the confusing jury instructions and may be one of the justices considering sending the case back to Oregon.

More significantly, Roberts pointedly asked Robert Peck, the lawyer for Williams, whether he was asking the Court to reconsider State Farm and other precedents. Peck said no, adding that "this judgment is valid under those precedents." He said Oregon had enacted procedural safeguards to guarantee that defendants are not unfairly punished, and he urged the Court to allow the states to "address any concerns with due process" by allowing them to continue to experiment legislatively without strict federal constraints.

For example, under Oregon law, juries in future tobacco cases would be required to consider the high damages in the Williams case in determining the appropriateness of punitive damages against the same defendant for the same conduct.

Damages Assessment (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

When the Supreme Court agreed to hear Philip Morris v. Williams, many wondered if the Justices would merely tinker with their punitive damages jurisprudence. But after yesterday's oral arguments, it looks as though they have bigger fish to fry.

In Philip Morris, the tobacco giant is challenging a $79.5 billion verdict affirmed by the Oregon Supreme Court in February. And the conventional thinking was that the U.S. Supremes would focus on the size of the award, especially given their rulings in BMW v. Gore (1996) and State Farm v. Campbell (2003) that the Constitution limits punitive damage awards.

Instead, yesterday's arguments focused on the procedural and structural limits of punitive damages. The main issue, based on the Justices' questioning, was whether a single plaintiff should collect damages on behalf of other people not involved in the case. The Court still might rule on the damage amount. But it is encouraging for tort reformers that the Court is thinking more broadly about runaway litigation.

Much of the questioning concerned whether the lower courts had allowed extra punishment based on alleged harm to third parties. The plaintiffs argued that the Oregon jury didn't need to be told that it wasn't permitted to punish Philip Morris on behalf of other smokers. But Justices Stephen Breyer and David Souter and Chief Justice John Roberts were skeptical of that view. So was Justice Antonin Scalia, who has voted against due process limits on punitive damages.

The outcome of this case could have ramifications far beyond tobacco. Whether a jury, in a case involving a single plaintiff, can impose extra damages on a defendant for harming other people who haven't brought suit is an issue that arises in product-liability cases of all kinds -- from autos to drugs.

And the Justices yesterday seemed to agree that these pseudo-class actions might present problems of due process. When a plaintiffs lawyer is permitted to argue that damages directed at Merck or Toyota should reflect that their products harmed not only his lone client but (allegedly) everyone in the state, it raises the possibility of duplicative punishment. Even if a defendant prevails, what stops the next plaintiffs lawyer from making the same argument on behalf of another (and another and another) lone client?

This is what class actions are for, or so we thought. Yet plaintiffs attorneys want it both ways. Without having to get a class certified, or divvy up any potential award among class members, the trial bar wants to press for damages on behalf of millions of people they don't even represent.

This may be an even deeper due process violation than outrageous punitive damages because it goes directly to the powers of the jury, and the standards by which it imposes punishment. Some guiding restraint from the Supreme Court on the matter would be helpful.

Sheep's Clothing (WP)

TOBACCO GIANT R.J. Reynolds tried to wrap itself in a cloak of corporate responsibility last month when it agreed to stop selling flavored cigarettes with names such as Twista Lime and Mocha Taboo, which a band of state attorneys general said appealed to the underaged. But when Big Tobacco has the chance to support the most effective measures to mitigate the health consequences of smoking, it instead uses tricky tactics and spends millions to defeat them.

Next week voters in Arizona and Ohio will decide between two ballot measures, both of which purport to ban smoking in many public places. In reality, Ohio's Issue 5 would ban smoking in bars and restaurants across the state, and it is supported by the American Cancer Society and other public health advocates. The state's Issue 4, on the other hand, would allow patrons to light up in bowling alleys, most bars and smoking areas in restaurants. Its principal backer is R.J. Reynolds. Big Tobacco's measure would also amend the Ohio state constitution, which means that it would invalidate tougher existing local ordinances and Issue 5, even if the latter passed by a wider margin. The story is about the same in Arizona, with two ballot initiatives, one declawed and backed by R.J. Reynolds.

Evidence -- including a painstaking surgeon general's review published this summer -- shows that tough smoking bans are the only effective way to protect bar and restaurant workers, not to mention nonsmoking patrons. Bartenders' smoking-related ailments disappeared within months of the imposition of strict smoking bans in jurisdictions across the country and overseas. Separate smoking zones, on the other hand, fail to contain secondhand smoke.

R.J. Reynolds and other tobacco firms are also spending tens of millions in Arizona, California and Missouri to kill proposed increases in tobacco excise taxes. Raising the price of cigarettes reduces demand for them, encouraging smokers to quit. Frank J. Chaloupka, a researcher at the University of Illinois at Chicago, estimates that a 10 percent increase in the price of cigarettes would decrease overall cigarette smoking among youth by 13 percent.

Cancer rates in this country continue to decline, in large part because of measures such as smoking bans and cigarette taxes. If tobacco companies wanted to live up to their televised pronouncements, they would not hijack the initiative process in Arizona and Ohio, nor would they pour millions into defeating new tobacco taxes.

Standards Are Essential (USAT)

By Robin S. Conrad

USA Today, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089345

Punitive damages — damages awarded for reprehensible conduct — are a great deterrent for corporate misbehavior. But like any other punishment, punitive damages cannot be imposed without rational standards and reasonable limits. Unfortunately, too many courts fail to enforce existing standards and limits, resulting too often in arbitrary and grossly excessive awards.

In Philip Morris v. Williams, in which the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday heard oral arguments, Oregon's Supreme Court upheld a $79.5 million punitive damages award that is nearly 100 times the amount of the plaintiff's compensatory damages. In its amicus brief, the National Chamber Litigation Center argued that the state supreme court ignored the Supreme Court's guidance in 2003's State Farm v. Campbell, recommending a single-digit ratio for most punitive damages awards.

An increasing number of courts throughout the country are ignoring the crucial guidance outlined in State Farm. Unless the high court reaffirms and further clarifies the standards governing punitive damages awards, order and rationality in awarding punitive damages never will be realized.

Some argue that the judicial branch is not the proper place for punitive damages reform, but rather that irrational punitive damages awards are solely a problem for state legislatures and even Congress. We disagree. The Constitution prohibits the deprivation of property without "due process of law," and the essence of "law" is rational and predictable standards. Courts thus have a fundamental obligation to ensure that the trial procedures employed in determining punitive damages include reasonable standards for measuring them. And when the results of the trial process are demonstrably not rational, courts have an equal obligation to impose reasonable standards after the fact and reduce outsized awards to reasonably proportional amounts.

We hope and expect that the U.S. Supreme Court will reaffirm its 2003 State Farm decision so that punitive damages, where reprehensible conduct has been proved, are awarded fairly, and American jobs and the economy are protected.

Appeals Court Blocks Ruling Against 'light' Cigarettes (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — A federal appeals court blocked a landmark judgment against the tobacco industry Tuesday, clearing the way for the companies to continue selling "light" and "low tar" cigarettes until their appeals can be reviewed.

The decision by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit also allows the companies to continue for now the advertising campaigns that a federal judge in August ruled were misleading.

Without comment, the appeals court granted the tobacco companies' request to put Judge Gladys Kessler's order on hold. The companies have argued that her far-reaching ruling could cost them millions of dollars and lead to a loss of customers.

In mid-August, Kessler ruled that the companies had violated racketeering laws and conspired for decades to mislead the public about the health hazards of smoking.

The judge ordered the companies to publish in newspapers and on their Web sites "corrective statements" on the adverse health effects and addictiveness of smoking and nicotine.

She also ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as "low tar," "light," "ultra light" or "mild," since such cigarettes have been found to be no safer than others because of how people smoke them.

William V. Corr, executive director of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, said the appeals court stay was not surprising.

"Judge Kessler's finding was that these companies have lied to the American people for 50 years," Corr said. "We're confident that, if it means going all the way to the Supreme Court, the government's case will be vindicated and the industry will be held accountable."

Tobacco Companies Win Delay Of `Light' Marketing Ban (Update2) (BLOOM)

By William McQuillen

Bloomberg, November 1, 2006

Oct. 31 (Bloomberg) -- Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA and other U.S. cigarette makers won a delay of a court-imposed ban on the marketing of ``light'' cigarettes the industry claimed would cost it hundreds of millions of dollars.

The ruling today by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington postpones enforcement of an order by U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler requiring the companies to stop marketing cigarettes as ``light'' and ``low-tar'' by January, and to make statements about the health effects of smoking in the media and on cigarette packages. Her ruling is delayed while they pursue an appeal.

Following a nine-month trial, Kessler ruled in August that the companies violated the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, or RICO, in a case filed in 1999 by the U.S. Department of Justice. Today, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said the companies had ``satisfied the stringent standards required'' for a stay pending their appeal to the court.

Kessler said in her opinion that the companies `` marketed and sold their lethal product with zeal, with deception, with a single-minded focus on their financial success, and without regard for the human tragedy or social costs."

In the same ruling, the judge also said she lacked the authority to order the companies to pay $14 billion to fund nationwide smoking cessation and anti-smoking education programs sought by the government.

Praise

Praising the appellate court's ruling, Altria's associate general counsel William Ohlemeyer said Kessler's decision ``is contrary to the law and facts presented during trial."

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller declined to comment.

In addition to Philip Morris, the defendants that requested the stay are Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco; Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp.; Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco Co. and British American Tobacco Plc's British American Tobacco (Investments) Ltd.

Shares of New York-based Altria were unchanged at $81.33 at 5:04 p.m. in trading after the close of the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of Winston-Salem, North Carolina-based Reynolds American fell 34 cents to $63.16.

The case is U.S. v. Philip Morris USA, 99-CV-2496, U.S. District Court, District of Columbia (Washington).

Canadian Tied To Merrill Fraud Gets 10-Year Sentence (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Joe Schneider

Bloomberg, November 1, 2006

Oct. 31 (Bloomberg) -- Michael Ritter, a Canadian who admitted helping ex-Merrill Lynch & Co. trader Daniel Gordon hide $43 million stolen from the securities firm, was sentenced to 10 years in prison.

Ritter, 49, former chief counsel to the Alberta Legislature, was also ordered to forfeit $471,000 in a court hearing today in Edmonton, Alberta. He pleaded guilty Oct. 27 to theft and fraud, admitting he took part in money-laundering with Gordon, then stole $10.5 million from the Merrill trader.

``The fact Mr. Ritter was stealing money from a thief may be ironic, but it's not mitigating," Provincial Court Judge Elizabeth Johnson said in handing down the sentence.

Ritter was sentenced to three years for the crimes involving Merrill, the world's third-biggest securities firm, and seven years for an unrelated investment fraud. The sentence will keep Ritter from having to face charges in the U.S. connected to the second scheme.

``I take full and complete responsibility for my actions," Ritter told Johnson, reading a statement for five minutes. ``I am deeply and sincerely sorry."

Ritter, former chief executive officer of Newport Pacific Financial Group, admitted using the company to hide Gordon's embezzled funds in offshore accounts. He used money left in the accounts by Gordon to buy a condominium, an airplane and a box at the National Hockey League's Edmonton Oilers hockey arena, he said.

Gordon Guilty Plea

Gordon pleaded guilty. He was sentenced Oct. 14 to 3 1/2 years in prison, fined $100,000 and ordered to return the money he stole.

Ritter said he set up an offshore trust for Gordon and sent the money to a Swiss bank account, according to a statement given the court last week approved by Ritter and prosecutors. The ex- CEO said he didn't know the money was embezzled.

Gordon transferred all but $10.5 million from the account back to the U.S., without Ritter's knowledge and in violation of a bank requirement that at least $15 million be left in the account, the statement said. Ritter closed the account and kept the remaining money.

Ritter was indicted by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles for his role in aiding Larry Toshio Osaki in a Ponzi scheme in which early investors received returns above market rates from money deposited by later investors. U.S. prosecutors said Osaki collected $250 million from almost 7,000 investors and caused them to lose $150 million.

No Extradition

In exchange for his guilty plea today, Ritter won't be extradited to the U.S. Osaki pleaded guilty March 24, 2005, to conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering charges. He was sentenced last December to 20 years in prison and ordered to pay $145 million in restitution.

Osaki was the ringleader, and Ritter deserved a lesser sentence, Thom Mrozek, spokesman at the U.S. Attorney's office in Los Angeles said in a telephone interview.

``It was a fair resolution to this matter," Mrozek said.

Provincial prosecutor Gregg Lepp said after the sentencing the Ritter case is ``just the tip of the iceberg" of international fraud. He said Alberta prosecutors and police are investigating other frauds of more than $10 million. He declined to be more specific.

``Earlier in my career we saw very few cases having international connections," Lepp told reporters. ``Now it's the exceptional case of six-figure, seven-figure frauds that doesn't have an international connection."

Jailed Since August

Ritter has been jailed since an Aug. 2 conviction for failing to comply with a court order. He was charged after he failed to turn in a Belize passport and sought a replacement from authorities in the Central American country using a fake name.

The 10-year sentence is in addition to the 11 months Ritter has already served. Usually, in Canada, prisoners get double credit for time served while awaiting trial. U.S. authorities urged that Ritter be denied the usual credit for time served, Mrozek said.

The case is Between Her Majesty the Queen and Michael Ritter, 051047785P1, Court of Queen's Bench (Edmonton).

OAKLAND Man Gets 4-year Term For $1.5 Million Scam (SFC)

By Patrick Hoge

San Francisco Chronicle, November 1, 2006

A Walnut Creek man has been sentenced to four years in federal prison for swindling investors out of $1.5 million by falsely claiming that Bill Gates and other magnates were buying shares in his company, prosecutors said Monday.

Lal Bhatia, 39, was convicted in February of 27 charges of mail fraud and money laundering. Prosecutors said Bhatia, as chief executive of ABE Technologies Inc., had lured investors by telling them Gates, Michael Dell of Dell Inc. and Sabeer Bhatia, the founder of Hotmail, had agreed to invest in the company.

Sabeer Bhatia, who is no relation to the defendant, testified at the trial that he had never met Lal Bhatia or done business with him.

Prosecutors said Lal Bhatia had shown forged documents to investors to support his claim that a Swiss banking entity, which didn't exist, was backing him.

He was sentenced to prison Oct. 23 by U.S. District Judge Claudia Wilken, who also imposed a $100,000 fine and ordered him to pay $894,531 in restitution to his victims.

Man Gets 4 Years For Fraud (CCT)

By George Avalos

The Contra Costa Times, November 1, 2006

Lal Bhatia, a Walnut Creek man, has received a four-year sentence for a case in which he posed as an executive with ties to Bill Gates and other tech luminaries.

He also is awaiting a separate trial on different fraud charges.

Bhatia, 39, was convicted of swindling investors out of $1.5 million, government authorities said. Federal investigators said Monday that Bhatia was sentenced on Oct. 23, following his conviction in February.

As part of the scam, Bhatia posed as the chief executive of ABE Technologies Inc., a bogus company that Bhatia claimed had received financial backing from some of the biggest names in technology.

Bill Gates, the founder of Microsoft Corp., and Michael Dell, founder of Dell Inc., were among the digital leaders whom Bhatia said had invested in, or had bought shares in, ABE Technologies.

Bhatia also said one of his investors was the coincidentally named Sabeer Bhatia, the co-founder of Hotmail. The Hotmail executive testified at the trial.

"This was brazen," said Dana Wagner, an assistant U.S. attorney who co-prosecuted the case.

Bhatia filed a notice of appeal Monday for the conviction and sentencing, said Sunita Kapoor, Bhatia's Danville-based attorney.

"Mr. Bhatia intends to vindicate himself," Kapoor said. "This is a family feud." Kapoor said the real fault in the case lies with the relatives. The relatives, Kapoor and Bhatia's father claim in a civil lawsuit, misappropriated funds from Bhatia's grandfather through an ancient system of financial dealing called hawala.

Investigators pointed out the conviction and sentencing show that the jury and judge believe Lal Bhatia was at fault. By taking advantage of the peak of the Internet frenzy in 1999 and 2000, Bhatia bilked his own relatives, prosecutors said.

"There was a fever at that time, with people excited about getting into the tech industry, the dot-coms, companies going public," Wagner said. "The victims in this case were members of his family."

Bhatia's uncle, two aunts, and another relative were the victims, said Joe Camillucci, a special agent for the Internal Revenue Service.

Bhatia told his relatives that ABE Technologies was one of the hottest of the dot-com companies. He spun a yarn about its impressive technologies and backers.

"He told them it was an Internet 2, a company that would completely revolutionize the Internet," Camillucci said.

ABE Technologies, Bhatia told his relatives, had developed a secret product or service for which the biggest companies in the tech world hungered. Those grandiose claims preyed on the desire that many people had to harvest a bumper crop of profits from the Net.

"This was seen as a high-tech opportunity, a very exciting company, a chance to get in on the ground floor and make millions of dollars out of it," Wagner said.

For further authenticity, Bhatia fashioned a brochure about his company from bits and pieces of public statements made by American companies. The balance sheet came from Intel, the income statement from Coca Cola, a shareholders message from a book, Camillucci said.

Bhatia also capitalized on the pride that many Indians have about Sabeer Bhatia, who has achieved iconic status in South Asia as being India's first celebrity entrepreneur, as the Financial Times described it in March.

Yet the Sabeer connection helped trip up Lal Bhatia. One of the aunts noticed that the name of Sabeer's new venture was misspelled in a Lal Bhatia brochure. What's more, the relatives became suspicious when they were never repaid for their investments.

The FBI and the IRS teamed up to track Bhatia's complex schemes, said Joseph Schadler, a spokesman for the FBI's Bay Area operations.

"The money trail is so convoluted that it really behooves us to have the financial expertise of the IRS on board," Schadler said.

In a separate case, Bhatia awaits trial over accusations that he and other suspects posed as wealthy financiers and a British noble as part of an alleged scam in which victims lost $1.9 million.

The suspects convinced developers in Florida and Texas that they could arrange large loans for their projects in return for up-front fees to process the bogus loans, FBI investigators said. Bhatia allegedly had his victims meet a nobleman who said he had rescued Queen Elizabeth II from financial ruin.

Tech CEO Gets 4-year Prison Term In Investment Scam (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, November 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A technology entrepreneur convicted of bilking investors out of $1.5 million with false claims that Bill Gates and Michael Dell also invested in his company was sentenced to four years in federal prison, authorities said Monday.

Lal Bhatia, 39, of Walnut Creek, also was ordered at his Oct. 23 sentencing to pay nearly $1 million in fines and restitution for the scheme at ABE Technologies Inc., according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California.

Bhatia, who was the company's chief executive, was convicted in February on 27 counts of mail fraud and money laundering stemming from a series of bogus claims to drum up support for his startup business.

Bhatia lured investors by claiming that tech luminaries Gates and Dell invested in the company, prosecutors said.

He also touted the support of Sabeer Bhatia, a co-founder of the Hotmail e-mail service, who later testified that he had never met nor done business with the defendant. The two Bhatias are not related.

Lal Bhatia also duped investors by providing forged documents touting the backing of a fictitious multibillion dollar Swiss banking entity, prosecutors said.

Bhatia, who is free on bail, is appealing the conviction and the sentence, said Sunita Kapoor, one of his lawyers.

Kapoor declined to discuss specifics of the case. But she said the case boiled down to a family feud between Bhatia's relatives who invested in the company and demanded their money back after it folded during the dot-com collapse.

She said the business was a "viable entity" that sought to incubate other companies to serve as Internet service providers.

Longview Woman Sentenced For Posing As Katrina Victim (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, November 1, 2006

A 29-year-old woman who posed as a Hurricane Katrina evacuee to collect $2,000 in federal aid received three years probation Tuesday.

Tomisha Embry, of Longview, must also pay back the money as restitution after being sentenced by U.S. District Judge Leonard Davis.

Embry claimed she had a New Orleans home damaged by Katrina and submitted an application to the Federal Emergency Management Agency for disaster assistance.

Last month, Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez said the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force has produced charges against more than 400 people in more than 30 federal judicial districts around the nation.

PUBLIC SAFETY | Women Guilty In Health-care Plan Fraud (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, November 1, 2006

Two women pleaded guilty in federal court Monday for their roles in a scheme to defraud an employee health-care plan. Sandra Rivers, 34, of Kansas City, and Delorise Jean Killiebrew, 49, of Independence, had been indicted in July with 11 others.

Killiebrew acknowledged that Cheri Smith, an employee of Health Midwest Comprehensive Care's claim department, persuaded her to cash nine checks totaling more than $33,000. She said she kept half and gave the rest to Smith. A total of $121,284 was fraudulently paid out between January and August 2002, according to the charges. Prosecutors alleged that Smith, 37, of Independence, organized the scheme. She pleaded guilty Oct. 10.

A fire that started on a couch forced the evacuation of a Kansas City high-rise apartment building Monday afternoon.

The blaze largely was contained to one room in a fifth-floor apartment at the Brush Creek Tower in the 1800 block of Cleaver II Boulevard, a fire department spokesman said.

The fire destroyed the couch, blistered the walls and blackened the ceiling. No one was injured.

Go to KansasCity.com for video of the fire.

KANSAS CITY | Probation given in marriage fraud case

A marriage fraud scheme netted a Kansas City woman a sentence of three years of federal probation Monday.

Joyce Porter, 44, pleaded guilty in August to concealing and failing to report the fraud.

Porter admitted she falsely told authorities that she lived with co-defendant Mohamed Elouerrassi, 54, a citizen of Morocco.

Elouerrassi also has pleaded guilty to falsifying statements on immigration applications. He was accorded status as a permanent resident of the United States in January 2000, based on his marriage to Porter, who is a U.S. citizen.

He has not yet been sentenced.

KANSAS CITY, Kan. | BPU employee burned in accident

The Kansas City, Kan., Board of Public Utilities was investigating the cause of a flash burn Friday that injured a longtime employee.

Spokeswoman Susan Allen said the employee, a lead electrician and a 33-year BPU veteran, was working on a breaker at the utility's Quindaro Power Plant when an electrical failure occurred.

Allen said the burns, though serious, were not life-threatening. The employee was in the intensive care unit at an area hospital.

KANSAS CITY, Kan.| Fire displaces 3 children, 2 adults

An electrical fire in a lower-level laundry room about 10:35 a.m. Monday caused damage of about $25,000 to a house in the 1200 Block of North 62nd Place.

The fire was confined to that room, but there was smoke damage to the entire house.

The fire displaced the home's residents because of the damage.

KANSAS CITY, Kan. | Park ranger threatened during robbery

A man called a "person of interest" in a quadruple murder earlier this month was one of three suspects arrested in connection with an armed robbery Monday morning at Seventh Street and Lowell Avenue.

A Wyandotte County park ranger interrupted the robbery, and at least one of the suspects pointed a gun at the ranger.

One suspect was arrested at the scene. The other two were arrested in the 3000 block of Indiana Avenue in Kansas City.

KANSAS CITY, Kan. | Victim remains in serious condition

A man in his 50s remained in serious condition Monday at an area hospital after being shot Sunday evening.

Police responded to a report of a shooting about 7:30 p.m. in the 300 block of South Eleventh Street.

Police had a person in custody who might have been involved in the incident.

Two Area Women Plead Guilty To Fraud (KCBIZ)

Kansas City Business Journal, November 1, 2006

Two women from Independence and Kansas City pleaded guilty in federal court to participating in a conspiracy to defraud Health Midwest's employee health care plan administrator of more than $120,000.

In a release Monday, Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, said that Delorise Jean Killiebrew, 49, of Independence, and Sandra Rivers, 34, of Kansas City, pleaded guilty in separate appearances before U.S. District Judge Howard Sachs to the charge contained in a July 18 federal indictment.

By pleading guilty, Killiebrew and Rivers admitted that they had participated in a health fraud conspiracy by cashing benefits checks from Health Midwest and Health Midwest Comprehensive Care that they knew they weren't entitled to receive, Schlozman said.

Prosecutors say Cheri Smith, 37, of Independence, devised the scheme to defraud a health care benefit program from Jan. 17 to Aug. 29, 2002.

Smith worked for Health Midwest Comprehensive Care (HMCC), a third-party administrator for the employee health care plan maintained by Health Midwest. Smith was a senior team leader in HMCC's claims department and was responsible for data entry of all pharmacy claims. She also was authorized to enter pharmacy claims data, change or modify account information and pay pharmacy claims.

Smith accessed the computer database containing the names of employees covered by the pharmacy benefits program and changed valid member names to those of her family members, friends and others who were neither Health Midwest employees nor entitled to receive benefits. Smith then entered false pharmacy claims for those bogus employees and caused checks to be issued to them. After cashing the checks, those in whose names the checks were fraudulently issued typically gave some of the proceeds back to Smith.

Killiebrew admitted that she had received nine checks for a total of $33,249 from the Pharmaceutical Insurance Reimbursement Account at Health Midwest and Health Midwest Comprehensive Care. She kept part of the proceeds of the checks and gave some to Smith.

Rivers admitted that she had learned about the health care fraud conspiracy from Killiebrew, a co-worker, and had agreed to accept checks in the summer of 2002. Rivers received two checks for a total of $5,516. After cashing each of the checks, Rivers kept $300 and gave the rest of the money to Killiebrew.

Killiebrew and Rivers are among six co-defendants who have pleaded guilty to their role in the health care fraud conspiracy.

Smith pleaded guilty to health care fraud on Oct. 10. Smith admitted that she made at least 36 fraudulent entries in the computer system responsible for paying pharmacy claims for Health Midwest employees.

Federal statutes stipulate that Smith could be subject to a sentence of as much as 10 years in federal prison without parole, plus a fine of as much as $250,000. Each of the other co-defendants could be subject to a sentence of as much as five years in federal prison without parole, plus a fine of as much as $250,000.

Sentencing hearings will be scheduled after the completion of presentence investigations by the U.S. Probation Office.

Executive Assistant U.S. Attorney Roseann Ketchmark is prosecuting the case, which the FBI investigated.

3rd Circuit Revives Case Against Asbestos Class Action Lawyers (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, November 1, 2006

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has revived a proposed class action suit against a group of lawyers from southern states brought by more than 2,600 former clients from northern states who say they were cheated out of their fair share of $4 00 million in asbestos personal injury settlements in the Mississippi state courts when the lawyers gave larger payouts to southern plaintiffs.

Reversing a lower court's decision that dismissed the suit, Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Jane R. Roth issued a stern lecture to lawyers about the duty of loyalty.

"We are embarrassed to have to explain a matter so elementary to the legal profession that it speaks for itself: All attorneys in a co-counsel relationship individually owe each and every client the duty of loyalty. For it to be otherwise is inconceivable," Roth wrote in Huber v. Taylor.

The case provides a rare glimpse into the high-stakes world of asbestos litigation in which plaintiffs are termed "inventory" and settlements often involve hundreds or even thousands of cases.

The plaintiffs in Huber v. Taylor are steelworkers from Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana who joined a massive Mississippi asbestos suit. The defendants are lawyers from Mississippi, North Carolina and Texas.

The suit, filed by attorneys Esther S. Trakinski and Irving Cohen of Cohen Pope in New York, alleges that the northern plaintiffs were never made aware of a complex series of agreements between and among the lawyers that, they say, ultimately led to their receiving smaller payouts than southern plaintiffs.

The northern plaintiffs had all retained lawyers in their home states -- referred to in the case as "local counsel" -- who had in turn struck deals with a Texas lawyer who served as co-counsel.

But when the lawyers struck a series of settlements worth more than $400 million, the northern plaintiffs claim that their share was reduced because the southern lawyers wanted to allocate a greater percentage of aggregate settlements to southerners in order to minimize the percentages paid to the northern plaintiffs' local counsel.

The suit alleges that, by cheating the northern plaintiffs of their fair share, the southern lawyers saved more than $10 million that would have been paid to their local counsel.

The stakes are even higher than that because the northern plaintiffs are seeking "disgorgement" of all the fees earned by the southern lawyers -- 40 percent of $400 million, or $160 million.

In the first round of the litigation, the plaintiffs suffered two major setbacks when U.S. District Judge Arthur Schwab of the Western District of Pennsylvania refused to certify the suit as a class action and later dismissed the entire case.

Finding no conflict among the laws of Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Schwab held that the plaintiffs could not prove their breach of fiduciary duty claims because they had no proof of "causation" or "actual injury."

Now the 3rd Circuit has ruled that Schwab erred by failing to apply Texas law that includes no such requirement.

But a dissenting judge said he would have upheld Schwab's dismissal of the suit on the grounds that the plaintiffs had waived their right to complain about the choice-of-law issue.

"In my view, plaintiffs' failure to brief and argue the choice of law issue before the district court and in their opening brief on appeal constitutes waiver of that issue," U.S. Circuit Judge Julio M. Fuentes wrote.

Roth disagreed, saying the plaintiffs had never waived the choice-of-law issue.

"The issue of which state's law to apply is inherent in the parties' positions throughout this case. Defendants claim that the law in all the relevant jurisdictions requires a showing of actual harm for breach of fiduciary duties, while plaintiffs assert that it does not when the remedy sought is disgorgement, citing to Texas law," Roth wrote.

Roth also found that, even if the plaintiffs had technically waived the issue, the exceptions to the waiver doctrine would apply because "plaintiffs' repeated and insistent citation to Texas law as providing the governing standard alerted this court to the choice-of-law issue."

A lengthy section of Roth's majority opinion is devoted to describing the complex relationships and fee agreements at the heart of the case.

Before that, Roth outlined the circumstances that made Mississippi an attractive venue for asbestos plaintiffs in the mid-1990s.

In 1995, a case captioned Cosey v. E.D. Bullard Co. was filed in Jefferson County, Miss., and over the next few years it grew to include several thousand plaintiffs due, Roth said, to Mississippi's "reputation as a plaintiff-friendly jurisdiction" and the state's "liberal joinder rules."

In 1998, a jury awarded $48.5 million to 12 of the Cosey plaintiffs with malignant asbestos-related diseases. The sole attorneys of record for all the Cosey plaintiffs were Mississippi lawyers Robert A. Pritchard and Christopher Fitzgerald.

Roth said the big verdict "prompted many companies with potential asbestos liability to explore settlements."

In May 1999, before any settlements were reached, Pritchard brought a second asbestos personal injury mass action in Mississippi state court in which the Huber plaintiffs were joined.

The northern plaintiffs joined the Mississippi suit through a co-counsel agreement their northern lawyers had struck with Texas attorney Robert G. Taylor II who had become involved in the Cosey case.

As Roth described it, Taylor's fee arrangements with the northern lawyers is key to understanding the claims.

According to the opinion, Taylor had contracted with the local counsel to serve as co-counsel for any future asbestos plaintiffs in exchange for Taylor's receiving about 95 percent of their fees if suit were brought outside of local counsel's home state, and a smaller amount if suit were brought in the home state.

Roth found that the arrangement meant that local counsel would find the work profitable only as "volume, rote work" since their percentage was so low, but that even such a small percentage was ultimately "a sizeable amount given the hundreds of millions of dollars of recoveries."

DOJ_NMG_0089353

Taylor also entered into "upstream co-counsel agreements" with Fitzgerald and Pritchard, who in turn entered into an upstream co-counsel agreement with Joseph B. Cox Jr. of North Carolina, to negotiate settlements, for which Cox would receive 4 percent of all gross settlements.

The Huber plaintiffs claim in the suit that they were never informed of the various co-counsel arrangements.

Taylor, Pritchard and Cox are the lead defendants named in the suit.

But lawyers defending the southern lawyers argued that none of the northern plaintiffs was cheated in any way.

The size of the settlement payouts, they said, was calculated on the basis of numerous factors including the level of injury and the home state of the claimants.

Although the northern plaintiffs were paid less than their co-plaintiffs from Mississippi and Texas, the defense also noted that the northerners nonetheless received larger settlements than similar asbestos plaintiffs from Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana usually receive in their home state courts.

The plaintiffs insist that their payouts were reduced to avoid paying fees to their local counsel.

But defense lawyers insisted that the settlements were not aggregate settlements that they then allocated as they saw fit. Instead, they said, the plaintiffs in the settled cases were presented with offers that varied for different individuals based on factors such as the type of injury or asbestos exposure, lifestyle habits like smoking, and geographic origin.

Geographic origin was an appropriate factor in determining settlement value, the defense lawyers said, because jury verdicts in northern states are traditionally lower than in southern states and because, in southern courts, jury verdicts for northerners are typically lower than for southerners in their home state.

But Roth found there was evidence that the settlements were, in fact, aggregate, and that the plaintiffs may have a valid claim under Texas law for breach of fiduciary duty that could entitle them to a disgorgement of the southern lawyers' fees.

At the heart of the claim, Roth found, is the duty of loyalty every lawyer has to every client.

That duty exists, Roth said, "even when clients are viewed as mere 'inventory.'"

"This is the cost of doing business as an attorney at law, and we will not countenance shortcuts," Roth wrote.

"Disclosures to clients must be meaningful, by which we mean something beyond form disclosures, as clients must understand a conflict to give their informed consent to an intelligible waiver. ... There is no question that defendant attorneys owed plaintiffs fiduciary duties," Roth wrote.

Taylor's lawyer, Howard M. Klein of Conrad O'Brien Gellman & Rohn, said he was "very disappointed" by the ruling and is studying the opinion with an eye toward seeking re-argument before the full 3rd Circuit.

Klein also said that Taylor and the other defendants "acted in compliance with their ethical and legal obligations."

Group Asks FTC To Probe Web Ads (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins

USA Today, November 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — A non-profit consumer advocacy group plans to ask federal regulators today to rein in the fast-growing $100 billion online marketing industry.

The Center for Digital Democracy is expected to file a Federal Trade Commission complaint asking the agency to investigate online advertisers. It also wants the FTC to force companies to halt what it calls deceptive practices and encourage Congress to pass legislation bolstering consumer privacy protection.

Executive Director Jeff Chester says hundreds of companies now track consumers online, gathering detailed dossiers about reading, spending and other habits that endanger personal privacy. Privacy policies published on websites don't adequately warn consumers, he says.

“The FTC has largely ignored the critical developments of the electronic marketplace that has placed the privacy of every American at risk,” a draft version of the complaint says. The complaint comes amid rising privacy concerns as billions of dollars in commerce shifts to the Internet and mobile devices, creating new global players such as search giant Google. And it comes a week before the FTC holds a three-day e-commerce conference that's “insufficient” to shield consumers, the center says.

The FTC declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0089354

The center, based in Washington, gets financial support from philanthropies including the Ford Foundation and the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation, Chester says. It's joined in its FTC filing by the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, another non-profit consumer advocate.

While the complaint says questionable online marketing practices are widespread, it wants the FTC to first examine Microsoft's adCenter service. Launched last year, it lets advertisers bid to have advertisements published next to online search results, similar to Google's better-known AdSense program.

Chester says adCenter endangers privacy because it relies on data gathered from the No. 1 software maker's widely used Hotmail e-mail service and other Microsoft products. "They have fully opened up the entire suite of Microsoft's very extensive properties to marketers," Chester says.

Microsoft disputed the center's allegations, saying it protects consumer privacy and is "very open" about its privacy policies.

Chester has been involved in high-profile privacy issues for some time. He co-founded the Center for Media Education, which filed an FTC complaint 10 years ago that helped spur passage of the Children's Online Privacy Protection Act of 1998, Chester says.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Many Eyes Will Watch The Polls (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Thousands of lawyers, election monitors and volunteers with video cameras will be mobilized on Election Day in an effort to guard against problems at the polls.

The Justice Department will dispatch more than 800 observers, a record for a non-presidential election year, to look for evidence of discrimination, intimidation and other obstacles to voter accessibility in at least 20 states.

The Democratic Party has a 50-state voter-protection effort and an estimated 7,000 lawyers at the ready. Liberal groups have set up hotlines for voters to call if they are denied the right to vote. And hundreds of people plan to film interviews at polling places where voters are being challenged that day.

Fueling the activity this year: dozens of close elections that could decide control of Congress and the potential for problems caused by electronic voting machines, statewide databases and identification requirements.

"There are going to be problems in every state," says Jon Greenbaum, director of the Voting Rights Project for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights. The group is part of a coalition that has a toll-free hotline and lawyers poised in 23 states.

Republican and conservative interest groups are keeping a lower profile. The Republican National Committee is relying on its state parties for poll monitors and lawyers. Groups such as the Republican National Lawyers Association lack the manpower to match the NAACP, Common Cause and People for the American Way.

"Folks can game the system, and that's a concern," says Thor Hearne, general counsel for the American Center for Voting Rights, a conservative group. He calls candidates and local parties "the first line of defense."

Justice Department monitors will be deployed next week, partly based on close races for Congress and where questions have been raised about the integrity of the election process. That could include Baltimore, Chicago, Cleveland and other places that encountered problems during primaries this year.

Prosecutors will be on standby in each federal district across the country to pursue possible fraud cases or other election-related criminal activity. "Everyone agrees that we want to make voting easier and fraud harder," says Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim.

The effort by some liberal groups begins today with a series of public-service announcements by actors such as Ben Affleck and Jodie Foster.

•A consortium led by Common Cause plans to track voters' problems on a database and publicize them. In 2004, it received 55,000 complaints.

DOJ_NMG_0089355

•The NAACP has hundreds of lawyers ready. "We're focusing more on how to redress problems when they occur," says the group's Dennis Hayes.

•Filmmaker Ian Inaba's volunteers hope to get aggrieved voters on the Internet via YouTube "while the polls are still open and the races are still alive."

Federal Observers And Monitors Heading To Polls (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Justice Department plans to dispatch more than 800 federal observers and monitors to 20 states to protect voting rights in potentially troubled polling locations, officials announced Tuesday.

That is a record number of federal officials watching polling stations in an off-year election.

"Yes, the anticipated closeness of races is one factor in our decisions about where we'll be sending people," said Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Wan Kim.

Kim said he would not identify until Monday the more than 65 cities and counties to which the observers will be sent.

The locations where federal observers will be stationed are selected because of past polling problems, an uneasy history among ethnically or racially diverse groups, or where fears and allegations of potential violations are asserted.

The Justice Department is reluctant to make public plans for elections observers. One official said that is because observers are viewed, in part, as frontline collectors of data that could be used to construct cases against local jurisdictions.

An influential non-governmental group, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, has asked the Justice Department to send monitors to seven locations in Alabama where black candidates are challenging white candidates. The organization also asked for monitors in Alaska where, it said, "the Native Alaskan community faces multiple barriers to voting access."

The group also called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to watch for problems at locations in Arizona, Louisiana, Montana, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Dakota and Virginia.

The group's concern in Virginia is centered on Chesterfield County, where in 2004 armed guards were placed at polls to "ward off terrorists." Would-be voters were incorrectly told while in line that they needed an identification card to vote.Focus on racial, ethnic hotspots

State voter-identification requirements are before courts in several states, where varying requirements are alleged by some groups to be unconstitutionally restrictive.

Justice officials say the election observers will focus on historic racial and ethnic hotspots, and also will watch for balloting access issues and assistance for non-English speakers and the disabled.

In addition, U.S. attorneys, the FBI and criminal fraud prosecutors from will be on standby in the event evidence of ballot stuffing or other voting fraud is found.

"The Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section has assigned attorneys to assist with potential election crimes," a Justice Department statement said.

Those officials will be on duty to field complaints from the time the polls open in the East until they close in the West, the department said. The criminal investigators and prosecutors will not be at the polling stations. Any investigations will take place after the elections.

Despite warnings by some computer scientists and interest groups of problems with voting machines, Justice Department officials charged with enforcing the Help America Vote Act of 2002 insisted Tuesday they do not anticipate widespread problems.

"Clearly, some states are moving along better than others," Kim said. "Those who waited too long to implement requirements are a bit behind the eight ball."

This year the Justice Department brought cases against New York, Maine, Alabama and New Jersey for violations, all of which have been resolved, Kim said.Sensitive mission

The hundreds of experienced monitors from the Justice Department and observers from the Office of Personnel Management heading to the polls are trained for a sensitive mission: wading into sometimes tense and strongly partisan surroundings under intense scrutiny.

More than 1,000 federal personnel were sent to monitor elections in 2004. Greater numbers are the norm in presidential election years, when voter turnout is higher, officials said.

The Justice Department officials acknowledge walking a tightrope. They want to make clear they will vigorously enforce federal voting laws but are equally determined not to intrude in a process run almost entirely by state officials.

The observers must represent an eagle-eye corps dedicated to protecting voters' rights while remaining virtually invisible and avoiding actions that could be viewed as heavy-handed or intimidating.

Civil rights authorities say the monitors quietly identify themselves to polling officials, which serves both to provide notice of a source of assistance should problems arise, as well as a not-so-subtle deterrent against raising obstacles to categories of minority voters protected by federal statutes.

"We want to send a strong message that we want fair elections," Gonzales told reporters Tuesday. "While our role is relatively small, it is an important role, and we intend to play it."

He said his department over the past year prosecuted more voting-rights cases than in any prior year.

During the past four years, the Justice Department charged 120 people with election fraud offenses, 86 of whom have been convicted of voter fraud.

Another approximately 200 investigations are open.

The nature of the cases has changed since the tumult of the early 1960s produced the Voting Rights Act of 1965. At the time, the vast majority of cases concerned the provision of ballot access to black voters in Southern states.

Since then, overt discrimination against minority voters has declined. However, more subtle forms of bias at the polls remains a concern in certain locations.

In one ongoing case in Mississippi, black elections officials have been sued for violating the voting rights of white voters.

In recent years, attention has shifted to providing unfettered ballot access and voting assistance to tribal and ethnic groups who are entitled to federal protections. Native Americans, Hispanics and Vietnamese voting groups have received the most federal help on Election Day because of incidents of alleged discrimination.

NAACP Plans To Monitor St. Landry Vote (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess, Advocate Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, November 1, 2006

OPELOUSAS — The NAACP plans to organize poll watchers in St. Landry Parish to monitor what's expected to be a tight race between a black woman interim sheriff and her white male challenger.

Interim Sheriff Laura Balthazar faces former State Police official Bobby Guidroz on Nov. 7 in a race to fill the seat of former Sheriff

Howard Zerangue Sr., who died in April while serving his seventh consecutive term of office.

Concerns of possible racial intimidation in the sheriff's election have also attracted the attention of the U.S. Justice Department, which monitored the parish's primary election on Sept. 30 and is expected to return next week.

The NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, working with local civil rights groups, hopes to assemble a team of 24 poll watchers to oversee the elections, said Kristen Clarke-Avery, assistant counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund.

Clarke-Avery said the group had 12 monitors for last month's elections.

"All of us are out there to see to it that everybody can exercise their constitutional right to vote," said Clifton Lemelle Sr., a retired educator from Eunice who is helping organize the poll watchers.

Lemelle said there were no confirmed reports of racial intimidation from the Sept. 30 election.

Federal monitors also reported no apparent violations.

Clarke-Avery said questions did arise over whether some residents were improperly denied the right to vote because they had no photo identification.

Louisiana law allows a registered voter to cast a ballot without photo identification if the voter fills out an affidavit attesting to his identify.

DOJ_NMG_0089357

"We received some reports of those affidavits not being offered," Clarke-Avery said.

Lemelle said there were also reports of candidates remaining too close to polling precincts.

State law prohibits campaigning within 600 feet of a polling place, and Lemelle said the mere presence of a candidate may also work to unduly sway some voters.

No Penalty For Voting Systems Lapse (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

The Justice Department isn't penalizing states that fail to upgrade voting systems by next week's elections, a requirement passed by Congress in 2002.

Federal efforts to combat election fraud and prevent voter intimidation on Nov. 7 are among the most rigorous ever, Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said Tuesday. He estimated 800 federal observers and monitors are headed next week to oversee elections in 20 states - selected in part because of close races there.

But prosecutors have not penalized states, or tried to hold them in contempt, if they failed to comply with the 2002 Help America Vote Act, Kim said. The law required states to plan for switching to electronic ballot machines and have a voter registration database up and working in time for the 2006 elections.

If states "miss a deadline, or if they don't do something by a certain time, then obviously we would first go back to the table and try to figure out why, and how we can fix the problem," Kim told reporters.

If a state still falls short, the Justice Department could go to court and seek a contempt order, which could carry penalties, Kim said. "But that's something we don't like to do. It means a problem's broken and we can't fix it easily."

Justice Department officials said it is unclear how many states have not fully updated their voting systems. The department has filed lawsuits against four states - Alabama, Maine, New Jersey and New York - and they have until sometime in 2007 to comply.

Other states are in varying degrees of compliance. They have escaped legal action because they have made good-faith efforts to meet the new standards.

But critics say the absence of electronic voting machines and outdated registration rolls can lead to major problems at the polls - and potentially skew election results.

States like New York and Connecticut, with a number of competitive elections that could decide which party controls the U.S. House, still use lever ballot machines that generally have a higher error rate than other machines, said George Washington University law professor Spencer Overton.

Lever ballot machines also can't be used by blind voters, and not all election jurisdictions have the required alternate handicapped-accessible voting systems available, Kim acknowledged.

"We could see machinery outcomes shape the direction of our country," said Overton, a commissioner on the 2005 Carter-Baker Commission on Federal Election Reform.

Kim said the Justice Department has been far more aggressive in targeting election law violations, filing 17 lawsuits this year alone against counties, states and other jurisdictions. On average over the last two decades, the department has sued eight or nine jurisdictions a year.

Republicans Challenge Voter Rolls In Westchester (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

YONKERS, Oct. 31 — Republicans are challenging the right of thousands of registered voters in the local State Senate district to cast ballots on Nov. 7, charging that these voters do not live at the addresses listed with the Westchester County Board of Elections.

The dispute set off a war of words between the district's longtime incumbent, State Senator Nicholas A. Spano, and his Democratic rival, Andrea Stewart-Cousins, whom Mr. Spano beat by just 18 votes in 2004, after a contentious recount that lasted three months.

John Ciampoli, a Republican lawyer who handled the recount for Mr. Spano two years ago, said he found the discrepancies after checking postal change-of-address cards against district's voting rolls. On Friday, Mr. Ciampoli submitted the challenges to the Board of Elections, questioning the validity of 5,929 voter registrations and asking the board to send police officers to voters' homes to find out if any of them had moved.

Ms. Stewart-Cousins, a six-term county legislator, held a flurry of news conferences criticizing the challenges. In an interview, she called the idea of using officers to verify addresses as "an attempt to intimidate voters before the voting even begins."

Mr. Ciampoli, who lives on the outskirts of Albany, said he filed the challenges on behalf of the state's Republican Party and the Westchester Republican Committee. In 2004, he successfully challenged hundreds of paper ballots most likely cast for Ms. Stewart-Cousins in the 35th State Senate district race.

Mr. Spano, for his part, said that he supported the current challenge, but had no part in devising it.

"This is a simple procedural request that is not targeting any ethnic group or any party, and we just want to make sure that there's no fraud," said Mr. Spano, who has served in the Legislature since 1986.

Ms. Stewart-Cousins's spokesman, Ted Lazarus, charged that most of the voters whose registrations are in dispute are Democrats and that many live in some of the city's poorest — and heavily minority — neighborhoods, a claim that could not be independently verified.

In 2004, scores of poor, minority voters complained that they felt intimidated by Republican poll-watchers, Ms. Stewart-Cousins said. With that in mind, her campaign asked the Justice Department, four days before the challenges were filed, to monitor poll sites on Election Day.

According to Mr. Ciampoli, the voters whose registrations are being challenged are a mix of Republican and Democrat, as well as independent and unaffiliated voters. "I have not excluded from the database people from any party, and there's no way for me to tell if they're black, Latino or what," he said.

Carolee C. Saunderland, a Republican commissioner at the county's Board of Elections, said that the process of verifying the challenged addresses could not be completed by Election Day. To check the addresses, first-class letters are mailed to each person on the list, and if they are returned as undeliverable, the police are sent to the address to check if the voter still lives there.

Suspects Accused In Voter Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ANA, Calif.-Twelve people have been charged with tricking voters in Orange County into registering as Republicans, prosecutors said Monday.

The defendants, ranging in age from 19 to 52, were accused of fraudulently registering 37 voters as Republicans between August 2005 and February 2006. Democrats, Green Party members and a noncitizen were registered as Republicans, prosecutors said.

The suspects were hired to register new Republicans by private firms paid by the Orange County Republican Party, prosecutors said. The recruiters worked for the firm Bader & Associates, as well as a subcontractor, John Burkett. Both have said they no longer work on voter registration drives.

No charges were filed against the companies or the Republican Party.

The recruiters visited shopping centers and college campuses and were paid $10 a head for newly registered Republicans in a district represented by U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat, prosecutors said.

Voters were asked to sign petitions for lower taxes or stricter sex offender laws, then tricked into signing voter registration cards, Orange County prosecutor Anthony Rackauckas said. Other information was filled in using voters' driver's licenses, he said.

County Democratic Party officials said they have filed more than 500 verified complaints of fraud in the drive.

The 12 defendants were charged with fraudulent completion of affidavit of registration, a felony. Five defendants remain at large. The maximum penalty for a conviction is three years in prison.

The charges are the latest voting controversy to roil Orange County. In a separate case, the campaign of Sanchez's Republican opponent, Tan Nguyen, has been linked to intimidating letters sent to registered voters with Hispanic last names.

U.S. Attorney, Nightclub To Settle Civil Rights Suit (MJS)

By Gina Barton

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 1, 2006

Eve's attorney denies discrimination against African-Americans

The federal government and the owner of a downtown Milwaukee nightclub have agreed to settle a civil rights suit in which the government accused the business of discriminating against African-Americans.

The suit, filed by U.S. Attorney Steven M. Biskupic in late 2005, said that Eve, a club at 718 N. Milwaukee St., has discriminated against African-Americans since at least 2002, according to court records. The suit accused the owner of the club, Tom Wackman, of refusing entry to black patrons on the basis of race. Wackman contended that he runs an exclusive club that turns prospective patrons away for a number of reasons, but not race.

The government contended that Eve gave "false or pretextual reasons" for denying black people entry, "such as inappropriate attire, exclusion due to a private party, or that Eve was already full, while similarly-situated white persons were admitted to Eve," according to a Department of Justice news release.

Eve did not admit wrongdoing and will not be sanctioned, according to Timothy Baldwin, attorney for Wackman.

"We'll continue to do business as in the past, and the government will watch and make sure we're doing exactly what we said, which is maintaining a high-end, limited-access nightclub," Baldwin said.

Wackman has contended that his goal was to run an exclusive club like those in Chicago and Los Angeles that grant or deny entry based on things such as clothing, attitude and fame.

Before the agreement becomes binding, the U.S. district judge assigned to the case, James T. Moody, must sign it. Attorneys for both sides filed a motion Tuesday in federal court in Milwaukee asking him to do so.

There was no indication in the court record of when the judge might sign the agreement.

According to the Justice Department, under the consent decree, the club must not discriminate on the basis of race and must do several other things, including:

• Post and enforce a non-discriminatory dress code policy.

• Implement a system for receiving and investigating discrimination complaints.

• Conduct monitoring to make sure that employees are following the law.

"We will aggressively pursue claims of racial discrimination," Biskupic said Tuesday.

A civil case on the same issue, filed by another black patron who was denied entry to the club, Jason Holloway, is pending.

Feds Decline Civil Rights Probe In Beard Death (LYNN&A)

By Ron Brown & Matt Busse

Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, November 1, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department says it lacks sufficient information to justify a civil rights investigation into the death of Clarence Lightfoot Beard Jr., who died Sept. 24 while in custody of Lynchburg police.

The department's decision was outlined in an Oct. 25 letter to L. Garnell Stamps, a local civil rights activist who requested the investigation.

Stamps wrote an Oct. 6 letter to the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division expressing his concerns about the circumstances surrounding Beard's death.

The matter is the focus of an ongoing investigation by the Virginia State Police and two separate investigations by the Lynchburg Police Department.

Meanwhile, city officials have refused to release public records about the incident, saying they are confidential because they deal with "personnel matters" or an "ongoing investigation."

The lack of a public record weighed heavily on the justice department's decision not to proceed with a civil rights investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0089360

"The information which you furnished is insufficient to permit us to determine the existence of a possible violation of federal criminal civil rights statutes," wrote Daniel Rosenholtz, a paralegal specialist for the Civil Rights Division's Criminal Section, to Stamps. "Therefore, we are unable to authorize investigation of your complaint at this time."

Beard, 46, died after police came to his apartment at the James Crossing apartment complex around 3 a.m.

Police said they heard an argument inside before knocking on the apartment's door. They had come to the apartment complex looking for a woman, who was wanted.

Police said Beard struck two of the officers as he struggled with them during his arrest. It is unclear what prompted the confrontation between Beard and police.

The city has refused to release dispatcher logs or 911 tapes relative to the night Beard died, although The News & Advance requested those records under the Virginia Freedom of Information Act.

City officials also have declined to confirm whether police in-car cameras recorded the activities surrounding Beard's death.

Rosenholtz said Stamps would have to provide the Justice Department with details of Beard's death before an investigation would be authorized.

"You should include the date of the incident; the sequence of events leading up to and including any assault by police officers; a description of the injuries Mr. Beard sustained, copies of medical reports, if possible; and the name of involved law enforcement officials and possible witnesses," Rosenholtz' letter said.

The city has refused to name the officers involved.

The two officers involved have since returned to desk duty within the department.

While an autopsy of Beard by the state medical examiner in Roanoke showed he suffered from advanced coronary artery disease, there were also two lumps on his head near the hairline, an abrasion on his forehead and a bruise on his temple.

The medical examiner said none of the injuries appeared lethal.

The medical examiner is awaiting results of toxicology tests, which could show if Beard had any drugs in his system.

A check of other 911 records shows police came to Beard's apartment one other time between March and Sept. 24, when Apartment No. 111 was occupied by Beard and his fiancée, Roxanne Brown.

On March 14, police followed Timothy Hunter Paige to the apartment and arrested him on charges in connection with a hit-and-run, according to a letter from City Attorney Walter Erwin in response to a Freedom of Information request.

Beard and Brown were at the apartment, according to Erwin's letter.

Brown was charged with disorderly conduct for behaving "in a manner that hampered the officers' ability to perform their duties," according to Erwin's letter.

She was later found not guilty of the charge.

The letter's description of the incident says nothing about Beard except that he was at the apartment at the time. It also said a bag of what appeared to be marijuana, whose ownership could not be determined, was in plain view in the apartment.

Stamps said early last month that witnesses at the scene on Sept. 24 said Beard was pepper sprayed by police and struck repeatedly with fists.

Stamps said he has cell phone pictures of blood on the wall of Beard's apartment.

"There is some evidence that we have seen that his head was slammed up against the wall," Stamps said.

Stamps has also said a 16-year-old girl witnessed the beating.

"She came out and begged them to stop," Stamps said.

Black Plaintiffs Had Attacked Miss. Voting Method For Judges (AP)

JACKSON, Miss. - The attorney for a group of black plaintiffs has withdrawn a federal complaint challenging how Mississippi will elect state circuit and chancery judges.

Attorney Carroll Rhodes of Hazlehurst, who filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in October, told Judge Henry T. Wingate that he was withdrawing the request after the Justice Department officially pre-cleared the election change Monday in a letter.

"Our complaint was that it should be submitted for pre-clearance," Rhodes said. "On Oct. 10, the state submitted it for pre-clearance and on Oct. 30, 2006, the attorney general tentatively gave pre-clearance."

Rhodes told Wingate the request shouldn't go forward.

In the pre-clearance letter, the Justice Department said that for the remainder of the 60-day period the office has to review the matter under the Voting Rights Act, information can be submitted that could result in changes to the pre-clearance.

Rhodes said plaintiffs were never seeking to stop or postpone the election. Rhodes said he wanted the judiciary races under the election law before it was rewritten by the Legislature in 2005.

He said the new law was to take effect Jan. 1, 2007, not for the Nov. 7 general election.

The lawsuit said that in six chancery court and nine circuit court districts, the opportunity for the election of black candidates has been harmed by the new law.

In those districts, the Legislature changed the election process from a "herd" system to a "post" system. The lawsuit had asked a federal panel to revert to the herd system for the Nov. 7 elections.

Under the herd system, all candidates run in a pack and the top vote getters win the available seats. The herd system was put in place in the late 1980s as part of a settlement of a lawsuit that also claimed the judicial election method diluted black voting strength.

Supporters argue the herd system can help blacks be elected because minorities can make their vote count more by voting only once, presumably for the black candidate.

In the post system, candidates choose the post for which they are running. Many incumbents like the post system because generally a challenger will opt not to run against an incumbent if there is an open spot to pursue.

Teen Shot By Police Stun Gun Dies (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - JERSEYVILLE, Ill.-A teenager carrying a Bible and shouting "I want Jesus" was shot twice with a police stun gun and later died at a St. Louis hospital, authorities said.

In a statement obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press, police in Jerseyville, about 40 miles north of St. Louis, said 17-year-old Roger Holyfield would not acknowledge officers who approached him and he continued yelling, "I want Jesus."

Police tried to calm the teen, but Holyfield became combative, according to the statement. Officers fired the stun gun at him after he ignored their warnings, then fired again when he continued struggling, police said.

Holyfield was flown to St. Louis' Cardinal Glennon Hospital after the confrontation Saturday; he died there Sunday, police said.

An autopsy was planned for Tuesday.

The statement expressed sympathy to Holyfield's family but said city and police officials would not discuss the matter further.

Calls Tuesday to Jerseyville Police Chief Brad Blackorby were not immediately returned. The department has been using stun guns for about five months, according to the statement.

In a report released in March, international human rights group Amnesty International said it had logged at least 156 deaths across the country in the previous five years related to police stun guns.

The rise in deaths accompanies a marked increase in the number of U.S. law enforcement agencies employing devices made by Taser International Inc. of Scottsdale, Ariz. About 1,000 of the nation's 18,000 police agencies used Tasers in 2001; more than 7,000 departments had them last year, according to a government study.

Police had used Tasers more than 70,000 times as of last year, Congress' Government Accountability Office said.

Amnesty International has urged police departments to suspend the use of Tasers pending more study. Taser International said the group's count was flawed and falsely linked deaths to Taser use when there has been no such official conclusion.

The city of St. Louis also drew unwanted attention for crime this week when it was named the most dangerous U.S. city by Morgan Quitno Press. The ranking looked only at crime within St. Louis city limits, not its metro area.

Discrimination Claim Might Be Viewed Again (INLVDB)

By Troy Anderson, Staff Writer

Inland Valley (CA) Daily Bulletin, November 1, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department might reopen an inquiry into a claim that the 2001 redistricting plan for the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors discriminates against Latinos, officials said Tuesday.

Latinos comprise 47 percent of the county's population but are represented by only one of the five supervisors.

Joaquin G. Avila, special counsel to the 1,070-member Los Angeles County Chicano Employees Association, recently provided the Justice Department with what he says is new evidence that indicates supervisors packed Latino voters into a single district when two districts could have been drawn.

First District Supervisor Gloria Molina, whose district includes Pomona, represents most of the county's Latino residents.

Avila's filing seeks the creation of two supervisorial districts with Latino majorities that would give the Latino community an opportunity to elect a second candidate to the Board of Supervisors, said Alan Clayton, director of equal employment opportunity at the LACCEA.

Eastern Los Angeles County is split among three supervisorial districts and no member of the Board of Supervisors lives there.

Scuffle With Deputies Results In Death (LAT)

By Nancy Wride

Authorities today are investigating the death of a Long Beach man after a confrontation with Los Angeles County sheriff's deputies Sunday night.

The 39-year-old man scuffled on a Lakewood corner with deputies who thought he had a handgun, according to the Sheriff's Department. What was thought to be a weapon turned out to be a cell phone, officials said.

The incident is being investigated by sheriff's homicide detectives and the Los Angeles County district attorney's office.

The name of the dead man was not released.

The incident began about 5:30 p.m. Sunday near the intersection of Paramount Boulevard and Flangel Street, a residential area just west of the Lakewood Country Club.

When two deputies "contacted the man," according to a statement by Sgt. Paul Patterson, "the man attempted to flee as he concealed an object which deputies believed was a handgun.

"A violent struggled ensued, which lasted for several minutes," according to the statement. "Throughout the struggle, the man kicked the deputies and resisted their every effort to control him. Once assisting units arrived, deputies were finally able to handcuff and restrain the man.

"At this time, it was discovered that the man was holding a cellular phone, not a handgun," the statement said.

The man was not breathing and had no pulse. Deputies and paramedics resuscitated the man, who was then taken to a hospital.

The man died at 7:40 p.m. Monday. The statement did not say where he died. The cause of death is under investigation by the Los Angeles County coroner.

The two deputies, who work out of the sheriff's substation in Lakewood, suffered moderate injuries and were treated and released from a hospital.

Mike Gennaco, chief attorney for the Sheriff's Department's Office of Independent Review, which examines events when department employees use force, said the unnamed man "had other encounters with the police and they had been violent."

Asked if there was any indication that the man suffered from mental illness, Gennaco said he had not been told that. He also noted that there were new legal limits about disclosing personal details.

He said that an autopsy today or Wednesday could help point homicide investigators in the direction to go.

There were several witnesses to the violent encounter, Gennaco added, and he had not yet reviewed all the officer and witness reports.

He said he thought the deputies "had made a gun arrest in that area the day before, and I think they were concerned [about the man].

"I think it was mostly instinct," Gennaco said. "When they had tried to conduct a consensual encounter, to ask some questions, he started reaching for his waistband. That's what's been conveyed to me."

Battle Over Abortion Focuses On South Dakota Vote (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — In the downtown headquarters of those opposing a ban on nearly all abortions in this state, there are notes from around the country taped up and down the hallway: "They need to butt out of women's lives" and "Why did S.D. vote for this?"

On the other side of town, in a warehouse decorated in pink, the supporters of the ban doggedly work a phone bank, in some cases young children playing nearby.

The battle here over a statewide ballot measure to install one of the country's strictest anti-abortion laws is playing out in television commercials, yard signs and Sunday sermons. It is also drawing the attention of national advocates on both sides of the abortion debate, who are watching the campaign with deep intensity and even fear.

Both sides predict that the outcome of the vote in South Dakota could send the country's broader debate over abortion rights swerving in new directions, and will set the tone for the fate of similarly strict laws being considered in nearly a dozen other states.

"I think there's some sense out there that — 'By golly, if they can do it there, we're going to do it here,' " said Nancy Keenan, the president of Naral Pro-Choice America, which opposes the South Dakota ban.

Daniel McConchie, the vice president of Americans United for Life, which favors passage of the measure, said a defeat at the polls on Nov. 7 could take the steam out of efforts to impose even less restrictive measures, like parental notification rules or waiting periods, that have been the focus of the anti-abortion movement in recent years.

"There's fear that legislators elsewhere would see what happened there and try to play it safer," Mr. McConchie said. "That would have a chilling effect on more incremental legislation in other places."

The South Dakota ban was passed by the Legislature in February but was pushed to a statewide vote by opponents. If the law survives, it would become a felony for a doctor in South Dakota to perform abortions except to prevent the death of the pregnant woman. The latest poll shows voters leaning against the ban, but its fate remains uncertain and both sides are now clearly searching to grab the last, undecided voters whose views on abortion may fall somewhere in the blurry middle.

For that, the most extreme arguments are nowhere to be found. No bloody fetuses fill billboards, no absolute claims are being offered about women's rights.

Instead, in calls from a phone bank at the ban opponents' headquarters, volunteers quietly tell potential voters that the law is just too narrow, failing to allow abortions in circumstances like rape or incest. The supporters of the ban, meanwhile, speak in gentle tones about how abortion hurts women.

"I refuse to show pictures of dead babies," said Leslee Unruh, who leads Vote Yes For Life, the group that is campaigning for the law, reflecting on methods used by anti-abortion groups. "That's what the old way was, and that's why they were losing all these years."

The messages may be muted to appeal to moderates, but the debate has nonetheless grown tense.

Local advocates on each side insist that they are drawing mainly on South Dakotans for help, while also insisting that the other side is getting significant help from wealthy, powerful, well-organized operations outside of the state.

The Rev. Jerry Falwell issued an Internet plea to his followers, calling on them in September to "counter the propaganda" Planned Parenthood would be promoting. And Cecile Richards, the president of Planned Parenthood, scoffed at Mr. Falwell's claims about how much money her group would spend, but acknowledged, "This is really on the top of everyone's mind."

Until the week beginning Oct. 29, the political groups have not been required by state rules to publicly disclose the amount or sources of their money since early summer. They were required to submit financial disclosures to the secretary of state's office with postmarks of Oct. 31.

[Neither report had arrived there Tuesday.

[The South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, which has led efforts to oppose the ban, said late Tuesday that the group raised more than $1.8 million (not including in-kind contributions) since late June, all but $160,000 of that from donors outside the state. Vote Yes For Life, which supports the ban, said it was still deciding whether to release some of its figures late Tuesday evening.]

Oregon and California have abortion measures on their ballots this year, both weighing parental notification laws, similar to provisions for parental notification or consent that exist in various forms in 34 states.

But because of its breadth and scope, South Dakota's measure has eclipsed the other two measures when it comes to national campaign efforts, which have included ambitious fund-raising drives and potluck suppers in 233 towns around the country.

South Dakota's abortion law was intentionally sweeping and was designed, as Gov. Mike Rounds has described it, as a "full frontal attack" on Roe v. Wade, the 1973 United States Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal.

If upheld by the voters, the law is also certain to draw a lawsuit from Planned Parenthood — which operates the only abortion clinic in the state, where about 800 abortions are performed a year — setting off the legal battle that the ban's authors had anticipated and wished for: the most direct challenge to Roe v. Wade in more than a decade. The ban, which could take effect as soon as the state's vote is certified, would probably be put on hold while the case makes its way through the courts.

In the continuing quest to sway wavering voters, the debate in recent days has centered on what the law says and does not say about exceptions — a question that seemed not to be in doubt for many months after state lawmakers passed the bill and Governor Rounds signed it in March.

A month earlier, legislators had voted down amendments that would have allowed abortions in cases of incest, rape or in instances when the pregnant woman's health would be jeopardized (though not fatally).

But supporters of the ban, including advocates on a television commercial that has been broadcast around the state, now say there are other exceptions written in the law.

In the commercial, as more than a dozen doctors — some of the scores of members of a group calling itself South Dakota Physicians for Life — stand together in white coats, stethoscopes draped around their necks, Dr. Mark Rector says: "This measure does provide exception for the life and health of the mother."

Asked about the commercial's assertions, the ban's supporters say the law includes "an exception" for the health of the mother because it would allow a doctor to treat a sick mother for her illness and, if treatment accidentally resulted in the death of a fetus, that would not be deemed a crime.

The ban also does not apply to the use of emergency contraception — the so-called "morning after pill" — in the first days after conception, a fact that ban supporters say amounts to "an exception" that would cover rape and incest cases.

[The new debate may reflect the polls, the latest of which found that 52 percent of those polled said they would vote against the ban, 42 percent for keeping it. Another 6 percent were undecided in the Mason-Dixon Polling & Research survey published in the Argus Leader of Sioux Falls on Sunday and the margin of error was plus or minus four percentage points.

[But the poll also found that 56 percent of those who opposed the ban or were undecided said they would support it if it carried a clear exception for rape and incest.]

In a recent interview, Roger Hunt, a state representative who sponsored the bill, said he and others were clarifying points that had always been part of the law. "Regardless of how we label these things or whether we use the phrase 'exceptions,' what we're saying is that there are these provisions to deal with such cases," Mr. Hunt said.

Opponents of the ban have filed complaints with local television stations over the commercial, saying supporters are trying to confuse undecided voters in the final days.

An Untimely Voter Purge (NYT)

One of the most deplorable political tactics — trying to suppress the votes of poor or minority citizens by raising the specter of voter fraud — is playing out this week in the city of Yonkers. Republican Party lawyers are calling for an 11th-hour purge of voter rolls in a clear effort to help their endangered state senator, Nicholas Spano.

Two years ago, Mr. Spano won a race against Andrea Stewart-Cousins, a Democratic Westchester County legislator, by 18 votes after months of courtroom wrangling and ballot-challenging. This year's rematch has been bitter, full of venomous ads and slung mud. Then last Friday, Republican lawyers filed challenges to nearly 6,000 voter registrations in the Senate district, charging discrepancies between county voter lists and change-of-address records compiled by the Postal Service.

There is a process for investigating an accusation of voter fraud. It involves sending a letter to an address in dispute, and possibly following up with a police inquiry. The Westchester County Board of Elections is doing that. But it has never had an outside party dump so many contested names so close to such a fiercely contested election.

The Republicans say they have only the purest motives. "It's in everyone's interest to put the election beyond the pale of fraud," said John Ciampoli, a lawyer for the county Republican Party.

Forgive us if we are unmoved by this freelance fit of pre-election rectitude. If the Republicans were sincere about tidying the voter rolls, they could have raised the alarm long ago. Instead they dropped a bomb at the last minute — a conjectural list of possibly problematic names that the Board of Elections has no hope of clearing up before Nov. 7. Efforts to purge voter rolls are notoriously prone to error and misuse, because of the innocent or inconsequential discrepancies that abound in voter records.

Whatever happens on Tuesday, this list must not be used to disenfranchise voters. People should go to the polls knowing they will not be intimidated or threatened for trying to vote.

Mr. Spano can make a credible case for re-election based on his record. It's regrettable that he belongs to a party that demonstrates an unseemly enthusiasm for keeping people from voting and for turning the exercise of democracy into a game won on technicalities. He should disavow this scheme, call off the lawyers and try to win an open, aboveboard election.

ANTITRUST:

Entercom To Sell 3 Radio Stations Due To Antitrust Concerns (AP)

By Deborah Yao, AP Business Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

PHILADELPHIA — The Justice Department said Tuesday it has suspended an antitrust investigation into Entercom Communications Corp.'s purchase of several New York radio stations because the company said it would sell three stations to comply with media ownership rules.

The Justice Department had been looking into Entercom's $262 million purchase of 15 radio stations from CBS Corp. in Austin, Texas; Cincinnati; Memphis, Tenn.; and Rochester, N.Y.

The investigation centered on Rochester, where Bala Cynwyd-based Entercom already owns four radio stations, one AM and three FM. The acquisition would hand over four more FM stations in the area.

With eight radio stations, Entercom would control more than 57 percent of the radio advertising market, and the Justice Department was investigating whether its dominant market share would lead to reduced competition and higher prices for radio advertising.

Federal Communications Commission's rules on local ownership would prohibit Entercom from owning more than five FM stations in an area, requiring it to sell two.

Entercom said it's planning to sell three stations — the CBS-owned WRMM-FM and WZNE-FM and Entercom's WFKL-FM — to comply with FCC rules. The stations are expected to be sold within three months to a buyer approved by the Justice Department, according to a news release issued by the department Tuesday.

After the sale, Entercom's share of Rochester's radio ad market would fall to 40 percent.

Entercom officials did not immediately return a call for comment Tuesday.

One of the nation's largest broadcasters, Entercom owns radio stations in 20 markets and posted annual revenue of $432.5 million. CBS, based in New York, owns and operates 179 radio stations in 40 markets nationwide, among other assets. Last year, it reported $14.5 billion in total revenue.

Shares of Entercom fell by 2.6 percent, or 75 cents, to close at $27.67 on Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange. CBS shares fell by 6 cents to end the day at $28.94 on the New York Stock Exchange.

R.R. Donnelley To Buy Banta In $1.3 Billion Deal (WSJ)

R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co. said late yesterday it has agreed to acquire Banta Corp., a Menasha, Wis., provider of printing and digital-imaging solutions, in a $1.3 billion deal.

The agreement comes as printing-services provider Cenveo Inc. said it has withdrawn its $50-a-share acquisition offer for Banta. Cenveo, Stamford, Conn., in August offered to buy rival Banta for $46 a share, or about $1.12 billion. Banta rejected the offer, opting instead to announce a restructuring that would cut as many as 500 jobs and close five printing plants.

In September, Cenveo sweetened its bid to $47 a share. Banta, in rejecting the bid, said its board authorized management to explore strategies for further maximizing shareholder value, including a possible sale of the company. Cenveo then raised its bid to $50 a share.

"I am disappointed [but not surprised] that Banta has not accepted or even entered into discussions with us regarding our proposal," said Cenveo Chief Executive Robert Burton Sr. in an open letter to Stephanie Streeter, Banta's CEO, before the Donnelley deal was announced.

The deal with Donnelley -- consisting of $36.50 a share after a special dividend of $16 a share already declared by Banta -- has been unanimously approved by both companies' boards and is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007.

R.R. Donnelley, a Chicago provider of print services, sees the acquisition adding to earnings in the first full year after the close of the deal, which remains subject to approval from regulators and shareholders.

Banta has annual revenue of about $1.5 billion, while Donnelley had 2005 sales of $8.43 billion.

Sony Targeted In Widening Justice Department Memory-chip Probe (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, AP Business Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

An obscure corner of the semiconductor industry became an international battleground Tuesday as Sony Corp. became the fifth company ensnared in a U.S. Department of Justice antitrust probe into the sales of a particular type of memory chip.

The same day, European Union regulators said they raided several unnamed semiconductor companies in Germany on Oct. 11 as part of a probe into possible price fixing for the same type of chip.

Both investigations center on the sale of static random access memory, or SRAM, a kind of computer memory found in relatively small quantities in PCs and used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear.

SRAM memory is faster and more reliable than dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, the most common type used in personal computers.

But it also can be more expensive for high-end corporate uses, and SRAM sales are shrinking as customers gravitate toward chips with integrated memory to save space and cut costs, said Mark DeVoss, a senior analyst with market researcher iSuppli Corp.

Worldwide SRAM sales totaled $2.8 billion in 2005, compared with DRAM sales the same year of about $24.8 billion, according to iSuppli.

DeVoss said he was puzzled by the widening probe, saying any pricing shenanigans would likely have little impact on consumers because of the small market size and relatively low selling prices for most types of SRAM, he said.

"Unless there's something really, really, really wrong, I think this is a tempest in a teapot," he said. "I don't think consumers are being affected that much, simply because the business is too small."

European regulators were explicit that the companies targeted in the cartel raid were suspected of breaking price-fixing laws.

However, the European Commission never names the companies suspected of operating a cartel and said that the surprise inspections were a preliminary step in its probe.

Under EU law, businesses found guilty of taking part in a cartel can be fined up to 10 percent of their annual revenue.

In Washington, Justice Department officials declined to discuss details of the probe. Spokeswoman Gina Talamona would only say that antitrust prosecutors are "investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the SRAM industry."

Sony said Tuesday it had received a subpoena from the Justice Department's antitrust division seeking information on its SRAM business, but it did not disclose details of the probe. The company said it would cooperate with investigators.

The company said it sold $27.7 million worth of SRAM in 2005. Outside companies make the product for Sony, which in turn sells the memory chips to other electronics makers.

Sony shares fell 57 cents, or 1.37 percent, to close at $40.98 Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Earlier this month, four other companies said they had been contacted by the Justice Department as part of the industrywide probe - San Jose-based Cypress Semiconductor Corp., and the U.S. units of Mitsubishi Electric Corp., Samsung Electronics Co. and Toshiba Corp.

The SRAM investigation comes amid a Justice Department probe of price-fixing among DRAM companies.

That probe has so far resulted in more than a dozen charges against individuals and more than $731 million in fines against Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

But unlike the DRAM probe, which examined practices with a direct impact on the bottom line for consumers, the SRAM probe may have been prompted by corporations concerned they were overcharged for the fastest memory used in high-end networking equipment, said Adrienne Downey, senior analyst with Semico Research Corp.

Downey said she expects more companies to get pulled into the investigation, but questioned whether the manpower employed in the investigation was warranted considering the small SRAM market size.

"They're really making a mountain out of a molehill," she said. "They're really looking for something that might not be a really big issue. If the price fixing is the real thing, they're doing it more for the spirit or the thought behind it."

Sony Discloses U.S. Antitrust Investigation Over Chips (NYT)

By Martin Fackler

TOKYO, Oct. 31 — Sony, the Japanese electronics giant, said on Tuesday that its electronics unit was under investigation by the United States Justice Department for possible antitrust violations, the latest problem for a company battered by battery recalls, product delays and plunging profits.

Sony said in a statement that it had received a subpoena from the Justice Department in what appeared to be part of a broader investigation into a type of memory chip called static random access memory, or SRAM. The chip is used in computers, disk drives and other devices like cellphones.

“Sony intends to cooperate fully with the D.O.J. in what appears to be an industrywide inquiry,” Sony’s statement said.

Sony is at least the fifth company whose SRAM business has come under investigation by American regulators. The Justice Department is also investigating Matsushita Electric and Toshiba of Japan, Samsung Electronics of South Korea and Cypress Semiconductor of San Jose, Calif.

An earlier investigation by the Justice Department into price fixing in the market for another type of memory chip, dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, led to $731 million in fines imposed on four companies and several individuals.

Sony's sales last year of SRAM chips totaled $28 million, a fraction of the company's $64 billion in global sales. The bigger potential damage will probably be to Sony's once-sterling reputation, which has already been tarnished by the recent recall of 9.6 million laptop batteries and delays to its widely awaited next-generation game console, PlayStation 3.

The recent problems have come just as Sony appeared headed to recovery under its first non-Japanese chief executive, Sir Howard Stringer.

Under Mr. Stringer, who took Sony's helm last year, the company had appeared to be bouncing back from blunders like losing the market in global portable music players to the iPod from Apple and being late to produce flat-panel televisions.

But the company has hit a series of new problems. The first were delays to PlayStation 3, which Sony badly needs to be a hit so that it can regain its image as an electronics innovator. The rollout of PlayStation 3, initially expected last summer, is now scheduled this month in Japan and the United States, and for March in Europe. Last August, Sony began a global recall of lithium-ion batteries after laptops overheated and in rare cases burst into flames.

The recall has so far cost Sony $429 million. Sony could also face additional costs from lawsuits. The recalls and PlayStation 3 development costs also led Sony to lower its net profit forecast for the current fiscal year, ending March 2007, by 38 percent to 80 billion yen, or $673 million.

Raids in Germany

BRUSSELS, Oct. 31 (AP) — European antitrust regulators said on Tuesday that they had carried out raids on several semiconductor makers in Germany this month.

The European Commission said it had reason to believe that the companies, which make static random access memory chips, had broken the organization's rules that prohibit price fixing.

The commission did not identify the companies suspected of operating a cartel.

EU Probes For Price Fixing In Computer Memory Market (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, November 1, 2006

Oct. 31 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators are investigating potential price-fixing of memory chips used in computers and mobile phones, working with U.S. authorities.

A Sony Corp. chip-making unit, Sony Electronics Inc., received a U.S. Justice Department subpoena seeking information about its business, the company said in a statement today. U.S. regulators are conducting a criminal price-fixing investigation into the market for static random-access memory chips.

The EU is probing makers of SRAM chips, coordinating with U.S. authorities. The commission conducted unannounced inspections at offices in Germany on Oct. 11 along with national antitrust officials, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said. He didn't identify the companies involved. The U.S. inquiry follows a three-year probe of price-fixing in the DRAM chip market.

``The commission has reason to believe that the companies concerned may have violated Article 81 of the EC Treaty, which prohibits practices such as price fixing," the European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, said in a statement today.

Samsung Electronics Co., Cypress Semiconductor Corp. and Micron Technology Inc., among the biggest makers of the chips, said Oct. 12 that the Justice Department had contacted them about SRAMs. In the probe of the dynamic random-access memory chip probe, the Justice Department has collected $731 million in criminal fines, including $300 million from Samsung.

Raids Denied

Qimonda AG, the memory chip unit of Germany's Infineon Technologies AG, said its offices weren't raided by EU officials, spokesman Ralph Heinrich said by telephone today. Qimonda was spun off on May 1 this year. It had net sales of 2.8 billion euros ($3.6 billion) in the year ended Sept. 30, 2005, according to Qimonda's Web site.

Spokesmen for San Jose, California-based Cypress and Boise, Idaho-based Micron both denied that their companies' European offices had been visited as part of the investigation there.

``I'm not aware of any kind of investigation by the European Union as of yet," said Daniel Francisco, a Micron spokesman, in an interview today. Matt Beevers, a Cypress spokesman, also denied that EU regulators had visited the company's offices in Germany.

Francisco reiterated that Micron is cooperating with the Justice Department probe. In its statement, Sony said the U.S. probe ``appears to be an industrywide inquiry."

Nicholas Babin, a spokeswoman for Sony Europe GmbH, said the company hadn't been raided in Germany.

Spokespeople for Suwon, South Korea-based Samsung didn't immediately return a phone message seeking comment. Samsung, the market leader in SRAM production, on Oct. 12 acknowledged receiving a Justice Department subpoena for SRAM data sales and marketing. Chris Goodhart, a spokeswoman, said the company is cooperating with U.S. authorities.

The 2006 worldwide market for SRAM chips was valued at $2.9 billion by iSuppli Corp., a market research company. The global market for DRAM chips is valued at about $30 billion.

Judge Fines Company For Bid-rigging (DURHER)

By Joe Hanel, Herald Denver Bureau

Durango (CO) Herald, November 1, 2006

Former head of Farmington office also pleaded guilty to charge

DENVER - A Tulsa company was fined $150,000 for rigging bids for the construction of BP natural-gas pipelines in Southwest Colorado.

Flint Energy Services received the sentence on Monday from U.S. District Court Judge Phillip Figa.

The company and the former head of its Farmington office, Kenneth L. Rains, pleaded guilty in August to conspiring with other unnamed people to defraud BP by submitting high bids for pipeline construction. Bid-rigging is a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Rains has been transferred to the company's Oklahoma headquarters, but he hasn't been fired. Figa questioned why not.

"Why does the company keep on someone who has committed a felony?" Figa asked.

Flint's attorney, Ryan Stoll, said the company isolated Rains from his old post but decided not to fire him because of "personal circumstances" that might become clear at Rains' sentencing in January. Stoll said he expects Rains to be sent to prison.

Flint and lawyers for the Justice Department's antitrust division had asked for a fine of $100,000, citing the prompt cooperation of Flint executives. Federal sentencing guidelines call for a fine of $161,000 to $322,000.

Figa said a $100,000 fine is "not significant enough to reflect the crime that has occurred here."

Flint already has paid restitution to BP.

Rains was in charge of the Farmington office, which has more than 200 employees. One of Rains' subordinates blew the whistle on the bid-rigging by informing BP and the government.

Carla Stern, a Justice Department attorney, said there's no evidence the conspiracy went any higher than Rains. She praised Flint executives for cooperating and speeding up the case.

Court documents hint at an ongoing investigation. Justice Department attorneys wrote that Flint has provided "extensive, credible information against both corporate and individual co-conspirators."

Aside from Flint and Rains, no other people or corporations have been charged.

AMD Wants To Force Intel To Divulge Documents For Antitrust Suit (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

Advanced Micro Devices Inc., the No. 2 computer chip maker behind Intel Corp., asked the court overseeing its antitrust lawsuit against Intel to force the company to produce documents related to its conduct outside of the United States.

The judge had previously ruled AMD cannot sue in the U.S. for Intel's alleged monopolistic tactics overseas.

But AMD argued in the motion filed Monday in a Delaware federal court that the order only applies to damages sought in the U.S. for Intel's alleged strong-arm tactics abroad. AMD maintains it should be allowed to use documentation of those actions to pursue domestic commerce claims.

Sunnyvale-based AMD, which filed its lawsuit in June 2005, accuses Santa Clara-based Intel of bullying major customers into exclusive deals and offering secret rebates to undercut AMD in the market for microprocessors, which act as the brains of computers.

The lawsuit alleges anticompetitive practices in several countries including Britain, Germany and Japan.

In September, U.S. District Judge Joseph J. Farnan Jr. dismissed a key portion of the lawsuit, ruling that AMD failed to prove that Intel's alleged tactics abroad had a direct effect on its operations in the U.S.

AMD argued in its latest motion that "evidence of Intel's foreign exclusionary conduct is directly relevant" to its claims of lost microprocessor sales to U.S. customers, and for lost sales of domestically made microprocessors to foreign customers.

Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy said the company disagreed with AMD's interpretation of the ruling and planned to file its reply in the coming weeks.

A trial date has been set for April 27, 2009.

Donnelley To Acquire Banta In $1.3B Deal (AP)

MENASHA, Wis. - R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co. will acquire Banta Corp. in a $1.3 billion deal combining two Midwestern printing firms with histories dating back more than a century, the companies announced Tuesday.

Chicago-based R.R. Donnelley, which prints the Yellow Pages, said the acquisition will allow it to expand its range of products and services for customers and also enhance its services in magazine, catalog and book printing and in direct marketing.

Donnelley also said in a press release that while it expected its 2006 earnings from continuing operations to be at the high end of earlier guidance of $2.45 to $2.50, anticipated restructuring charges made it impossible to estimate net income for the full year.

Banta, based in Menasha, Wis., has operations in Europe and Asia, in addition to the United States.

"Banta is an exceptional fit with R.R. Donnelley," said Mark A. Angelson, R.R. Donnelley chief executive officer, in a statement. "This combination will create immediate cross-selling opportunities with our blue-chip customers as well as offer substantial synergies in our procurement, manufacturing and services operations. "

The cash deal is valued at about $1.3 billion, or $36.50 per share after a special dividend of $16.00 per share already declared by Banta. The offer, equal to $52.50 per share, represents a premium of 18.6 percent over Banta's closing share price Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange of $44.28.

Banta said in September that it would declare a $16 per share special dividend payable in November.

The agreement, unanimously approved by boards of directors of both companies, is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007.

Earlier Tuesday, Cenveo Inc., which makes envelopes and provides digital printing services, said it had dropped its bid to acquire Banta for $1.21 billion.

Stephanie A. Streeter, Banta's chairwoman and CEO, said the result of the deal will be "a combined organization that creates new and exciting opportunities for our customers and employees moving forward.

"Together, the companies will offer enhanced capabilities and an increased array of options to our customers and I look forward to working closely with R.R. Donnelley's management to ensure a smooth transition."

Banta, with 1,585 employees in Wisconsin's Fox Valley and 8,000 worldwide, reported 2005 revenues of $1.54 billion. It produces books and other printed matter and also provides supply chain management services.

R.R. Donnelley has 47,000 employees worldwide and had 2005 revenues of $8.43 billion.

Stratex, Harris Deal Gets Antitrust OK (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. --Stratex Networks Inc., a maker of digital microwave radios used in wireless communications, said Tuesday the required waiting period for its merger into Harris Corp.'s microwave communications unit has ended.

The deal, announced in September, would give Harris a majority stake in the new company.

Melbourne, Fla.-based Harris, which sells communications products to government and commercial customers, will contribute its microwave division and $25 million in cash and get a 56 percent ownership stake in the combined company. Shareholders of Stratex will own 44 percent.

The waiting period was required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976.

The deal still requires approval by other regulators and Stratex shareholders.

Stratex shares closed down 3 cents at $4.67 on the Nasdaq. Shares of Harris closed up 78 cents at $42.60 on the New York Stock Exchange.

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-The music publishing industry reached a tentative deal with operators of the Kazaa file-sharing network over claims of copyright infringement, an industry group said.

Publishers pursuing a class-action suit against Kazaa informed U.S. District Court on Monday that the peer-to-peer network had agreed to pay "a substantial sum" under the agreement, the National Music Publishers' Association said in a statement.

The amount of the settlement was not disclosed. It is subject to final approval by the association board.

The settlement "will be another key milestone of the ongoing transformation of the digital music marketplace to one that will allow legal services to thrive," NMPA president and chief executive David Israelite said in the statement.

Phil Armstrong. a spokesman for Sharman Networks Ltd., which owns and distributes Kazaa, said he was not familiar with the lawsuit and declined to comment.

Sharman Networks announced in July that it had settled copyright infringement lawsuits with music labels and movie studios, agreeing to redesign its software to block customers from downloading protected music and movies and to pay more than $115 million (â,¬90.6 million) in penalties.

The agreements are among a wave of legal settlements between file-sharing networks and the entertainment industry since the Supreme Court ruled last year that technology companies caught encouraging customers to steal music and movies over the Internet could be sued.

Last month, a federal judge ruled against StreamCast Inc., the distributor of the Morpheus online file-sharing software, finding the firm encouraged computer users to share music, movies and other copyright works without permission.

Major Commercial Real Estate Firms Merge (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth

CB Richard Ellis Group Inc., the world's largest commercial real estate broker and one of the most prominent real estate firms in Washington, agreed yesterday to buy rival Trammell Crow Co. in a deal worth $2.2 billion that will more than double its property management business.

Although neither company is based here, both are considered major local players. CB Richard Ellis, which manages 22 million square feet of space in the Washington area, is handling the leasing of one of the Watergate office buildings and has done leasing for Northrop Grumman Corp., Verizon Communications Inc. and General Dynamics Corp.

Trammell Crow is turning Columbia Hospital for Women in the District into a retail and residential building. It builds, buys and sells properties, and manages buildings and oversees refurbishing for customers such as Ford Motor Co., American Express Co., Bank of America Corp. and Exxon Mobil Corp.

The deal is one of several mergers that have occurred in the past few years as clients seek more efficient ways of buying, selling and leasing office space, industry experts said. Jones Lang LaSalle Inc. of Chicago recently acquired Spaulding & Slye Colliers of Boston. Three years ago, CB Richard Ellis paid $415 million for Insignia Financial Group Inc. of New York.

Yesterday's deal combines CB Richard Ellis's global operations in leasing space and buying and selling office buildings with Trammell Crow's corporate services, development and project management experience, company executives and real estate experts said.

CB Richard Ellis, based in El Segundo, Calif., is buying Dallas-based Trammell Crow for $49.51 per share in cash. The deal is expected to close by the end of the year. CB Richard Ellis stock closed up $1.81 yesterday, at $30.03; Trammell Crow closed up $9.65, at $48.75.

A Trammell Crow division that builds office buildings will keep its name and be run as a separate subsidiary; all of its development projects will proceed. Executives said it is too early to know if either company will move its local offices or if there will be layoffs.

"It means we're joining two significant real estate firms and combining them into one better organization both locally and nationally," said John Germano, senior managing director in the Washington office of CB Richard Ellis. "You're going to get a company that has more service lines and an unprecedented level of talent," he said. "There will be very little cannibalization, very little overlap."

CB Richard Ellis has 14,500 employees worldwide in 200 offices and revenue of nearly $3 billion. It has 300 employees locally.

It dwarfs Trammell Crow, which has 6,700 employees in 71 offices nationally and revenue of $896 million. Trammell Crow has a large local presence, however, managing 27 million square feet of space with 470 employees in the mid-Atlantic region, which stretches from Richmond to Baltimore. Figures were not available last night for the Washington area alone.

"We bring project management and property management," said Joseph A. Callanan, Northeast regional director for Trammell Crow. "When you put that with CB's global reach and their strong brokerage platform, that combined provides a seamless set of services that's not been seen in the industry.

"If you're a small company in Bethesda and you need space in London, we can now find the space and do the project management," he said. "Or if you're a bigger company and have large campuses, we can acquire a property for you, build a building, do the interior construction, manage it and maintain it."

Local real estate industry executives saw the deal as a logical move.

"CB has always been looking to expand their services, and they saw the development arm of Trammell Crow as something they didn't really have," said Scott Johnston, a senior vice president at Jones Lang LaSalle. "From Trammell Crow's side, they didn't have a strong global platform, so that's what each is getting from the other."

Chief executive Bob Pinkard of the real estate service firm Cassidy & Pinkard Inc., said: "CB's stock has done very well in the last few years because they've shown they have the capacity to grow, but the problem becomes that when you get as large as they are, you can't grow by simply adding a few brokers here and there. You have to acquire other companies."

Others suggested it could be difficult for the combined company to sort out the interests of competing tenants and landlords.

"I'm quite sure they have a strategy that will make the Trammell Crow acquisition a success," said Ray Ritchey, executive vice president at Boston Properties Inc. who worked at CB Richard Ellis as a broker in the late 1970s. "We have an expression here that bigger is not always better. Better is better. It's going to be interesting to see how they'll make that transition."

CB Richard Ellis Buys Trammell Crow Deal Valued At $1.79 Billion Will Hasten Consolidation, Boost Corporate Services (WSJ)

By Ryan Chittum

CB Richard Ellis Group Inc. agreed to buy Trammell Crow Co. for $1.79 billion, in a deal that further cements CB Richard Ellis's position as the biggest player in the booming business of helping companies handle their real estate.

The deal, by far the biggest in the commercial real-estate services sector, hastens consolidation that began in earnest a decade ago and has transformed what were once regional businesses focused on lease and sales brokerage into a handful of multiservice behemoths catering to multinational corporations increasingly looking to outsource their global real-estate functions.

Los Angeles-based CB Richard Ellis would gain a more robust presence in the corporate-services outsourcing market, in which Trammell Crow is an industry leader, along with bigger positions in facilities and project management. "We believe Trammell Crow is best in class in that area," CB Richard Ellis Chief Executive Brett White said in an interview. "They were doing, frankly, a better job than we were."

CB Richard Ellis will keep the Trammell Crow brand name and operate the development business as an independent subsidiary -- acknowledgement of the long and colorful role of the Dallas-based company, which retired Texas entrepreneur Trammell Crow built into one of the nation's largest real-estate developers during the 1980s.

The deal, expected to close late this year or early in 2007, would diversify CB Richard Ellis's revenue and income, which are susceptible to volatile cyclical swings. About 78% of the company's revenue comes from transactions; with Trammell Crow, that number would fall to 68%, according to Mr. White.

CB Richard Ellis would pay $49.51 a share for Trammell Crow, a number JMP Securities analyst Will Marks called "a great deal for Trammell shareholders." The offer represents a 27% premium over Trammell Crow's Monday close. Yesterday, Trammell Crow shares soared 25% while CB Richard Ellis shares jumped 6.4% in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Including debt and transaction costs, the deal's value comes to $2.2 billion.

Much of the industry's consolidation has been driven by geographic considerations, including the last major deal in 2003 when CB Richard Ellis swallowed Insignia/ESG to boost its New York presence. This deal is different for CB Richard Ellis, which would get a boost in its corporate services and facilities and property management capabilities, but would receive little or no benefit from geographic expansion. Trammell Crow, though, will be able to capitalize on its parent company's global reach. "Trammell Crow was well aware that they needed to get an international presence in order to maintain their competitiveness," said Michele Flynn, president of Expense Management Solutions Inc., a Boston-based firm that advises companies on outsourcing services.

Ms. Flynn said the combined company would be better able to go head to head with Chicago-based Jones Lang LaSalle Inc., the leader in the corporate-services area.

The two companies will have redundancies that could lead to a loss of brokers and revenue in some markets, said Jeffrey Finn, president and chief operating officer of NAI Global Inc., a Princeton, N.J.-based competitor. Barry M. Gosin, CEO of New York-based Newmark Knight Frank, another competitor in commercial real-estate services, added that the move would be good for his firm and others. "There's one less company in the beauty contest."

Trammell Crow dates back to 1948, when Mr. Crow built his first commercial development, a warehouse near downtown Dallas. Making deals on a handshake, Mr. Crow soon became the largest builder in Dallas's Trinity Industrial District. By the late 1950s, he was making his mark across the burgeoning Sunbelt city, developing the Dallas Market Center and the Dallas Apparel Mart.

Trammell Crow established its first offices outside Texas in 1968 in San Francisco, developing Embarcadero Center there and later other signature projects such as Atlanta's Peachtree Center. By the early 1980s, it was one of the nation's largest real-estate developers, focusing on office and industrial property and shopping centers.

After the oil bust coupled with the savings and loan crisis dealt the Texas developers a heavy blow, Trammell Crow responded in part by diversifying into real-estate services. Trammell Crow CEO Robert Sulentic said in an interview that the new company will benefit even more from its "global footprint and sheer scope of services."

Mr. Crow's daughter, Lucy Billingsley, said she was pleased the Trammell Crow name will live on. "That's where his heart lies," she said of her father, now 92 years old.

Google Buys JotSpot To Expand Online Document-Sharing Service By KEVIN J. DELANEY (WSJ)

Google Inc. said it acquired closely held start-up JotSpot for an undisclosed sum, a move that could strengthen Google's expanding services for users to create and share documents online.

JotSpot, exploiting a technology called wikis, provides free and paid services that allow individuals to jointly work on Web-based information such as spreadsheets, photo albums, calendars and contact lists. Google, Mountain View, Calif., has assembled free online word-processing, spreadsheet, email and calendar services that have some similarities with JotSpot's offerings. Such services could win away some of the consumers Microsoft Corp. is targeting with its Office software.

JotSpot Chief Executive Joe Kraus said his company was happy to join Google because "it's really clear they are focusing on letting people collaborate and share and work together online." Google executives are also trying to streamline the number of products the company has, and Mr. Kraus said JotSpot would focus on how to integrate with Google's existing services.

JotSpot, Palo Alto, Calif., has about 30,000 paying corporate customers at about 2,000 companies. Roughly 300,000 people use JotSpot's free service, which carries some storage and other restrictions. The company, which received funding from the Mayfield Fund and Redpoint Ventures venture-capital firms, has 27 employees.

Colo. City To Vote On 'carbon Tax' (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, November 1, 2006

DENVER — Voters in Boulder, Colo., will decide Tuesday whether the city will become the first in the nation to impose a "carbon tax" on homeowners and businesses to fund efforts to reduce emissions that cause global warming.

If approved, the ballot measure would tax electricity usage and add about $16-$20 a year to the average residential electric bill. Businesses would pay an additional $46 a year on average, and industries an extra $3,226, according to Yael Gichon of Boulder's environmental affairs office. The tax could raise $860,000 in the first year.

Gichon and Matt Baker, director of Environment Colorado, a Denver-based environmental group, say that if the measure passes, it will mark the first time a U.S. city has voted in favor of a carbon tax to combat global warming.

The levy is called a carbon tax because most electricity in the USA is produced by burning coal and natural gas, which emit carbon dioxide that contributes to global warming.

Climate Smart, a local group that supports the tax, estimates the average monthly residential electric bill of $63 would increase $1.38, or 2.2%. A medium-size office building would rise $33, or 0.6%.

Boulder, one of the state's most liberal communities, has a long history of environmental activism, such as preserving open space, recycling and encouraging use of public transit. The town of about 92,000 residents is home to the University of Colorado and the National Center for Atmospheric Research. "We have probably more climate scientists living in Boulder than any other city in the world," Mayor Mark Ruzzin says.

The City Council authorized the ballot measure to fund a city plan to reduce greenhouse emissions 7% below 1990 levels. To accomplish that, Boulder would have to cut emissions 24% by 2012. About half of the city's emissions are attributed to burning fossil fuels for electricity.

Four years ago, the city adopted emission targets set by the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement the United States has not ratified, to reduce greenhouse gases such as carbon dioxide.

"There is a strong environmental ethic in Boulder," Ruzzin says. "People are looking to do the right thing, and the climate action plan gets us down that road."

No group has organized in the city to oppose the tax measure, and even the Boulder Chamber of Commerce has endorsed it. Climate Smart expects to spend about $8,000 on yard signs and "a few newspaper ads," volunteer Ken Regelson says.

Gichon says the tax would fund efforts to increase energy efficiency, spur the use of renewable energy such as wind and solar power, and encourage residents to drive less. The tax also would fund city-sponsored energy audits for residences, and educational programs on utility-sponsored rebates for installing energy-efficient appliances, light fixtures and insulation.

Many states have mandated special charges on electric bills to fund energy-efficiency and renewable-energy programs. And some city-owned utilities, including Fort Collins, Colo., have raised rates to pay for renewable-energy programs.

Big Ethanol (WSJ)

By HOLMAN W. JENKINS, JR.

DOJ_NMG_0089375

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

There'd likely be no alternative energy proposition on the California ballot if one guy, Stephen Bing, hadn't put up $50 million to place it there.

The media is kind to call Mr. Bing a "movie producer"; his fortune was inherited from his grandfather and his dabbling in the film business has been desultory. His misadventures with starlets and models have proved a more lasting claim to notoriety. In fact, he has little record of sustained commitment to anything, which perhaps explains the economic incoherence of the ballot proposal.

You would never say the same about his most visible ally, Vinod Khosla, a highly reputable Silicon Valley venture capitalist, a founder of Sun Microsystems, and now an avid investor in ethanol ventures. Mr. Khosla says what grabs the public's attention is not "facts" but "stories," and he has lustily lent his voice to telling stories about gouging oil companies, the urgent need for energy independence, and other media-ready tropes useful in selling the proposition to California voters.

Under Prop. 87, as the measure is called, California-produced oil would be taxed to fund alternative energy projects. By making domestic energy more expensive, it would increase, not decrease, the clout of foreign suppliers. But never mind. It also includes an absurd and unenforceable mandate that the cost of the tax not be reflected in the price of gasoline.

Let's begin by noticing that there's been no shortage of capital for alternative energy ventures. By one count, 140 ethanol plants are in the works around the world. Everyone from Goldman Sachs and Warren Buffett to Monsanto and the Carlyle Group has been jumping in.

Nor is there an obvious call for government planners to help investors sort out the winning technologies. Even amid the ethanol frenzy, BP and DuPont are placing a contrarian bet on butanol, another crop-derived fuel, with higher energy content and better compatibility with the gasoline distribution system.

But here's where you should really start paying attention. Virtually everyone agrees an ethanol glut is coming as the new plants come online. This year's boom was sparked by a sudden shift in federal policy and a short-lived gasoline spike. The price of ethanol is expected to fall dramatically.

When he's not stumping for the California initiative, Mr. Khosla has been in Washington proselytizing for a package of subsidies and mandates to prop up the ethanol industry, one of which is a "cheap oil tax" to kick in whenever the price of oil sinks below $40 a barrel. A slide show he gave so enthralled Nancy Pelosi that she had him repeat it for her Democratic colleagues.

One "story" Mr. Khosla enjoys telling at these events is of an oil executive supposedly confiding the industry's plan to push down the price of oil to drive the ethanol industry under. Mr. Khosla is an economic sophisticate. He knows oil's price will go to whatever level is required for the commodity to sell. He also knows that the same technological progress being applied to turn crop material into automotive fuel is also working to turn the world's still-large inventory of stored hydrocarbons into automotive fuel.

The "stone age didn't end for lack of stones," he told TV interviewer Charlie Rose. His stated view, probably well founded, is that gasoline will have no long-term difficulty defending its place in the transportation market on price.

His real concern, to the extent that he has offered a coherent one, is global warming. Now this at least could be the subject of an intelligent debate -- about whether climate concerns justify putting a heavy government finger on the scale to help biofuel investors in their competition with gasoline. But the public would have to be told that part of the plan is higher gas prices.

Voters would then be expected to inquire into the costs and benefits of such a shift. They might notice that U.S. transportation represents just 8% of the world's carbon output. They might notice that even if the whole world joined us on the automotive biofuel bandwagon, this would merely slow, not halt, the buildup of CO_2 in the atmosphere.

And even if the rest of the world could be persuaded to foreswear a commodity as useful as oil, how long would this change take under democratic institutions? Over the relevant period, we might not gain a significantly better understanding of carbon's role in climate change, but we would have witnessed whether the climate has changed. Voters, if they then decided the problem calls for a solution, would certainly wish to spend their bucks on something with greater bang -- say, carbon capture and sequestration, or attacking coal use, or projects to influence the earth's temperature directly.

Mr. Khosla may be right that stories rather than facts are what sway voters, but it leaves open the question of what he really believes. Or maybe it doesn't matter. The California proposition is expected to lose handily, but for his modest contribution (a reported $1 million), Mr. Khosla has reaped an untold bonanza of propaganda for his energy investments.

Already Congress is hurriedly putting together an expansion of the ethanol mandate in last year's energy bill in hopes of soaking up the excess supply stimulated by previous government actions. Earth's atmosphere might not notice the difference, but Mr. Khosla's portfolio certainly will.

Police Arrest Man For Other Blazes As Fifth Ca. Firefighter Dies (AP)

By Andrew Glazer

AP, November 1, 2006

BEAUMONT, Calif. - Authorities on Tuesday arrested a 37-year-old man suspected of igniting two wildfires this summer and who is considered a "person of interest" in the Esperanza blaze, which killed five firefighters.

Word of the arrest came an hour after a somber news conference at which officials announced the death of a horribly burned firefighter who survived five days on life support.

Raymond Lee Oyler of Beaumont was arrested at 3 p.m. on two counts of arson related to wildfires in June, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said in a statement posted on its Web site late Tuesday. Oyler was not named as a suspect in the Esperanza wildfire, which roared across more than 60 square miles last week before being contained Monday.

Four U.S. Forest Service firefighters died shortly after the blaze began Thursday when flames overran them as they tried to protect a home in the San Jacinto Mountains of Riverside County, about 90 miles east of Los Angeles.

Investigators interviewed Oyler on Friday and then searched his home Monday, the sheriff's department said. Federal agents have been assisting in the investigation. A spokesman offered no further details.

Firefighter Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley died at 5:08 p.m. at Arrowhead Regional Medical Center in Colton, after his family decided to take him off life support.

The fifth death made it the greatest loss of firefighters in a single incident while battling a wildfire since 14 were killed in July 1994 during a blaze known as the South Canyon or Storm King Mountain Fire near Glenwood Springs, Colo., according to the National Interagency Fire Center statistics.

"He was a great fighter," said Dr. Dev Gnanadev, who spoke to reporters outside the hospital. "In the end we did talk to the family and gave them an option of taking him to the operating room again for further surgeries knowing his prognosis is very very poor and they decided to let Pablo go."

A group of U.S. Forest Service firefighters attended the evening news conference, with tears in their eyes.

"I felt the faith and hope for Pablo's recovery and actually felt a miracle might be possible," said Jeanne Wade Evans, the San Bernardino National Forest supervisor. "Today more sadness is added to our almost unbearable grief."

Cerda was burned over 90 percent of his body. Three other members of Engine 57 died at the scene, and Cerda's captain died soon after at a hospital.

Cerda was in just his second year of fighting fires for the Forest Service. He had planned to begin studying to become a paramedic.

The other victims were the engine captain, Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; Jason McKay, 27, of Apple Valley; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

"All of us from the forest and all those from the fire service deeply mourn the loss of these brave men. In my mind there's no greater calling than to help those in need," Evans said.

As part of the investigation, authorities said they sifted through hundreds of tips and interviewed previously convicted arsonists who live in the Cabazon area. Assisting in the investigation were the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The reward for information leading to an arrest had topped $500,000.

The blaze started early Thursday and scorched 40,200 acres, or more than 60 square miles, of forest and brush before being fully contained Monday. It destroyed 34 homes and 20 outbuildings. A portion of Highway 243 in the fire area remained under indefinite closure for repair of the two-lane road.

Firefighting costs reached $9.9 million, the California Department of Forestry said.

Authorities said the fire was deliberately set at the base of a slope in Cabazon, west of Palm Springs, as fierce Santa Ana winds hit Southern California. Residents said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire began.

At the crime scene, investigators had planted blue, red and yellow flags attached to wire stakes in the ground to mark the location of possible evidence. Part of the hillside was marked by a grid made of pegs and string.

A public memorial service for the dead firefighters was scheduled for 1 p.m. Sunday at the Hyundai Pavilion in Devore. Individual firefighter funerals will be private, officials said.

Fifth Firefighter Dies Of Burns (LAT)

By Maeve Reston, Sara Lin And Jonathan Abrams, Times Staff Writers

Pablo Cerda was the last of the crew overrun in the Esperanza fire. A Beaumont man is held as 'a person of interest.'

Hours after firefighter Pablo Cerda on Tuesday became the fifth and final member of a U.S. Forest Service crew to die after they were overrun by an out-of-control wildfire near Palm Springs, authorities said they arrested a suspect in connection with previous blazes in the San Gorgonio Pass area, and named him a "person of interest" in last week's deadly fire.

Cerda, 23, fought to survive for six days at Arrowhead Regional Medical Center in Colton before succumbing at 5:08 p.m. to burns over 90% of his body. He lived in Fountain Valley, where he cared for his father, and was in his second season with the Forest Service.

"Today more sadness is added to our almost unbearable grief in the hearts of the Forest Service and all the fire service community," Jeanne Wade-Evans, San Bernardino National Forest supervisor, said Tuesday night.

Investigators continued working with more than 300 tips called in to an arson hotline since the fire began early Thursday.

Authorities said they had questioned several people about the cause of the deadly Riverside County wildfire, known as the Esperanza fire, and that they had identified at least "two persons of interest."

Authorities disclosed the name of only one: Raymond Lee Oyler, 37, a Beaumont resident, who was arrested at 3 p.m. Tuesday by the Riverside County Sheriff's Department on two counts of arson in connection with wildfires in June in the San Gorgonio Pass area.

In a terse news release issued Tuesday night, sheriff's officials said they interviewed Oyler on Friday and served a search warrant on his home Monday.

A sheriff's spokesman said no other information would be released Tuesday.

Although authorities didn't indicate which fires Oyler was charged with setting, Riverside and San Bernardino counties were hit with a rash of more than 40 small, suspicious fires in May and the first half of June. One such fire in mid-June broke out in Cabazon, burning 10 acres near the intersection of Esperanza Avenue and Broadway, not far from the Esperanza blaze.

Oyler could not be reached for comment.

The current, wind-fed Esperanza wildfire raced through the dry foothills, killing five firefighters and charring more than 40,000 acres at the base of the San Jacinto Mountains before being contained Monday. The blaze destroyed 34 homes.

A Cabazon man who lives a quarter-mile from where the fire began told The Times on Tuesday that authorities had questioned him, but that he was "100% innocent."

William "Billy" Hutson, 28, said that during questioning Monday, investigators accused him of setting the fire. Police also have searched his home, confiscating his computer, he said.

Hutson served jail time in Texas for a 1998 arson conviction for burning a neighbor's mobile home, according to records from the Texas Department of Public Safety and a spokesman for the Vidor, Texas, Police Department.

"I was young and stupid," Hutson said in an interview at a restaurant near his house. "I was a kid. I was young. Every kid likes to see the fire. I messed up — yeah — and I've paid my debt to society."

DOJ_NMG_0089378

The night the Esperanza fire began, Hutson said, he was with friends at his house and then went for a drive before dropping off a friend in Banning.

The fire was already racing up the mountainside as the group drove home on the freeway, Hutson said.

Hutson said he failed several polygraph tests administered by federal agents during questioning Monday. He said he had become nervous thinking about his criminal record, and has volunteered to take another test.

"When I get worked up, it's real hard," he said. "I get real shaky."

On Tuesday, television news crews camped outside Hutson's modest pink house in Cabazon, and he said his family from Texas called to say they had seen him on national television.

More than 50 investigators from the Sheriff's Department, California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, U.S. Forest Service and Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives are working on the case.

Those include two BATF profilers and a polygraph examiner, said bureau spokeswoman Susan Rachel.

Sheriff's spokesman Sgt. Earl Quinata emphasized that no arrests had been made for the Esperanza fire, and that the investigation was ongoing.

Veteran arson investigator Brad Hamil called arson "about the hardest crime there is to crack in a whole system of crimes."

"It's against the law to carry, say, tools that would be used in a burglary. But it certainly isn't against the law to carry a cigarette lighter or a box of matches," said Hamil, who investigated arson fires for 25 years for the San Bernardino City Fire Department and is not involved in the Esperanza fire case.

What might give investigators an edge on the Esperanza fire is the $550,000 reward being offered for information leading to an arrest and conviction, he said.

"Money really makes the difference," Hamil said. "If anybody thinks their brother did it, you're going to get a call. Everybody's fishing."

Along with Cerda, the U.S. Forest Service firefighters killed in the blaze were Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, the team's captain; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

Cerda realized he wanted to be a firefighter while a student at Los Amigos High School in Fountain Valley, teachers and neighbors said last week. After graduating from high school, Cerda attended the Riverside Community College Fire Academy.

Dev Gnadeve, medical director and chief of surgery for the Arrowhead Regional Medical Center, said the family declined to have additional surgery performed on Cerda, who had been on life support since he suffered the burns Thursday.

They were by Cerda's bedside when he died, Gnadeve said.

"He was a great fighter," Gnadeve said. "But even if Pablo had a very small chance of making it, we weren't sure of what kind of quality of life he was going to have."

Seven Forest Service firefighters stood in front of a lime green firetruck outside the medical center with their eyes glistening and hands crossed as the death was announced.

"It doesn't matter what station you worked in," said firefighter Travis Thogmartin, 28. "At Forest Service, we are all brothers."

A public memorial service for the fallen firefighters is scheduled for 1 p.m. Sunday at the Hyundai Pavilion in Devore.

Fire officials will hold a community meeting with fire victims from Twin Pines and Poppet Flats near Banning today to provide information on county, state and federal relief efforts. The meeting begins at 7 p.m. at the Silent Valley Club, 48305 Poppet Flats Road.

Police Charge 17 As Gang Members (MJS)

By Gina Barton

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 1, 2006

15 in custody; 200 officers help in raid

Seventeen people affiliated with a gang that authorities say has been distributing cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana on Milwaukee's north side for about 15 years have been charged with conspiracy and other drug offenses in federal court in Milwaukee, according to an indictment made public Tuesday.

Ten members of the gang, known as the First and Keefe Vice Lords, were arrested in early morning raids Tuesday, according to the FBI. Two hundred law enforcement officers from the FBI, Milwaukee Police Department, state Department of Justice and other state and local agencies rounded up the defendants in the culmination of a two-year investigation, said Linda Krieg, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Milwaukee office.

Swat teams from the FBI's Milwaukee and Chicago offices both were involved in the arrests because the suspects were considered armed and dangerous, Krieg said. The 10 arrests were made without incident, she said.

Five other defendants already were in state custody Tuesday, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Two remained at large Tuesday evening.

The First and Keefe Vice Lords formed in the late 1980s and early 1990s, and the gang consists of members who had moved to Milwaukee from Chicago, authorities said. The group has two subsets, known as the SOC Vice Lords and the MOB Vice Lords.

The indictment charges 15 people with conspiring to distribute at least 5 kilograms of powder cocaine and at least 50 grams of crack cocaine, as well as marijuana.

The conspiracy count carries a mandatory minimum penalty of 10 years and a maximum penalty of life. The indictment also charges the individuals named in the conspiracy with individual drug trafficking counts, which carry prison terms of five years to life.

The two others are charged with operating a drug house at their residence in the 6400 block of N. 42nd St., which could yield them up to 20 years in prison.

The government also is seeking forfeiture of a shotgun, a rifle and $31,225 in cash seized from the home.

The investigation was the result of a local, state and federal task force that has been operating in the city over the past several years, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Over the past four years, similar charges have been leveled against the Latin Kings, Cherry Street Mob, Laotian Crips, 2-4s and 2-6s, as well as a different subset of Vice Lords.

In May 2005, authorities arrested 21 people charged as being part of the 2-6 Vice Lords, and seized more than $400,000 in cash and almost 10 pounds of crack cocaine.

"It's all part of our joint plan to find the most dangerous criminals and put them behind bars," said Milwaukee Mayor Tom Barrett. "This sends a strong message that if you're dealing in these drugs, we're coming after you."

Pot Sale Penalty Protest Grows (SLT)

By Elizabeth Neff, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, November 1, 2006

Former top Justice Department officials and several judges have asked the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the appeal of a Utah man sentenced to serve 55 years in prison for selling pot - a sentence decried by a judge who said the law forced his hand.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver in January rejected an argument that the sentence handed down to record producer Weldon Angelos was cruel and unusual punishment that was disproportionate to his crime.

But a friend of the court brief filed with the high court by 145 people -including former U.S. Attorneys General Griffin Bell, Benjamin Civiletti, Nicholas Katzenbach and Janet Reno; other former high ranking Justice Department officials and former federal judges - urges the high court to take the case.

Angelos, 26, the founder of Extravagant Records, was accused of selling 8 ounces of marijuana to a police informant three times in May and June 2002. At one sale, he had a gun strapped to his ankle, according to court records. At the other drug buys, there were firearms in the vicinity.

A federal grand jury originally indicted Angelos in November 2002 on one gun possession count, three counts of marijuana distribution and two lesser charges. After Angelos rejected a plea bargain that would have sent him to prison for 16 years, authorities obtained a new indictment with 20 charges.

When Angelos asked to reopen negotiations, prosecutors said it was too late. In December 2001, a jury convicted him of 16 counts.

U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell reluctantly sentenced Angelos to a mandatory 55 years in prison, five years for the first gun-possession conviction and 25 years each for the next two, to be served one after the other. For 13 drug and money laundering counts, the judge imposed one additional day behind bars. Cassell said the prison term was "unjust and cruel and even irrational."

So did defense attorneys, who appealed and gained the support of many in the legal field who say the sentence was excessive. However, the U.S. Attorney's Office stuck to its contention that Angelos is the kind of offender Congress had in mind when it enacted tough penalties for criminals who carry a firearm while committing a felony.

Sentence for 2005 arrest on drug, firearm charges

GREENBELT -- A Frederick man caught in an undercover operation headed by the Drug Enforcement Administration was sentenced Monday to 20 years in federal prison, according to U.S. Attorney for Maryland Rod J. Rosenstein.

Winfred Gregg Travis' sentence stems from his conviction for distributing crack cocaine and possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, Mr. Rosenstein stated in a news release. Travis, 37, pleaded guilty June 15 in U.S. District Court.

Early in the investigation, DEA agents watched as a person working with law enforcement agents obtained 133 grams of crack from Travis on Nov. 9, 2005, the U.S. attorney said.

More than two months later, on Jan. 18, Montgomery County Police stopped Travis for a traffic violation and found 492 grams of cocaine in his vehicle.

The day of the traffic stop, DEA agents asked Frederick County law enforcement to obtain a search warrant for Travis' residence, said Frederick County Deputy State's Attorney Charlie Smith.

Later that day, Frederick County narcotics officers searched Travis' residence and seized 148 grams of crack, a gram of marijuana, $19,269, a Llama Max .45-caliber handgun, a box of Winchester .45-caliber bullets and drug paraphernalia, Mr. Rosenstein said.

The DEA asked county law enforcement to file local charges to hold him until he could be indicted federally, Mr. Smith said.

"It was definitely a cooperative effort," he said.

U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow gave Travis a tough sentence after finding that he has a lengthy criminal history, Mr. Rosenstein said.

Since 1991, Travis has been charged in Frederick and Montgomery counties 10 times, primarily with drug crimes, but also with breaking and entering, battery and disorderly conduct, according to court records.

After his release from prison, Travis will serve 10 years of supervised release. He was ordered to forfeit the $19,269 found during the search and the Llama Max.

Mr. Rosenstein thanked the DEA, the Montgomery County Police and narcotics officers from Frederick County who participated in the investigation.

Eighth Member Of Drug Ring Is Sentenced (MAUIN)

Maui News, November 1, 2006

HONOLULU – The eighth member of a methamphetamine trafficking ring was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Court Judge J. Michael Seabright to nearly 24 years in prison, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Leandro Gomez III, 30, of Las Vegas, was one of 10 defendants to plead guilty to charges of taking part in a large-scale organization that imported methamphetamine from Las Vegas to Maui.

"Gomez was the Las Vegas supplier of the methamphetamine, which was transported to Maui either by couriers or mail shipment," a Justice Department news release says.

In Las Vegas, he had been assisted by co-defendants Timothy James Sullivan and Gilbert Gomez Jr., federal officials said. And, on Maui, "Nathaniel Russell and Pamela Mahealani Newton (husband and wife) oversaw an extensive distribution network involving co-defendants John Corniel Jr., Charles R.K. Farren, Roger Manu Bates, Cyrinah L. Aken and Reed Kaleookalani Aken."

The investigation of the drug ring resulted in the recovery of 616.8 grams (1.4 pounds) of methamphetamine from Bates in early May 2005 on Maui, according to Justice Department officials.

"Other information produced in connection with the case reflected that the Maui group was purchasing up to 7 pounds of methamphetamine from Gomez in late May 2005," the news release says. "Law enforcement officers intercepted approximately 921.1 grams (2 pounds) of methamphetamine discovered on Reed Aken's person at Los Angeles International Airport in late May 2005, and 1,809 grams (4 pounds) of methamphetamine in a parcel Gomez sent to Maui in early June 2005."

So far, seven other defendants have been sentenced to between 48 and 198 months in prison for their participation in the drug ring. Their sentences were: Bates, 34, 198 months in prison; Corniel, 42, 168 months; Farren, 38, 126 months; Gilbert Gomez, 37, 96 months; Cyrinah Aken, 38, 87 months; Sullivan, 35, 82 months; and Reed Aken, 37, 48 months.

Russell and Newton are scheduled for sentencing Nov. 20 and Jan. 8, respectively.

'Ice' Supplier Gets Prison Term (HSB)

By Leila Fujimori

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, November 1, 2006

The 30-year-old Las Vegas supplier of a large-scale trafficking organization bringing "ice" to Maui in 2005 was sentenced in federal court yesterday to 23 years and eight months in prison.

U.S. District Judge J. Michael Seabright sentenced Leandro Gomez III, who pleaded guilty to methamphetamine-trafficking charges along with nine others.

Gomez supplied multi-pound amounts of methamphetamine to Maui carried by couriers or shipped by mail from Las Vegas, the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a news release.

"For Maui Police Department, it was rather a significant case, and they devoted a lot of resources to it," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Kawahara, who prosecuted the case.

Kawahara said efforts by Maui police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and other law enforcement agencies in this and other cases have "stemmed the flow of drugs to Hawaii," and the prosecution of these kinds of cases serves as a deterrence.

He said that strenuous law enforcement efforts have done much to curb the supply of methamphetamine to Hawaii.

Nathaniel "Bobo" Russell and his wife, Pamela Mahelani Russell, oversaw the Maui distribution network, and will be the last of the 10 to be sentenced Nov. 20 and Jan. 8, respectively.

Others previously sentenced include former Maui police officer Reed Kaleookalani Aken Sr., 37. He served as a courier for the money to Las Vegas and drugs to Maui and was sentenced to four years.

Also on the Maui end of the drug ring and their sentences are: John Corniel Jr., 42, 14 years; Charles R.K. Farren, 38, 10 1/2 years; Roger Manu Bates, 34, 16 1/2 years; and Cyrinah L. Aken, 38, 7 1/4 years.

Those who assisted Gomez in Las Vegas were Timothy James Sullivan, 37, who received six years, 10 months, and Gilbert Gomez Jr., 37, eight years.

Law enforcement agents recovered in early May 2005 1.4 pounds of ice from Bates on Maui, intercepted 2 pounds of the drug on Reed Aken at Los Angeles International Airport in late May and 4 pounds of meth sent by Gomez to Maui in June 2005. The investigation revealed the Maui group was buying up to seven pounds of methamphetamine from Gomez in late May 2005.

U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo commended the "superlative joint investigation" conducted by DEA and Maui police assisted by Los Angeles International Airport narcotics agents.

Honolulu Advertiser, November 1, 2006

A 30-year-old Las Vegas man was sentenced to 23 2/3 years in federal prison yesterday for his part in a methamphetamine conspiracy that delivered ice from Nevada to Maui.

Leandro Gomez III, who pleaded guilty to ice-trafficking charges, was described by federal authorities as the supplier who sold up to seven pounds of the drug to Maui defendants in May last year.

U.S. District Judge Michael Seabright sentenced Gomez to 284 months in prison.

Federal prosecutors called the drug ring a "large-scale organization" which shipped multipound quantities of ice by mail or by couriers to Maui.

The case against Gomez and nine others involved cell-phone taps, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Kawahara.

The 10 include two other Las Vegas residents and seven Maui residents. All 10 have pleaded guilty to ice-trafficking counts. All but two have been sentenced, according to federal prosecutors.

Gomez has been given the stiffest sentence so far. The other seven received terms ranging from four years to 16 1/2 years. Among them is Reed Kaleookalani Aken Sr., 37, a former Maui police officer who prosecutors say left the force before his involvement in the drug ring. Aken received a four-year term.

Drug Supplier Gets Help In Appeal (GRPRESS)

By John Agar, The Grand Rapids Press

Grand Rapids Press (MI), November 1, 2006

GRANDVILLE -- A federal appeals court ruling could shorten the 25-year prison term for a man who provided heroin to a friend and failed to call 911 as she was dying in his Grandville home.

Kevin Obi, 23, pleaded guilty to providing heroin that killed Nora Lares, 21, in 2004.

At Obi's sentencing last year, U.S. District Judge Richard Enslen ruled Obi's lies to investigators soon after her death constituted obstruction of justice, and thus, increased the possible sentence.

But the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals said recently the prosecution failed to show Obi's false statements significantly hurt the investigation. The court ordered the case returned to U.S. District Court for resentencing.

Without the obstruction of justice enhancement, Obi, who received 300 months, would have faced 210 to 262 months.

Gina Lares, the victim's mother, is disgusted with a move that could end in an earlier release for the man she considers her daughter's killer.

"The guy is sick, and he is a criminal," Lares said. "It's very frustrating that Nora is dead and she has no rights and no voice, yet he can do whatever he wants."

Obi and his friend, Terry Ensing, went to a bar on Sept. 3, 2004, to meet Nora Lares and her friend. After the bar closed, they went to Obi's basement, where Obi, Ensing and Lares snorted heroin, while Lares' friend passed out. A little later, Obi told his friend that Lares stopped breathing, but she seemed to be snoring.

Ensing then told Obi that she was not breathing, court records showed. They took her to a closed medical center. Obi then called 911.

The prosecution says Obi tampered with evidence on the victim's body and told police they had not used drugs.

Police then went to his house and revived the young woman who had passed out. They conducted a "cursory" search of the house but found no evidence of drugs. Four days later, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officers used a search warrant to again look through the house, but Obi's mother had "thoroughly cleaned the residence, discarding the bedding and trash," records said.

She told police her son's grief counselor recommended she clean the basement. Police said they found hidden heroin-related paraphernalia.

The government argued Obi's false statements led police to initially consider the crime scene to be the vehicle, rather than his basement, which resulted in a loss of possible evidence. But, the court noted, Obi told police that Lares' friend was still at his house, and police went there.

The appeals court said it was only speculation that police could have found additional evidence at Obi's house if they were immediately aware it was the crime scene.

Ensing is serving three years in prison for his role in Lares' death.

Merriman Drops Appeal Of 4-Game Suspension (NYT)

By Michael S. Schmidt

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman yesterday dropped his appeal of a four-game suspension for violating the National Football League's policy on banned substances, and he blamed his positive drug test on a supplement he took before the season to boost his energy for workouts.

Merriman said his lawyer, David Cornwell, was considering legal action against the supplement maker because its product contained a precursor to the steroid nandrolone. Dietary supplement makers are prohibited from including nandrolone's precursors in their products.

The N.F.L. has certified several dietary supplements that it said would not result in a positive drug test. Merriman said he was not taking one of those supplements, adding that he believed more then 75 percent of the players were taking supplements that were not certified by the N.F.L.

Merriman said he took the supplement to increase his energy so he could work out at least two times a day before the preseason started. He refused to name the supplement, saying it might hurt his complaint against the manufacturer.

"It's a brutal sport, but a lot of guys need to maximize our workouts," Merriman said in a telephone interview.

Merriman said he had taken the supplement since he entered the league last season, when he was the N.F.L.'s defensive rookie of the year, and he had no problems with it. He estimated that he was tested seven or eight times before and during the season. He said he stopped taking the supplement this summer just before the preseason began.

On Aug. 2, a few days into training camp, Merriman took his first drug test this season. He said he learned about Sept. 12 that the result was positive. Merriman said he had taken three tests since the Aug. 2 test and all three came back negative.

He said nothing on the supplement's list of ingredients indicated that it contained a steroid. Merriman said he stopped using all six of the vitamins and supplements he was taking as soon as he found out about the positive test.

"My health is more important than missing four games," he said.

Merriman said the supplement was shipped to him at the end of last season, but he did not use it until he began to get into shape for this season.

He added: "I have taken full responsibility for what happened to me and what has gone on. I came up clean plenty of times before and gained confidence in the supplement, and then all of a sudden it popped up that I was doing something wrong."

Although Merriman dropped his appeal, the league allowed him to visit the team's practice facility today, because he wanted to address his teammates before the suspension began. Players are normally barred from team facilities for the entire time of their suspensions.

"The league has given me an exception and I really appreciate that," Merriman said. The Chargers (5-2) are tied with the Denver Broncos for first place in the American Football Conference West.

On Sunday, Merriman tied a career high with three sacks as the Chargers defeated the St. Louis Rams, 38-24. He is tied for the league lead in sacks with 8½.

Merriman will be able to return to practice on Nov. 27 and would be available to play against the Buffalo Bills on Dec. 3 and the Broncos on Dec. 10.

Merriman Decides To Drop Suspension Appeal (SDUT)

By By Kevin Acee, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 31, 2006

Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman had been leaning toward this decision for days, weighing the likelihood he could win a reversal of his suspension versus the desire to clear his name along with the question of what would be best for his team.

The NFL's co-sack leader will miss four games for violating the league's drug policy, another blow to a defense that has had its share of challenges – the Steve Foley shooting, injuries – all season.

The first-year starter at quarterback has matured quickly, allowing the offense to develop.

REINFORCEMENTS

Igor Olshansky: The defensive end, who has missed much of the season with knee problems, expects to play against Cleveland on Sunday.

Shaun Phillips: The linebacker, who missed the last game with a strained calf, is about 80 percent healthy and hopes to play Sunday.

In the end, he decided Tuesday to drop the appeal of his four-game suspension for a positive drug test.

The NFL's leader in sacks with 8½, Merriman will not play Sunday against Cleveland, Nov. 12 at Cincinnati, Nov. 19 at Denver or Nov. 26 against Oakland. His first game back will be Dec. 3 at Buffalo.

"My whole life has been made of speed bumps," Merriman said. "People have always told me if you want to be great at something you're going to have to endure more than anybody else.

"It really digs deep inside. It really hurts. This is what I love to do. This is a part of me. This will be the first time I've missed any game in any sport in my whole life – ever. It really saddens me."

Merriman tested positive Aug. 2 for the banned steroid nandrolone. He maintains he was the victim of a tainted supplement, but he knew he was unlikely to win his appeal based on the NFL's clearly stated policy that players are responsible for what they put in their body.

Merriman's appeal was scheduled to be heard Nov. 7, two days after the Cleveland game.

Merriman will forfeit almost $73,000 of his $310,000 salary during the four weeks he is gone. During that time, he will not be allowed at the Chargers' facility or to be on the sideline during games.

Merriman had to decide by today whether to drop the appeal or go ahead with the Nov. 7 hearing. He was able to work out a deal with the NFL that will allow him to address his teammates Wednesday before he is banned from the team's facilities for the remainder of the four weeks.

"I know my responsibilities and how much I mean to the team," he said. "It's important to me to talk to them."

Merriman was confident his teammates would step up in his absence.

"Look at how (Steve) Foley went down and Shaun Phillips stepped up," he said. "Shaun Phillips went down, and we still got it done. That's what I'm going to say to the guys.

"This is a big stumbling block for myself and for the team. But we're going to win games. I'm mad I can't be there. But we're not the Shawne Merriman Chargers."

Merriman Drops Appeal, Will Miss 4 Games (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman dropped his appeal of his four-game suspension imposed by the league for a positive test under the NFL's steroid-testing program.

Merriman, who's tied for the NFL lead with 8 1/2 sacks, is scheduled to begin serving his suspension immediately and will miss the Chargers' next four games, beginning Sunday against the Cleveland Browns.

The appeal was to have been heard Nov. 7, and Merriman had been eligible to play in the meantime.

Merriman's attorney, David Cornwell, has said that Merriman likely tested positive for the banned substance nandrolone that was contained in a supplement that Merriman was taking. But under the league's policy, a player is responsible for what's in his body even if he unwittingly takes a banned substance contained in a supplement. The NFL Players Association has a program to test supplements and clear those that don't contain banned substances, but a player's participation in that program is voluntary.Simms to Injured Reserve?

The Tampa Bay Buccaneers could place quarterback Chris Simms on the injured reserve list soon, a move that would end his season. Simms and the Buccaneers did not rule out the possibility of him playing again this season after he underwent emergency surgery last month to have his spleen removed.

But all of the involved parties acknowledged from the outset there was a good chance that Simms's season was over, and the Buccaneers soon might need a roster spot to activate quarterback Luke McCown. He's on the physically unable to perform list after undergoing surgery for a torn knee ligament suffered during an offseason minicamp. . . .

The New York Jets have delayed a decision until next week about whether to allow tailback Curtis Martin to begin practicing. If Martin, who has an ailing knee and currently is on the physically unable to perform list, does not practice next week, the Jets must place him on the injured reserve list, ending his season. Martin has said he'd like to play again but doesn't know if that will be possible. The Newark Star-Ledger reported yesterday that Martin won't play this season and likely will retire, but Coach Eric Mangini told reporters that no decisions on Martin's playing status had been made.

The Seattle Times, November 1, 2006

SAN DIEGO — The San Diego Chargers must play their next four games without outside linebacker Shawne Merriman, one of the league's top young players.

Merriman, 22, decided Tuesday not to appeal his suspension for testing positive for steroids.

Merriman's suspension is another blow to one of the league's toughest defenses, which has been hit by injuries and off-field trouble since before the season started. Nicknamed "Lights Out" because of his punishing hits, Merriman will be shut down for games at home against Cleveland, at Cincinnati, at Denver and at home against Oakland.

Merriman, who is tied for the league lead with 8 ½ sacks, and his attorney have blamed a tainted supplement for the player's positive test for the steroid nandrolone.

The suspension won't officially begin until after Merriman addresses teammates today. After that, he will be barred from the team's headquarters until he is eligible to return Nov. 27.

The Chargers vowed to press on without Merriman, a Pro Bowl starter.

"He's upset because he let his team down, but we're OK," outside linebacker Shaun Phillips said. "We're behind him 100 percent. We know he's not that kind of guy, that he wouldn't do anything to boost his performance."

Phillips moved into the starting lineup after Steve Foley was shot by an off-duty police officer on Sept. 3. Phillips missed Sunday's 38-24 win over St. Louis with a calf injury and has a 50 percent chance of playing Sunday.

Had Merriman gone through with the appeal and lost, there was the chance he would miss both games against Denver, which is tied with San Diego atop the AFC West at 5-2.

Notes

• Pittsburgh running back Verron Haynes and linebacker Arnold Harrison were placed on injured reserve with torn knee ligaments and are done for the season.

• New Orleans quarterback Drew Brees told his mother he wants her to stop using his picture in TV commercials touting her candidacy for a Texas appeals court. In commercials running on Austin stations, Mina Brees had been using a picture of her son in the uniform of his former team, the Chargers, to emphasize her ties to football.

"I think the major point here is that my mother is using me in a campaign, and I've made it known many times I don't want to be involved," Brees said.

Mina Brees, an Austin attorney, is running as a Democrat for a spot on Texas' 3rd Court of Appeals. Drew Brees said his agent sent Mina Brees a letter Oct. 20 threatening legal action. Brees called his relationship with his mother "nonexistent" after it crumbled about six years ago when he declined to hire her as his agent.

• Will Peterson, 27, has a new team and a new name. The former cornerback for the New York Giants signed a one-year contract with Philadelphia. He also dropped his last name, and is going by William James.

• San Francisco signed cornerback Donald Strickland, 25, with hopes the fourth-year cornerback will strengthen a secondary that has struggled. He was released by Philadelphia before the start of the season.

• The New York Jets insist Curtis Martin, 33, has not yet decided to end his season, despite a published report the league's No. 4 career rusher has told members of the team he won't return this year.

"There has been no decision," coach Eric Mangini said when addressing the story in The Star-Ledger of Newark, N.J.

Spain Nabs Major Drug Trafficker (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

Filed at 8:45 p.m. ET

MADRID, Spain (AP) -- Spanish police said Tuesday they arrested a leading member of one of Colombia's most feared drug-trafficking cartels.

Orlando Sabogal Zuluaga, 40, was arrested last Thursday in a shopping center on the outskirts of Madrid, the Civil Guard police force said in a statement posted on the Interior Ministry's Web site.

Police said Sabogal Zuluaga was a right-hand man to the former head of the Norte del Valle cartel, Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamente, who himself was captured in Cuba in 2004.

The Civil Guard statement said the group was blamed for hundreds of killings in Colombia and suspected of controlling much of the world's cocaine trafficking.

Spanish police began searching for Sabogal following a request from the U.S. embassy in Spain. The Norte del Valle cartel is suspected of having shipped 500 tons of cocaine into the United States during the past decade, police said.

Sabogal, who was traveling using a fake Venezuelan passport, is wanted for his suspected role in several killings, narcotics trafficking and money laundering, the statement said. U.S. authorities had offered compensation of $5 million for information leading to his arrest, it added.

According to Colombian anti-narcotics police, Sabogal is wanted for extradition to the U.S. to face charges of drug-trafficking and money-laundering.

Ad Campaign Accuses European Coke Snorters Of Funding Colombia's Civil War (SDUT/AP)

By Joshua Goodman, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 1, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia – Colombia's vice president is taking a hard-hitting anti-drug message to Europe, complaining about cocaine-snorting celebrities who he says are financing the drug-fueled civil conflict bleeding this South American nation.

Vice President Francisco Santos spoke of supermodel Kate Moss, although she doesn't appear in the ads that he planned to unveil Wednesday in London along with 13 European anti-drug czars.

Santos called Moss a perfect example of liberal European attitudes toward drug use because she is enjoying a career comeback after a British tabloid last year published photos of her apparently snorting cocaine.

“To me its baffling that somebody who helps cause so much pain in Colombia is doing better than ever and winning more contracts than ever,” the vice president told The Associated Press.

Moss's modeling agency in London, Storm, did not return a phone call and e-mail seeking comment about the comments.

Moss lost contracts after the photos were published, but her career resumed after she spent time at a clinic in Arizona. She apologized to “all the people I have let down” over the incident, but was never charged with any drug offense.

“Cocaine not only destroys you, it also destroys a country” is the theme of the advertising campaign designed to change attitudes among Europeans about their booming cocaine habit in the same way that “Just Say No” did in the United States.

Santos spoke of what cocaine consumption does to Colombia, where drug-financed armed groups murder hundreds of people each year and force thousands to abandon their homes. Gangs, rebel groups and right-wing militias all traffic in the drug.

“We need to tell Europeans that that line of coke they snort is tainted in blood,” Santos said.

One ad in the “cocaine curse” campaign depicts a pinstriped “coke head” – with an oversized nose – laying land mines in a coca field. Colombia now ranks first in the world in land-mine casualties, averaging four a day.

Colombia, the world's largest producer of cocaine, hopes European governments will fund placement of the ads on billboards, television and even bathrooms of trendy dance clubs

It has also launched an English-language Web site, www.sharedresponsibility.gov.co, to highlight its efforts in the U.S.-sponsored war on drugs, including aerial eradication of more than 1.5 million acres of coca, the base ingredient of cocaine, since 2002.

Colombia is also seeking more European aid for projects to help peasant farmers switch from coca to legal crops like tropical fruits, coffee and rubber.

According to the European Monitoring Center for Drugs and Drug Addiction, cocaine use among young adults in Spain and Britain has doubled over the past decade, reaching levels similar to those in the United States, where 5 percent of people have reported recent usage.

The center, based in Lisbon, Portugal, says surveys in Denmark, Italy, Hungary, the Netherlands and Austria also show a rise in cocaine use among young adults.

Santos noted findings by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy that cocaine consumption has declined 50 percent in the United States over the past two decades.

Op-Ed: NRA Won't Take Fall For Violent Crime (AJC)

By Bob Barr

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 1, 2006

Atlanta suffers from a rate of violent crime about four times the national average; murders take place in the city at a rate about five times the nation's average. The reasons Atlanta's crime statistics remain stubbornly high are many and persistent, but criminologists and law enforcement experts know that none of them is the fault of the National Rifle Association.

Yet last week, Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington was at the National Press Club in Washington offering sound bites and photo ops with the anti-gun lobby organization, the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence, blaming the city's sorry crime statistics on the NRA.

Taking potshots at the NRA has become a time-worn practice of big city mayors such as New York's Michael Bloomberg. While one expects liberal politicians in northeastern cities to curry favor by leveling broadsides at the NRA, it is surprising to find their ranks joined by a police chief from Atlanta, the capital of a state with a long and positive relationship with the NRA.

In fact, just a month ago Gov. Sonny Perdue proudly received NRA's endorsement. Officeholders and aspirants across Georgia's 159 counties eagerly vie for NRA's endorsement every election cycle. In a state with significant numbers of hunters and sports shooters — a state that boasts innumerable law enforcement officers who have benefited directly from NRA-sponsored firearms training — why has Atlanta's police chief jumped in bed with the national anti-gun lobby?

Politics and political agendas are always difficult to discern, and I don't pretend to know those that motivate Pennington. I also know that, despite Atlanta's less-than-stellar crime statistics, Pennington has, since being appointed in July 2002, made real strides redirecting police resources to areas in the city to increase their impact.

Whatever his motives for taking up with the national anti-firearms lobby, the material Pennington's new-found friends at the Brady Center are pushing is simply political pap of the sort the center has been espousing every election cycle for more than a decade.

For example, the Brady Center blasts the NRA for supporting legislation pending before the Congress that would reform the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and strengthen privacy protections for individuals' firearms purchase records.

The Brady Center and its cheerleaders mischaracterize these pending legislative efforts as "tying the hands" of the ATF and other law enforcement agencies, but the actual terms of the legislation show otherwise. The ATF reform bill modernizes the agency's ability to address infractions of the myriad federal firearms regulations governing firearms retailers. To be sure, the legislation contains measures to guard against regulatory abuses by ATF such as were detailed in a public congressional hearing earlier this year. However, it also aims to more effectively focus and prioritize the agency's efforts against true violations of firearms, explosives and arson laws.

While Pennington has bought into the Brady Center's resistance to ATF reform and blames the NRA for violent crime in Atlanta, a significant majority of Georgia's congressional delegation — including Democrats John Barrow, Sanford Bishop and Jim Marshall — voted "aye" (along with 274 others) on the legislation. It defies reason to conclude, as Pennington apparently has, that all these Democrats and Republicans are conspiring against him and coddling violent offenders.

Another part of the firearms legislative package backed by the NRA and with which Pennington takes umbrage would strengthen protections against improper release of citizens' firearms purchase records. Important, but contrary to the Brady Center's rhetoric, the legislation still allows full access by law enforcement to obtain firearms records for any legitimate investigations. This bill, too, enjoys broad bipartisan support, including among the Georgia delegation.

Of course, those echoing the Brady Center's anti-NRA diatribe have little to offer the debate other than boilerplate sound bites, when confronted with hard statistics, such as those released in September by the FBI, showing the nation's violent crime rate in 2005 — despite an uptick for the year — was nearly 40 percent below that in 1991 when it hit an all-time high, even as the number of privately owned firearms during that period increased significantly.

Thus, while the evidence clearly shows that broader civilian ownership of firearms translates into less, not more, violent crime in America, and even as members of Congress of both political parties support efforts to reform and streamline federal firearms regulatory efforts, the anti-firearms crowd that apparently now includes Atlanta's police chief prefers hollow rhetoric to cooperative action.

Los Angeles ATF Agents Measure — And Get — Results (FEDTIMES)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, November 1, 2006

Defendants referred for prosecution — up 23 percent over the previous year.

Convictions — also up 23 percent.

Gang cases referred for prosecution — up 86 percent.John Torres, special agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' Los Angeles field division, said these numbers, a comparison between fiscal 2005 and fiscal 2006, are proof positive that its performance measurement process is working. COMPSTAT, short for comparative statistics, is a public event where arrest, conviction and other statistics are reviewed and dissected. Officials in charge are held accountable for meeting goals and the numbers help determine where funds are allocated.

"We saw that the system works and if we're paying attention to where we're dedicating our resources we're going to have an impact on violent crime," Torres said. "That's the bottom line."

COMPSTAT began in the 1990s in New York City where the police department would hold regular meetings to set goals for law enforcement and publicly hold officers accountable for their results. Torres began holding COMPSTAT meetings for the Los Angeles ATF on a quarterly basis in October 2005.

The most recent COMPSTAT was held Oct. 24. The event is open to the public and often attended by representatives from other law enforcement agencies. Agents are asked to report their statistics. Depending on how these numbers match goals from the previous COMPSTAT, they're asked on the spot to explain what went wrong or what went right.

"We're not out for, 'gotcha,' " Torres said. "It's for people to share their success stories. We want people to talk to each other. It's a good tool to encourage communication."

Torres said his interest in COMPSTAT has its roots in the administration's overall push to measure results governmentwide. He recommends other federal law enforcement agencies and other agencies in generalconsider adopting the process, though he said different approaches would be necessary depending on the outcome they're trying to achieve.

"It's not a cookie-cutter approach. Every agency needs to figure out how to make performance measurement part of what they do so the general public can have confidence their tax dollars are being spent wisely," Torres said.

Kim Newman, a program examiner at the Office of Management and Budget, attended the Los Angeles ATF's third-quarter COMPSTAT in August. She said she was struck by how aggressively participants zeroed in on whether the results matched the goals.

"The [agents] realized when they fall short, they better have a good explanation for the results. By the same token, people were recognized if they exceeded goals for the quarter," Newman said.

She said it was clear that the event was meant as a learning process.

Before COMPSTAT, Torres said, his office didn't publicly measure performance, and systems within the department for sharing statistical information were spotty.

He said implementing COMPSTAT has meant changing culture.

"It requires a different mindset," Torres said, a shift that hasn't been easy to convince everyone to buy into. Ultimately, though, he said most agents have appreciated the need for greater accountability and the benefits of a public process.

Kathrene Hansen, executive director of the Greater Los Angeles Federal Executive Board attended the fourth-quarter COMPSTAT earlier this month. Though the process was transparent, she said no one got defensive.

"It seemed like a team effort, a peer review process" she said. "You could see that people wanted to get their numbers up."

Hansen said it appeared to be a good way for agents and the ATF to get buy-in for the resources they need.

OMB's Newman agreed.

"To me, it was great to see that resources could be targeted so quickly and be responsive to what's happening in the field," she said.

While many state and local law enforcement agencies have adopted the process, Torres said as far as he knows, the Los Angeles ATF is the only federal law enforcement agency using COMPSTAT. He said having the support of his supervisors in Washington has been critical.

"I hope ATF doing it opens eyes," he said. "You need to keep score in public."

Newman said whether this process would work at other agencies would depend on the special agent in charge.

"If there are law enforcement organizations out there that are willing to delegate that flexibility and responsibility to their supervisors, I think it would be a very effective tool. I could see it working in other law enforcement agencies in the federal government."

Hansen agreed COMPSTAT could be applied more widely.

"What I liked most about it was the transparency and the willingness to invite all of the stakeholders to the meeting, she said. "The willingness to expose all of your strengths and weaknesses out of your individual domain takes courage as a leader."

Leader Of Aryan Prison Gang Gets 19 Years (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, November 1, 2006

A leader of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang with an extensive criminal record was resentenced to more than 19 years behind bars Monday for a weapons violation, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Bruce Foy Lowry, 52, was convicted by a jury after his 2003 arrest by federal marshals who tracked him down on a fugitive warrant. At the time, Lowry was wanted for failure to appear in a drive-by shooting case where he was accused of firing a gun at a mother, father and child who followed him from the scene of a hit-and-run accident.

According to a recorded conversation played during the sentencing, Lowry told a friend that he would have gotten into a gun battle with marshals if he'd had the opportunity. "If I could have drawn I would have," he said. "I couldn't even draw."

Lowry, known as "Boss Hog," appealed his case in 2004 to the Ninth Circuit Court, which remanded it back to the U.S. District Court in Arizona. On Monday, Judge David Campbell ordered Lowery to serve 235 months in prison for possessing ammunition in violation of the Armed Career Criminal Act.

Prosecutors stressed Lowry's extensive history of violent crimes, including seven felony convictions dating to 1974. The list of offenses includes armed robberies and two Aryan Brotherhood knife attack on an inmate. Lowry and a half-dozen other assailants left the knife in their victim's heart, prosecutors said, but surgeons managed to remove the weapon and save the inmate's life.

IMMIGRATION:

Agent Indicted In Smuggling Of Cuban Ballplayers To USA (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 1, 2006

A baseball agent who has represented Cuban defectors was indicted by a Miami grand jury on Tuesday for allegedly smuggling ballplayers and other Cuban nationals into the USA.

Gustavo "Gus" Dominguez, vice president of Total Sports International in Encino, Calif., is charged as part of a 53-count indictment related to two operations in 2004.

Geoffrey Rodrigues, Robert Yosvany Hernandez, Ramon Batista and Guillermo Valdez, allegedly hired by Dominguez to transport the Cubans by speedboat to the USA, also were indicted.

Dominguez has represented several Cuban defectors, including Andy Morales, who was signed by the New York Yankees and later the Boston Red Sox. Dominguez did not return a phone message left at his office.

The indictment says Rodrigues traveled in a 28-foot speedboat on July 28, 2004, from the Florida Keys to Cuba, where he picked up 22 people.

The U.S. Coast Guard intercepted them at sea as they attempted to return to Florida, the indictment says.

A second smuggling operation on Aug. 22 succeeded, the indictment said. The smugglers reached the Florida Keys with 19 Cubans, including five baseball players.

Once the Cubans reached land, two other associates drove the players in two rental vans from Miami to Los Angeles, according to the indictment.

Dominguez and his associates rented apartments and provided food for players Osmany Masso-Arredondo, Allen Guevara-Perez, Francisely Bueno-Trueba, Osbek Castillo-Perez, and Yoankis Turino-Montalno so they could begin training, the indictment says.

Castillo-Perez, 25, of Havana, is listed as a pitcher on the roster of the Missoula Ospreys, a minor league affiliate of the Arizona Diamondbacks in the Pioneer League. Osprey general manager and vice president Matt Ellis did not return a phone message left at his office Tuesday afternoon.

Bueno-Trueba, 25, of Havana, is listed as a left-handed pitcher on the roster of the Mississippi Braves, a Southern League affiliate of the Atlanta Braves. The Braves office in Pearl, Miss., had closed for the day.

Julie Myers, an assistant secretary of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said in a statement that "Though this case involves a Beverly Hills sports agent and talented baseball players, it is remarkably similar to the human smuggling operations that ICE encounters every day. The ringleaders put the lives of illegal immigrants at risk and sought to profit from their labor."

U.S. Government Indicts Agent For Illegally Smuggling Cuban Baseball Players (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Sedensky, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - MIAMI-An agent for baseball players illegally smuggled Cuban players into the United States, eventually shipping them to California in hopes that they would be signed by Major League Baseball teams, U.S. immigration officials said Tuesday.

The agent, Gustavo "Gus" Dominguez, is charged with paying four aides to transport the athletes and other Cubans to the U.S. in two trips from the island nation. Dominguez, of California-based Total Sports International, has represented several Cuban baseball defectors, including Andy Morales, who was signed by the New York Yankees and later the Boston Red Sox after fleeing Cuba six years ago.

Also charged in the 53-count federal indictment were Geoffrey Rodrigues, Robert Yosvany Hernandez, Ramon Batista and Guillermo Valdez.

"Though this case involves a Beverly Hills sports agent and talented baseball players, it is remarkably similar to the human smuggling operations that ICE encounters every day," Julie Myers, an assistant secretary of the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said in a statement. "The ringleaders put the lives of illegal immigrants at risk and sought to profit from their labor."

Dominguez's assistant, who would not give his full name, said Total Sports would not comment and he wouldn't clarify the relationship of the four other defendants or whether they worked for the company. A message left on Dominguez's voicemail was not immediately returned.

It was not known whether any of the defendants had obtained lawyers.

Prosecutors say Rodrigues and Dominguez traveled by boat to Cuba on July 28, 2004, and loaded 22 Cubans aboard, but were intercepted by U.S. authorities at sea. Less than a month later, on Aug. 22, 2004, authorities say the two men successfully brought 19 Cubans into the country.

According to the indictment, the defendants transported the athletes to Los Angeles by van, rented an apartment for them, provided them with food and clothing and began training them. It could not be immediately determined if any of the Cubans have been signed by MLB teams.

All five men are charged with conspiracy to bring immigrants illegally into the United States, transporting them in violation of the law and concealing and harboring them from detection.

Dominguez, Rodrigues and Hernandez are also charged with immigrant smuggling; Dominguez, Batista and Valdez face a charge of transporting, concealing and harboring from detection illegal immigrants; and Rodrigues is accused of assaulting ICE agents when his boat was intercepted.

Lawsuit Challenges Illegal Immigrant Crackdown In US (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - ALLENTOWN, Pennsylvania-Hispanic groups and the American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit against a small U.S. city that has sparked national attention over its immigration policies, setting the stage for a legal battle over its crackdown on illegal immigrants.

The ordinance, approved by the Hazleton City Council last month, imposes fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and denies business permits to companies that give them jobs. The law empowers the city to investigate written complaints about a person's immigration status, using a database operated by the federal government.

Lawyers for the ACLU and other groups planned to ask a federal judge for a temporary restraining order to prevent enforcement of the law, set to begin Wednesday.

"Immigration reform is an important issue but if every little town like Hazleton across the 50 states makes up their own rules about immigration, we're going to be left with an even bigger mess," Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, said Monday.

Hazleton's ordinance has spurred dozens of copycat versions in small towns around the United States, as the illegal immigration issue has become a key campaign debate as the country heads into congressional elections next week. Some states and communities are accusing the government of inaction.

President George W. Bush signed last week a law that approves partitioning 700 miles (1,125 kilometers) of the U.S. from Mexico. Bush wants a guest worker program, but he has been met with tough resistance from his own Republican Party.

A bill passed by the U.S. Senate would have allowed immigrants to remain and eventually become citizens after working, paying fines and back taxes and learning English. The House of Representatives approved a separate bill that focused on enforcement measures such as subjecting those in the U.S. illegally to felony prosecution.

The House and Senate did not meet to negotiate a compromise before recessing for the elections. The legislation Bush signed was a small portion of the House version.

In its lawsuit, the ACLU said the Hazleton ordinance and a companion measure violate the Constitution because they step on the federal government's exclusive power to regulate immigration.

Mayor Lou Barletta, disagreed, saying, "We are not regulating immigration in any way."

Barletta, who spearheaded the town law, contends illegal immigrants have brought drugs, crime and gangs to the city, overwhelming police and municipal budgets. He announced the crackdown in June, a month after two illegal immigrants from the Dominican Republic were charged with shooting and killing a 29-year-old man.

Barletta said he is convinced the law will be upheld by the courts and the city has assembled a legal team to defend it.

"Hazleton is prepared to fight and we will take this challenge to the highest court in the United States if that's what it takes to protect our legal citizens and quality of life," he said.

Hazleton, a city of about 31,000 residents, is about 80 miles (130 kilometers) from Philadelphia.

Houses Of Worship Fear Wrath Of IRS During Election Season (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - Scores of houses of worship nationwide are re-examining how they conduct get-out-the-vote programs and other election activities as the Internal Revenue Service investigates religious institutions for illegal campaign activity.

Churches grew more nervous when the IRS launched an investigation of the liberal All Saints Episcopal Church in Pasadena, Calif. after a former rector delivered a sermon that was critical of the Bush administration and the Iraq war shortly before the 2004 presidential election. The church last month said it would fight the IRS in court.

With congressional elections on Tuesday, several religious and voting rights groups are schooling churches, synagogues, and other religious institutions about what they can and cannot do politically under IRS regulations.

Religious institutions and other charitable organizations that violate the rules risk fines and losing their federal tax-exempt status. Fear of IRS investigations has made clergy across religious faiths reluctant to be politically active during this election cycle.

"I think there's a chill," said the Rev. Rick Scarborough, the president of Vision America, a politically active conservative Christian group that promotes civic involvement by the faithful. "I've had pastors come up and tell me their congregations have told them not to mention politics because it's illegal. It's not."

Scarborough said that Christian evangelical leaders, whom Republicans hoped to make part of an enduring GOP majority, have discussed increased IRS scrutiny during rallies and seminars.

To ease concern among its 185,000 members, the Interfaith Alliance, an 185,000-member organization that was formed "to challenge the radical religious right," conducted a conference call on the IRS regulations with ministers two weeks ago.

The Religious Action Center for Reform Judaism, which represents some 900 congregations across the country, held a similar call three weeks ago.

"It's become a very serious issue with congregations, especially African-American congregations," said Rep. Emanuel Cleaver II, D-Mo., the pastor of Kansas City's St. James United Methodist Church. "There's mass paranoia about (churches) being politically involved."

Some Muslim religious leaders said they've had few, if any, discussions about political activity in mosques because they don't usually mount aggressive get-out-the-vote efforts.

"What we do is just generally encourage participation in the election process and stress the importance of people's presence in politics," said Imam Mohammad Ali Elahi, founder and director of the Islamic House of Wisdom in Dearborn, Mich., which has a large Arab-American population.

IRS officials say that religious institutions are under greater scrutiny because the agency is receiving more complaints about them from private citizens, watchdog groups, and other organizations.

During the 2004 election cycle, the IRS investigated 110 cases of alleged illegal political activity by churches, charities and nonprofit organizations. They substantiated illegal political activity in 64 of the cases; 48 involved churches.

So far this year, the agency has received 116 complaints, 50 of which were referred for further investigation. Of the 50, 11 involved churches. IRS officials say they expect to receive more complaints about churches before the Nov. 7 elections.

Houses of worship and charitable groups can run afoul of the IRS by violating a tax law that prohibits political intervention by tax-exempt organizations called 501(c)3s. That subsection of the Internal Revenue Code says that churches and organizations cannot "participate in, or intervene in (including the publishing or distributing of statements) any political campaign on behalf of (or in opposition to) any candidate for public office," according to the IRS Web site.

However, religious institutions and charities may conduct certain voter education activities, including presenting public forums and publishing nonpartisan voter education guides. Religious institutions may invite candidates to address their congregations as long as opposing candidates are invited, too.

The law allows churches, synagogues and other places of worship to take positions on public policy issues, including issues that divide candidates in an election. But they must take care to avoid making their advocacy on the issue seem like advocacy for a given candidate, a sometimes murky distinction.

Several religious organizations and leaders have criticized the rules, saying they stifle religious free speech. They contend that individuals or organizations opposed to a particular religious group's ideology or participation in the political process use the law as a weapon by complaining to the IRS and triggering investigations.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State fired a warning shot last month when it sent 117,000 letters to pastors and churches in 11 states where the conservative Christian Coalition is politically active. The letter reminded the ministers about IRS regulations and warned that violating them could cost their churches their tax-exempt status.

Some clergy from liberal and African-American churches said the IRS focuses on their ministries and seems to let other Christian and evangelical groups do whatever they want.

"One would think the IRS is totally nonpartisan, but that is not the case," said former Rep. Floyd Flake, D-N.Y., the senior pastor of the Greater Allen African Methodist Episcopal Church in New York City. The IRS investigated and cleared his church of political wrongdoing after Vice President Al Gore addressed the congregation during the 2000 presidential campaign.

Christian evangelical groups also complain about being unfairly investigated by the IRS.

"I think the evangelical community is being targeted," Scarborough said. "But there are too many moral issues that are making the church and pastors get involved and overcome the terror of the state, the threat of the IRS."

IRS spokeswoman Nancy Mathis said the IRS doesn't get involved in politics when it investigates alleged tax-code violators.

"There's a team of career employees that investigates these cases," she said. "Politics plays no role whatsoever."

GAO Urges Closer Oversight Of Private Tax Collectors (WP)

By Jim Abrams

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

The Internal Revenue Service must improve oversight of a new program that uses private agencies to collect back taxes before it expands the effort, congressional investigators say.

A Government Accountability Office report commended the IRS for addressing some important factors for the success of the program, such as proper training of collection-agency employees, ensuring that taxpayers are treated properly and that taxpayer information is secure.

But it said the agency has not completed critical work on setting goals and determining costs.

The IRS lacks criteria to assess "whether the program performance warrants expanding the number of private collection agencies and turning over more cases to them," the report says.

Critics of the program said yesterday that the GAO report supported arguments that the tax agency was moving quickly to incorporate an unworkable program.

"I've been concerned all along about the use of private contractors to collect federal taxes," said Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee. Baucus and committee chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) requested the GAO study.

"Tax collection is an inherent government function, and the IRS ought to take care of it in house," Baucus said.

The IRS, responding to legislation, initiated the private debt collection program in September, contracting with three companies. The IRS plans to expand the program to up to 12 private agencies, with a goal of collecting $1.4 billion in back taxes over the next decade.

The report cited preliminary IRS data showing that the three companies expected to collect $56 million to $92 million through the end of next year, at a cost of $61 million. Under the program, the private agencies are entitled to up to 24 percent of the tax money they collect.

The IRS program, said Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, "is a direct handout to the private sector, which won't generate an appreciable return to the Treasury and will cost taxpayers money."

IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson, in a statement responding to the GAO report, said he agreed with the recommendations to set more concrete guidelines for the program and said that the agency had begun to carry out those recommendations.

As part of the effort to prevent scams, taxpayers first receive a letter from the IRS that includes the name of the company that will be contacting them about the debt. The firms receive basic background information on the taxpayer but do not have access to tax returns.

Initial Costs Hit IRS Plan To Recover Delinquent Taxes (USAT)

USA Today, November 1, 2006

The IRS could lose money or break even in the first phase of its program to turn some tax debts over to private collection agencies, newly released agency data show.

Fiscal projections in a Government Accountability Office report show the IRS expects to collect $55.8 million to $92 million in the recently started first phase of the private collection effort.

The report shows the IRS estimates initial program costs at nearly $61.2 million — which raises the possibility the agency could lose money by the scheduled December 2008 conclusion of the program's initial phase.

However, the IRS data also project collection revenue of $1.4 billion, dwarfing federal costs of nearly $77.6 million, during a 10-year span of private collections.

The data offer one of the first fiscal looks at this year's selection of three private firms to collect taxes from taxpayers who owe less than $25,000 and have not contested the debts. The firms began contacting an initial group of 12,500 taxpayers in September. They are eventually scheduled to handle about 158,000 cases, according to the IRS. The IRS cost data include the companies' fees; up to 24% of what they collect in overdue taxes.

The program, slated for expansion to as many as nine additional collection companies in 2008, has been repeatedly criticized by some members of Congress and the National Treasury Employees Union, the bargaining unit that represents IRS workers.

Citing the new IRS revenue and cost projections, NTEU President Colleen Kelley said Tuesday, “It is only appropriate that the GAO study is in the news on Oct. 31, since it is so scary for taxpayers.”

“But for the contractors, it reveals a program that is much more like Christmas than Halloween,” Kelley said.

The IRS acknowledged that the upfront cost of technology and implementation could result in an initial budget loss. But the agency stressed that IRS budget projections also forecast a long-term profit for the program.

The GAO report also said the IRS had not adequately developed performance measures to gauge the success or failure of the private collection effort and determine whether it should be expanded.

In response, the IRS said it would continually evaluate its own resources and the performance of the private collection firms as it decides whether to expand the effort.

Harvest Those Stock Losses But Beware Of Common Pitfalls (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

With stock prices posting healthy gains this year, here's a tax tip for millions of investors: This is a good time to consider selling your losers and using those losses to save taxes.

But before pulling the trigger, watch out for nasty tax-law potholes that can jolt even the best-laid plans.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average has gained about 13% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index is up about 7% this year but still is about 53% below its peak in 2000. Many investors still are sitting on painful losses in high-technology issues and other former high fliers purchased during the late 1990s.

Dumping losers now could be a smart strategy for investors in taxable accounts for several reasons. First, losses can be used to offset realized capital gains on a dollar-for-dollar basis. Next, if your capital losses exceed your capital gains, you typically can deduct a net loss of as much as $3,000 a year from your wages and other ordinary income. (For those who are married and filing separately from their spouse, the net-loss limit is $1,500 a year.) Losses above the limit are carried over into future years.

Here's an example: Suppose you file jointly with your spouse and sold stocks earlier this year for a capital gain of $50,000. Now, you sell other stocks you've owned for years at a $53,000 loss. That loss would erase your entire gain and leave you with a net loss of $3,000, which would be deducted from your ordinary income.

Ordinary income is taxed at federal rates as high as 35%, far above the top rate of only 15% on long-term capital gains on stocks, bonds and other securities. "Long-term" refers to gains on securities held more than one year. Short-term gains are taxed as ordinary income.

"You should definitely harvest your tax losses before the end of the year," says M. Holly Isdale, a managing director at Lehman Brothers and head of wealth advisory services. But, she says, be sure to avoid painful tax traps.

For example, watch out for the tricky "wash-sale" rule, which can ensnare even veteran investors who aren't paying attention. A wash sale typically occurs when you sell or trade stock or securities at a loss and buy the same thing, or something "substantially identical," within 30 days. It's important to note that the rule means 30 days before or after the sale.

If you violate the rule, you can't deduct your loss on the sale, the Internal Revenue Service says. Instead, add the disallowed loss to the cost of the new stock or securities, and the result is your basis in the new stock or securities, the IRS says. (For details, see IRS Publication 550.)

To avoid trouble, invest in something different during the specified time period. Or wait until afterward to buy the same stock, or something substantially the same, as the one you sold.

However, it isn't always quite so simple. For example, it isn't entirely clear what the IRS means by "substantially identical." Lawyers long have debated this issue. It's also unclear whether you would be violating the wash-sale rule if you sell a stock at a loss in a taxable account and then buy the same stock shortly thereafter for your Individual Retirement Account. The IRS hasn't issued a formal ruling. But, to be on the safe side, don't do it, several tax advisers say.

Separately, keep in mind another rule of thumb: Don't donate a stock to charity that is selling for less than you paid for it, says Ms. Isdale of Lehman Brothers. Instead, sell that stock at a loss, use the loss to reduce your taxes, and give the proceeds to charity. * * *

THE IRS HAS IMPROVED efforts to check up on taxpayers in partnerships, trusts and S corporations, a report says.

That's a significant change from just a few years ago, when the IRS drew heavy criticism from a congressional investigative agency and some lawmakers for embarrassing blunders in its efforts to combat tax evasion in this area. Since then, the IRS has done a better job but still needs to do more, says a report by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration.

The IRS program involves "document-matching," which means comparing information that people report on their tax returns against what is reported separately to the agency on "Schedule K-1."

That form is supposed to show a taxpayer's share of an enterprise's income, losses, deductions and credits. * * *

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Democrats Propose More Spending For Military And Education (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

As part of their midterm election push, House Democrats are promoting a wide-ranging legislative agenda that would add tens of billions of dollars a year to the federal budget for the military, homeland security and education yet still impose a new budget restraint that would make it harder to widen the annual deficit.

Republicans and budget experts doubt that Democrats could do both simultaneously. When price tags are attached to their six-pronged agenda -- named Six for '06 -- critics say the Democrats will be forced to choose between keeping their pledge of fiscal rectitude and their promises of federal largess.

"There's a trade-off that's being left unspoken here," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a nonpartisan opponent of deficits. "To pay for their new spending, they would have to cut programs, raise taxes or be unable to do what they want."

Republicans also scoff at the plan. ""It's schizophrenia in '06 is what it is," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.), a member of the Budget Committee. "You cannot balance the budget by vastly increasing spending."

This week, President Bush blistered Democratic policies and argued that voters would be better off if they kept Republicans in charge of Congress. He charged in a series of speeches that the Democrats would undermine America's fight against terrorism and would raise taxes if they won congressional majorities on Nov. 7.

Democratic leaders dispute the accusation and have been talking up Six for '06. The plan would allocate billions of dollars to build up the military, subsidize student loans and bolster port security. It would raise the minimum wage, make college tuition payments tax-deductible, repeal oil-company tax breaks and expand incentives for personal savings accounts, among many other provisions.

The program would prohibit the House from approving new spending or tax measures that widen the budget deficit. It would do that by restoring budget rules requiring that all future spending increases and tax cuts be offset by equivalent tax hikes or spending cuts.

"It's a road map to how Democrats would govern" if they win a majority in the House, said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.).

The agenda represents a consensus between the House Democrats' disparate factions. The final plan came together this summer after numerous meetings among Pelosi, other Democratic leaders and Democrats from the liberal, conservative and business-oriented factions of the party, as well as the Congressional Black Caucus and Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

In putting the agenda together, Democrats dropped several proposals that proved too controversial or costly, such as broad and expensive relief from the alternative minimum tax, which threatens to raise taxes on middle-income earners; filling a major gap, or "doughnut hole," in prescription-drug coverage under Medicare, which would cost $427 billion over 10 years; and rolling back Bush's tax cuts for wealthy Americans.

The final product contains plenty of pricey measures, including a commitment to "rebuild a state-of-the-art military capable of projecting power wherever necessary." The plan would also double the size of the military's special forces.

No dollar value is assigned to the provisions. But if Special Forces double through additions to the military and not through a reshuffling of personnel, that would mean 35,000 new active-duty troops and 15,000 reservists, at a minimum cost of about $5.8 billion a year, said Steven M. Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

To fortify the Army, several Democrats have proposed increasing troop levels by 40,000 at a five-year cost of $20 billion, the Congressional Budget Office said.

On the home front, House Democrats would tighten border and port security by screening all containers that enter the country -- a multi-billion-dollar project. The plan would also step up training and equipping National Guard forces and first responders.

A 2004 study by the Council on Foreign Relations estimated that covering the budgetary shortfall for first responders alone would take a fivefold increase in funds, to $25 billion from $5.4 billion a year.

The Democrats' plan would boost federal spending on college education. It would allow some families to write off their children's college tuition payments (up to $3,000 per student), a now-expired tax break that cost the government $4.7 billion in revenue last year.

Democrats also hope to expand federal assistance for needy students under the Pell Grant program and to cut in half interest rates for federal student loans. House Budget Committee Republicans have put the cost of the interest rate cut at $60 billion over five years. Democrats said the cost would be lower, but not by much.

Other pieces of the agenda appear to be paid for, and Democrats are proposing policy changes that would raise substantial revenue. They would couple a minimum-wage increase to ending tax breaks that they say reward companies for sending jobs overseas. Under a plan set out by Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry in 2004, U.S.-based companies would be forced to pay taxes immediately on virtually all foreign profits that are not taxed by another country, raising $12 billion a year.

The Six for '06 plan would promote renewable energy sources and would fund the effort by cutting tax subsidies to oil and gas companies. According to Bush's budget, $1.83 billion in tax breaks will go to oil and gas companies next year to subsidize energy exploration and development.

The biggest savings in the Democrats' plan would be a pledge to give the federal government the authority to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) have estimated that Medicare could save $190 billion over the next decade if the seniors' program adopted the price-negotiating model of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

To finance any remaining budget shortfall created by the agenda, Crider said Democrats would tap the vast amount of tax revenue owed to, but uncollected by, the government -- the "tax gap," which has been projected at $300 billion a year. Crider was not specific about how that money would be brought in except to say that the Internal Revenue Service would be given more manpower.

In his last budget, Bush also recommended closing the tax gap, but nothing came of his suggestion.

Some Democrats acknowledge that compromises are likely to be needed on the spending side of Six for '06 to make good on its pledge to restore strict budget rules -- the "pay as you go," or "paygo," requirement for offsetting tax cuts or spending hikes.

"The Blue Dogs are very strong on paygo," said John S. Tanner (Tenn.), a leader of the conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats. "If you have to cut spending, you have to cut spending."

Specter Of Tax Man Haunts Democrats (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The Next Congress

Third of five parts

Repealing President Bush's tax cuts and boosting social-welfare spending have been the meat and potatoes of the Democrats' campaigns since the 2002 election, and they would be in a position to attempt both if they win control of Congress next week.

Mr. Bush has been warning in campaign speeches across the country that the Democrats "will raise your taxes" if voters put them in power, and Republican leaders have been making similar charges as Election Day draws closer.

Democrats have an outside chance of taking complete control of Congress, but a better chance of winning one chamber, and in this series, The Washington Times will look at how such a transfer of power will affect U.S. policy and politics.

House Minority Leader "Nancy Pelosi and congressional Democrats want the president's tax-relief measures to expire, raising taxes on millions of Americans," House Republican Whip Roy Blunt said last week.

Fearing Mr. Bush's warnings about higher taxes could drive more people to vote Republican next week, Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, released a statement Friday saying: "Nothing could be further from the truth. Democrats have a long history of supporting targeted relief for middle-income families."

Mr. Rangel would be in line to run the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win a majority in the House.

Recent polls show that most Americans expect Democrats to raise their taxes and increase spending for new big-ticket programs such as health care for the uninsured.

A USA Today/Gallup Poll reported last week that 63 percent of Americans surveyed think Democrats are likely to "increase federal income taxes" if they win control of Congress -- though 74 percent said they disapprove of it.

Past the rhetoric

Mr. Rangel, a fierce critic of the Bush tax cuts, said one of his priorities will be "to close tax shelters and eliminate benefits for companies that move jobs overseas," moves that businesses fear would raise their taxes and reduce profits.

He also said that 2010, when the bulk of the tax cuts expire, is "light-years away from the debate before us, and we have no way of knowing what the economy or even our country's leadership will look like at that time."

Despite Mr. Rangel's promise that Democrats would reach out to Republicans and the White House "to find common ground," Republican tax-cutters point out that he told Bloomberg News several weeks ago that he could not think of one of Mr. Bush's tax cuts that deserved to be extended

But Democratic policy advisers say that despite their campaign rhetoric, many of the Bush tax cuts are supported by Democrats, including the $1,000 child tax credit, marriage penalty relief and lower tax rates for middle-income families.

One of the changes in the tax rates that Mr. Bush enacted was a lower 10 percent tax rate for workers at the bottom of the income scale, a tax-cut provision that the Democrats "would not want to eliminate," a House Democratic staffer said.

"I can't see Democrats opposing the rates that are being paid at the bottom two-thirds of the tax code. Democrats are for taxing the super-rich, though it is yet to be defined where super-richdom begins," said Robert Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, a nonpartisan economic and social policy research group.

Still, Republicans who have worked with Mr. Rangel in the House say they are a little suspicious of his ultimate goals.

"He's a master politician, but when he talks about everything on the table and tax cuts for the middle class, my eyes begin to widen. When you start targeting tax cuts to a class of people, you are entering the arena of redistribution of wealth," said former Rep. Jack Kemp, a tax-cut crusader who was the architect of the Reagan tax cuts in the 1980s.

Checks and balances

Senior Democratic advisers say that whatever Mr. Rangel might be planning, major tax and spending changes are unlikely to happen because of a number of institutional obstacles that would be extremely hard for the Democrats to overcome, especially in what is likely to remain a narrowly divided Congress.

"I don't see any dramatic changes in taxes or dramatic increases in spending if you want to know the truth. A lot of this fear talk is part of the campaign," said Leon Panetta, former House Budget Committee chairman and Clinton chief of staff.

"Everybody is saying that all of these things will happen, but there will be checks in the system. The fact is that Bush is still going to be president, with his veto, and the Senate, which could be split 50-50, will act as a barrier as well," Mr. Panetta said.

With his veto power, Mr. Bush would be the biggest obstacle to rolling back any part of the tax cuts, and it would be very difficult for Democrats to win the two-thirds vote needed to override a veto in a narrowly divided House or Senate, former congressional officials said. The Senate filibuster, which requires 60 votes to break, is another big political hurdle that conservative Republicans say would be used to block Democratic tax-and-spend proposals.

How the coming tax-and-spend battle plays out will depend upon "how the White House intends to play its cards" and how much Democrats are prepared to fight for their agenda, said Mr. Reischauer, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office (CBO).

"If push comes to shove, we are going to end up with some significant part of the tax cuts extended. We are not going to revert to the 2000 tax code before Bush. Neither is it likely that we will extend all of the tax cuts that have been enacted since 2000," he said.

Pricey plans

But Republicans such as former House Majority Leader Dick Armey of Texas said that if the Democrats take over, "they will try to find some way to raise taxes to finance their spending programs."

Democrats gave voters a peek into the kind of spending proposals they want to enact in their election agenda titled "A New Direction For America." The campaign agenda does not say how much their proposals would cost, but an analysis by the National Taxpayers Union based in part on CBO estimates puts the price tag at more than $79 billion a year.

These legislative proposals include $16.2 billion a year for lower-interest college loans, nearly $1 billion more per year for scientific research, $4 billion in additional Pell Grants for college students and $28.8 billion more for health care, including increased subsidies for the Medicare prescription-drug program for the elderly.

Perhaps one of the biggest spending initiatives in the Democrats' agenda is a program called "AmeriSave," under which the government will match the first $1,000 contributed to an IRA, 401(k) or other investment retirement account. The program would cost taxpayers $37.5 billion in the first five years.

Another measurement of spending increases a Democratic Congress would seek can be found in amendments they have offered in the Senate in the past two years. According to an analysis by the Senate Republican Policy Committee, Senate Democrats proposed $95.2 billion in increased spending for fiscal 2006 and $74 billion for fiscal 2007.

Mr. Panetta blames both Republicans and Democrats for the sizable budget deficits of the past six years and does not see that changing dramatically anytime soon, despite this year's sharp decline in the deficits as a result of unexpectedly stronger federal tax revenues.

"This Congress has been the worst on borrowing and spending that I've seen in my lifetime, with record deficits. Responsibility for that rests with both parties. My theory is that they will continue to borrow and spend in the future," he said.

Rangel Says No Animosity To Cheney (AP-Y)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, November 1, 2006

Rep. Charles Rangel feels bad — but not too bad — about directing a curse word at Vice President Dick Cheney.

Rangel, a Harlem Democrat who regularly exchanges verbal volleys with the vice president, called Cheney a "son of a b...." on Monday when asked by the New York Post about comments Cheney made about him in a television interview.

He repeated his comments in an interview with The Associated Press on Tuesday, but added, "I shouldn't have said it."

"I thought that he should be flattered, there's certainly no animosity in it," said Rangel, saying he had been making an observation about Cheney. "Some people just have that as part of their personality."

Cheney's spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride declined to address Rangel's off-color language.

"The vice president is going to continue to talk about the clear record on taxes — Republicans voting to lower taxes ... and he's also going to continue to talk about the Democrats' position on taxes," said McBride.

Rangel's name is invoked regularly by Republicans seeking to retain control of the House of Representatives in next week's midterm elections. If Democrats gain 15 seats to become the majority party, Rangel would become chairman of the powerful tax-writing Ways & Means Committee.

GOP leaders contend a Rangel-led committee would immediately move to undo the Bush administration tax cuts now set to expire in 2010.

Rangel said the charge is ridiculous, and he has not made any decisions about it.

"They can't get me to say I'm going to extend it. I say that just makes good economic sense to see what the status is of our economy before we start projecting what tax cuts we'll have in the future," said Rangel, dean of New York's congressional delegation.

In televised interviews Monday, Cheney told CNBC that Rangel wouldn't keep "a single one" of Bush's tax cuts, and he later told Fox News Channel: "Charlie doesn't understand how the economy works."

More than a year ago, Rangel said he would like to think Cheney is "sick rather than just mean and evil," prompting Cheney to answer: "Charlie is losing it, I guess."

Appeals Court Hears Taped-call Dispute (AP-Y)

By Matthew Daly

AP, November 1, 2006

A lawyer for Democratic Rep. Jim McDermott told a federal appeals court Tuesday that McDermott should not be punished for giving reporters access to an illegally taped telephone call involving House Republican leaders.

In arguments that evoked the Pentagon Papers and other press freedom cases, lawyer Christopher Landau said McDermott had merely received the tape from a Florida couple and therefore had done nothing wrong.

A finding against McDermott could chill the news media's ability to gather information on important public issues, Landau said.

"It's hard to overstate the impact of the case on the media," he said.

Lawyers for 18 news organizations — including ABC, NBC, CBS, CNN, The Associated Press, The New York Times and The Washington Post — have filed a brief backing McDermott, a Democrat from Washington state who gave reporters a recording of a 1996 call involving then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled against McDermott in March. The 2-1 opinion upheld a lower court ruling that McDermott had violated the rights of Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, who was heard on the 1996 call. Boehner was then a Gingrich lieutenant and is now House majority leader.

The full nine-member appeals court vacated the ruling this spring and heard new arguments in the case on Tuesday. A ruling is expected next year.

Boehner's lawyer, Michael Carvin, told the court that McDermott's actions were clearly illegal. He compared McDermott to a "fence" who received stolen goods and then sold them.

McDermott's actions were especially egregious because he received the tape in his capacity as a House ethics committee member who was sworn to confidentiality, Carvin said.

Judge David S. Tatel said that under Carvin's interpretation, the New York Times and other newspapers that published the contents of the tape could be held liable.

"The argument to extend it to the New York Times is quite powerful," Tatel said.

"I'm not representing the New York Times," Carvin retorted. "I'm perfectly happy to throw them overboard."

But Landau said a ruling against McDermott would be disastrous for a free press.

"You are basically saying Congress can indict the media if it is deemed they knew the information was unlawfully obtained," he said.

The case is Boehner v. McDermott, 04-7203.

Background Checks Take Too Much Time, GAO Says (WP)

By Stephen Barr

DOJ_NMG_0089401

The Bush administration appears at risk of missing a deadline set by Congress aimed at shortening the time it takes to investigate federal employees and contractors for security clearances and determine whether they can be trusted with classified information.

The 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act requires that 80 percent of all security clearances be completed in an average of 120 days. The law's goals include improved analytical methods at national security agencies, an effort that requires timely processing of security clearances to expand the workforces at 16 intelligence agencies.

But a report issued by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional watchdog agency, suggests that the administration could miss the Dec. 17 deadline for timely processing of security clearances stipulated in the 2004 law.

For its study, the GAO looked at a small but important group of people seeking security clearances -- government contract employees applying for top-secret clearances. The private-sector employees waited more than a year on average to receive their top-secret clearances, the GAO found.

The GAO examined 2,259 cases of industry personnel granted top-secret clearances in January and February of this year. The clearance process took an average of 446 days for an initial clearance and 545 days for a clearance update, the GAO said.

About 90 percent of the government's background investigations are conducted by the Office of Personnel Management. The Defense Department uses information from the background checks to grant about 80 percent of security clearances, including those for contract workers at Defense and 23 other federal agencies.

The ranks of contractors in the defense and intelligence communities have grown since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as agencies have moved to strengthen homeland security. As of May, contract workers held about 34 percent of the 2.5 million clearances granted by the Defense Department, the GAO noted.

Linda M. Springer , director of the OPM, faulted the GAO report, calling it "based on outdated information." She said the handling of many of the cases covered in the report had been slowed by a 2005 agreement with the Pentagon to consolidate personnel security investigations at the OPM. "The GAO's critical findings do not accurately reflect the current state of affairs," Springer said.

The cases examined by the GAO turned up problems that may be continuing, however. The GAO found that the OPM's "current methods do not fully capture and portray the time required to obtain a clearance."

The OPM, which has scrambled to increase its staff to keep pace with requests for background checks on government workers, relies on "an inexperienced investigative workforce" and cannot always use technology to shorten processing time because some data must be entered into computer systems from paper applications, the GAO said.

Background checks also are delayed because OPM investigators have problems getting access to some criminal and employment records at state and local levels, the GAO said.

In its review, the GAO turned up troubling signs that some top-secret clearances are based on incomplete investigative reports. A study of 50 investigative reports found 47 were missing data required by federal rules, the GAO said.

One person under investigation acknowledged having extramarital affairs, but the GAO found no documentation showing that the affairs had been investigated. Investigators also found that the person had defaulted on a loan worth several thousand dollars but did not explore the issue further, the GAO said.

Other background reports lacked information on where applicants worked and lived, their overseas trips, and their personal conduct, the GAO said.

"The use of incomplete investigations and adjudications in the granting of top secret clearance eligibility increases the risk of unauthorized disclosure of classified information," the GAO said.

Clay Johnson III , deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, said in a letter to the GAO that he will convene a working group to study the issue. The quality of background investigations, he wrote, "is of paramount importance."

Pelosi's Unintelligent Choice (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

DOJ_NMG_0089402

If Democrats win control of the House next week, Nancy Pelosi's first test as speaker will arrive long before the 110th Congress convenes. Her choice to head the House intelligence committee -- unlike other House committees, this one is left entirely up to the party leadership -- will speak volumes about whether a Speaker Pelosi will be able to resist a return to paint-by-numbers Democratic Party interest-group politics as usual.

Pelosi is in a box of her own devising. The panel's ranking Democrat is her fellow Californian Jane Harman -- smart and hardworking but also abrasive, ambitious and, in Pelosi's estimation, insufficiently partisan on the committee. So Pelosi, once the intelligence panel's ranking Democrat herself, has made clear that she doesn't intend to name Harman to the chairmanship.

The wrong decision, in my view, but one that's magnified by the unfortunate fact that next in line is Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings. In 1989, after being acquitted in a criminal trial, Hastings was stripped of his position as a federal judge -- impeached by the House in which he now serves and convicted by the Senate -- for conspiring to extort a $150,000 bribe in a case before him, repeatedly lying about it under oath and manufacturing evidence at his trial.

Ordinarily, that might doom Hastings's chances, but the situation is further inflamed by racial politics: Hastings is African American, and the Congressional Black Caucus has made it clear that it will not tolerate his rejection. Another black lawmaker, Georgia's Sanford Bishop, was passed over to accommodate Harman, who reclaimed her seniority when she returned to Congress in 2000 after a gubernatorial run. And the black caucus is still smarting over Pelosi's move to oust Louisiana's William J. Jefferson from the Ways and Means Committee after the FBI found a freezerful of cash in Jefferson's home.

Pelosi has floated the notion of naming the intelligence committee's third-ranking Democrat, Texan Silvestre Reyes, who is Hispanic, but that's not flying with the black caucus. "The CBC would not look kindly on that," caucus spokeswoman Myra Dandridge told The Post's Jonathan Weisman. "The first order of business of the CBC chairman would be to protect his members, and Alcee Hastings has the seniority, the knowledge and the experience to be chairman of the intelligence committee."

True -- and still he shouldn't get the job.

The events occurred so long ago (the alleged conspiracy took place in 1981), the facts are so complex and the outcomes so antithetical (the jury acquitted Hastings; the judicial panel that investigated him, the House and the Senate concluded the opposite) that it's tempting to simply let bygones be bygones. After all, Hastings has been in Congress since 1992, on the intelligence committee since 1999. I don't worry that as chairman he'd suddenly be up for sale: If he could be entrusted with national security secrets as a committee member, why not as chairman?

But this was no ordinary crime, and Intelligence is no ordinary committee.

"My goodness gracious, when does it end? When does it end?" Hastings asked me yesterday in a long telephone interview. "It's no way that I can prove a negative. I can't go back and try to establish for everybody alive my bona fides. I've earned my stripes and I suffered through 9 3/4 years that would have crushed the average person, and fortunately for me I was not the kind of person that was crushed."

It's impossible not to like Hastings. But as someone who covered his impeachment and Senate trial, I can't get past the facts of the case, which convince me that Hastings did indeed agree to conspire with a close friend, a prominent Washington lawyer named William A. Borders Jr., to solicit the bribe. Borders was convicted of the bribery scheme in a separate trial, and he served additional time for contempt rather than testify in the congressional proceedings.

The evidence against Hastings is circumstantial, but it's too much to explain away: a suspicious pattern of telephone calls between Hastings and Borders at key moments in the case; Borders's apparent insider knowledge of developments in the criminal case; Hastings's appearance at a Miami hotel, as promised by Borders as a signal that the judge had agreed to the payoff; a cryptic telephone conversation between the two men that appears to be a coded discussion of the bribe arrangement.

Consider: Hastings, a federal judge, gets word from Borders's lawyer that Borders has been arrested for conspiring to bribe him and that the FBI wants to interview him. Instead of calling the FBI agents whose names and numbers he's been given, Hastings leaves his hotel without checking out and heads to the airport outside Baltimore instead of National, where there's an earlier flight. At BWI, Hastings calls his girlfriend, has her call him back at a different pay phone, then asks her to leave the house to call him from a pay phone, then calls her back from a different pay phone. He doesn't speak to the FBI until they track him down at the girlfriend's house later that night.

College Aid Cutbacks (NYT)

Pell Grants are one of the largest sources of federal help for low-income college students, and the most valuable form of aid, because the money doesn't have to be paid back. But the level of aid is increasingly out of sync with the level of need.

Last week, the College Board reported that Pell Grants fell last year, for the first time in six years. The cuts were about $100 a year per recipient, on average, and came on top of other miserliness. It's been four years since Congress last increased the maximum annual Pell Grant — by a mere $50 — bringing the top grant for a student who has no parental support to $4,050. Meanwhile, college costs are up 35 percent from five years ago. Tuition and fees at a typical four-year public university are closing in on $6,000 this year.

The recent cutbacks were set in motion in 2004, when the Department of Education reduced the number of students deemed eligible for Pell Grants and the amounts they were qualified to receive. Pell Grants now cover about a third of the average costs at a four-year public school, compared with 42 percent five years ago.

Government loans also have not kept pace with rising costs. Subsidized loans accounted for only 55 percent of student borrowing in the most recent academic year, down from 69 percent 10 years earlier.

Bush administration officials have said repeatedly that the solution to the nation's growing income inequality is more education. That's a gross oversimplification, but if they really believed it — and cared about a remedy — would federal college aid be declining? As things stand, privatization of college lending is the administration goal that is being advanced. As government aid has declined, loans from banks and other private lenders have soared, climbing to 20 percent of all education borrowing last year, up from 12 percent five years earlier.

The result is towering debt. The same bachelor's degree will cost a student borrower far more than a student who can afford to pay. That's not a path to greater equality.

The Amazing Hubble Telescope (NYT)

The space agency's finest scientific instrument escaped a death sentence yesterday when Michael Griffin, the NASA administrator, approved a shuttle mission to service and upgrade the Hubble Space Telescope. It was a brave call, since repairing the Hubble will put the shuttle at greater risk than a typical mission to the International Space Station. It was also a welcome sign that NASA is willing to go the extra orbital mile to support superb science, even while it squanders large sums on completing the space station to perform research that can't begin to compare with the Hubble's in importance.

For a decade and a half, the Hubble has made discoveries that have helped revolutionize our understanding of the universe. Its typical role is to pick up a hint from ground-based telescopes and then use its unparalleled vantage point above the atmosphere to probe deeply into some puzzling phenomenon. The Hubble has peered farther into space and farther back in time than any other instrument. It has discovered more than 500 proto-galaxies that emitted light when the universe was in its formative stages, confirmed the jaw-dropping discovery that the expansion of the universe is accelerating, and helped establish the rate of expansion and the age of the universe.

A panel of distinguished astronomers judged that the Hubble "has arguably had a greater impact on astronomy than any instrument since the original astronomical telescope of Galileo." And what made all of this possible was NASA's willingness to refurbish the Hubble every few years to replace depleted batteries and gyroscopes and install new equipment. Many experts believe that when the Hubble gets two state-of-the-art instruments on the next servicing mission in 2008 it will be more capable than ever, ready to peer farther back into a time when galaxies were forming and the universe was emerging from darkness into light.

The threat to the Hubble's future came unexpectedly from NASA itself in early 2004. In a decision that can only be described as myopic, Sean O'Keefe, the administrator at the time, unexpectedly canceled the next servicing mission, ostensibly because of safety concerns after the Columbia disaster. But the underlying reason was almost certainly that a Hubble mission would be a diversion from the administration's priorities to complete the space station and then send astronauts back to the Moon and eventually Mars. Only intervention by Congress and the National Academy of Sciences kept the death sentence at bay.

Now Mr. Griffin has concluded that the mission can be conducted safely, especially since NASA has developed new inspection and orbital repair techniques, and that the mission will not interfere with other space priorities. A Hubble mission may be marginally more risky than a flight to the space station, but that risk is surely worth taking for the scientific payoff.

No mission of NASA's shuttle has been more exciting or successful than the one in 1993, when astronauts repaired the Hubble Space Telescope. After 11 days in orbit and a record five spacewalks, the crew of Endeavour replaced flawed components that had rendered Hubble's pictures blurry.

In so doing they made the telescope all it was supposed to be: a spectacularly powerful window on the universe that could deliver crisp and breathtaking images of far-off galaxies.

Astronauts have been back to the Hubble three more times. But the most important trip since 1993 will likely come in 2008. On Tuesday, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin announced a final service call to Hubble, reversing a decision by his predecessor, Sean O'Keefe, who had opted to let the space telescope die within the next few years rather than approve a mission that was seen as particularly risky after the Columbia disaster. This new mission will upgrade key parts and extend Hubble's life to about 2013.

Griffin made the right call. This mission poses more risks than most, but preserving one of NASA's most successful programs warrants it. The shuttle, moreover, has no other major duties besides completing the International Space Station, a program that faces an iffy future.

The shuttle's relationship with Hubble underscores a powerful irony. The shuttle never succeeded in its mission of dramatically increasing the human presence in space. That is because human space flight was, is, and likely will remain extraordinarily expensive and dangerous. But the shuttle has done one thing fabulously well: nurture one of NASA's most popular robotic programs.

Robotic missions were once secondary to the more glamorous manned missions. Now programs such as Hubble, and the Spirit and Opportunity rovers exploring Mars, are the stars while human space flight is in a prolonged identity crisis.

The shuttle is slated to die in 2010, largely unloved. Griffin said last year in a meeting with USA TODAY's editorial board that it had been a mistake. The space station has failed to deliver much science or enthusiasm and has been orphaned by the Bush administration. The current plan, to send astronauts back to the moon and on to Mars, is based on the dubious premise that it can rekindle interest in human space flight by retracing small steps and giant leaps made more than 30 years ago.

If future Congresses or presidents pull the plug on this program, there may still be a role for astronauts — as cosmic repairmen.

Consumer Confidence Data Soften Rally (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, November 1, 2006

More hand-wringing over the health of consumer spending caused another lackluster day for stocks Tuesday.

A weaker-than-expected Conference Board report on consumer confidence prompted some investors to lose their gusto for the October stock market rally. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 5.77 points to 12,080.73. Even so, the Dow is still up 12.7% for the year.

The two other major market indexes eked out small gains. The Nasdaq composite index added 2.94 points to 2366.71, pushing it up 7.3% this year.

Some worry too many investors were jumping on the market rally and losing sight of the fact that there are still some risks facing stocks and the economy. “The market got too saturated with buyers a few weeks ago,” says Chris Johnson at Schaeffer's Investment Research. He is concerned stocks in some leading industry groups, such as semiconductors, have been stalling. But he's not calling for big trouble yet. “I'm cautiously optimistic,” he says.

Gary Tapp, director of quantitative analysis at SunTrust Robinson Humphrey, says a pullback was overdue. “There's no question that the market got a little extended,” he says.

The rally was justified, Tapp says, due to a 22% decline in the price of oil and the Federal Reserve pausing its short-term interest rate increases. But a pullback, of about 3%, would be appropriate. “It went up too fast,” he says.

Highlights:

Trammel Crow, a commercial real estate company, jumped $9.65 to $48.75 after rival CB Richard Ellis agreed to buy it for $49.51 a share.

•Avanir Pharmaceuticals, a developer of disease treatments, tanked $3.42, or 46.2%, to $3.98. The company received an “approvable letter” from the Food and Drug Administration for its Zenvia treatment for emotional disorders. The letter was a disappointment to investors who were expecting the company to get an approval.

Dow Industrials Ease But Still Post Best Monthly Gain In Nearly A Year (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Stocks fell in the morning on more worries about consumer spending, then recovered in the afternoon as end-of-month buying kicked in. The result was little change for the day -- but a big gain for October.

Amid continued hopes for low interest rates and moderate economic growth, the Dow Jones Industrial Average ended with a monthly gain of 3.4% -- the best monthly gain since November 2005. The Dow average has risen for four straight months, and was up in eight of 10 months this year.

For the day, the Dow industrials fell 5.77 points, or 0.05%, to 12080.73, still up 12.7% for 2006, and within sight of the record 12163.66 close reached last week.

Early in the day, investors learned that the Conference Board's measure of consumer confidence unexpectedly declined in October, raising fresh fears of lackluster holiday spending. A measure of manufacturing growth in the Chicago area also came in weaker than expected.

But as the Dow industrials neared the 12000 level during the day, stocks bounced back. Part of the reason was a belief that the economy is headed for the much-desired "Goldilocks" scenario -- with inflation not too hot and growth not too cold. That would support sustained growth and profits, and might even lead the Federal Reserve to cut interest rates, investors hope.

Mutual-fund companies, meanwhile, reached the end of their fiscal years. Some money managers were required by internal guidelines to be fully invested, and some used the Dow average's fall toward 12000 as an opportunity to buy stocks cheaply. That helped the market recover.

With third-quarter earnings season nearing an end, investors are wondering what the next driver will be for stock prices. "People know that interest rates aren't going higher, so the next driver is the economy," said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at New York brokerage firm Cowen & Co. "Slow growth isn't bad -- so the market could continue to move higher," he said, as long as the economy doesn't go in a ditch.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished virtually unchanged -- up 0.01 point -- at 1377.94, strengthening by 3.2% for the month and 10.4% in 2006. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 2.94 points, or 0.12%, to 2366.71, advancing 4.8% in October and 7.3% this year. Neither is near its record finish, both of which date from 2000.

Small stocks outpaced large ones in October, with the Russell 2000 small-stock index up 5.7%. It eased 0.46% yesterday, to 766.84, but is up 13.9% in 2006.

Stocks were helped last month by falling oil and gasoline prices, which took pressure off consumers and businesses. Crude-oil futures fell 6.6% in October and are off 3.8% in 2006, although they rose 37 cents to $58.73 a barrel yesterday.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 1.77 points, or 0.78%, to 228.60.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 1,682 stocks rose and 1,622 fell.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note gained 16/32, or $5 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.610%. The 30-year bond rose 31/32 to yield 4.721%.

The dollar weakened. Late in New York, it traded at 116.96 yen, down from 117.40 yen, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2763 from $1.2730.

Employment Costs Rise Faster, Adding To Inflation Concerns (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Employment costs gained in the third quarter at their fastest pace in more than two years, a development likely to keep Federal Reserve officials on edge about inflationary risks to the economy.

The employment-cost index rose 1% during the quarter after gaining 0.9% in the second quarter, the Labor Department reported. Employment costs were 3.3% higher than a year earlier, up from a 3% increase the previous quarter.

Since labor is the biggest expense for many businesses, the report suggests rising labor costs have the potential to keep underlying inflation high despite the recent drop in energy prices. "Labor costs remain a thorn in the side of the Fed's forecast for easing inflation pressures," wrote Gina Martin, an economist at Wachovia Corp., in a research note.

The Fed has kept its target for short-term interest rates unchanged at 5.25% for its past three meetings but has kept a bias toward higher rates should inflation persist.

Despite the upward pressure on prices apparent in yesterday's report, many economists expect the Fed to hold rates steady into 2007. "I think this Fed is committed to the current levels of rates because they think it'll slow the economy enough that over time it will ease inflationary pressures," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisers. "They need at least six more months to get a picture on whether their policy is working."

The pickup in employment costs, the fastest quarterly rise since the second quarter of 2004, was driven largely by compensation gains for state- and local-government workers. Private-sector employers have reduced their health-care and retirement obligations more aggressively than has the public sector. Benefit costs for state and local governments in the third quarter were 5.2% higher than a year earlier, while private-sector employers saw a smaller 2.8% rise.

Separately, the Conference Board, a private research group in New York, said its measure of consumer confidence fell slightly to 105.4 in October from 105.9 in September. Lynn Franco, the group's director of consumer research, said a mixed assessment of business conditions and a less favorable view of the job market caused the modest decline in overall sentiment.

Consumers' view of the current economic situation dimmed, and the proportion of consumers expecting their incomes to increase in the months ahead fell. The share of consumers saying jobs are "plentiful" declined, while the proportion saying jobs are "hard to get" rose.

Other gauges of consumer confidence advanced in October, and the Conference Board's measure of future economic conditions rose to its highest level in nearly a year.

As Vote Nears, Stances On War Set Off Sparks (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Jim Rutenberg

WASHINGTON, Oct. 31 — For at least a few hours on Tuesday, President Bush had a chance to relive his victorious campaign of 2004, taking a break from a bleak Republican campaign season as he attacked Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts over the war in Iraq.

Mr. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was Mr. Bush's opponent in 2004, is not running for office this year. But the president seized on what he said were Mr. Kerry's disparaging remarks about the troops — and what Mr. Kerry insisted was a botched joke aimed at Mr. Bush — as he sought to make Mr. Kerry the face of the Democratic Party this fall.

In the process, Mr. Bush brought renewed attention to the war in Iraq, which he defended with vigor while campaigning in Georgia, at the very moment that a number of Republican Congressional candidates, following the advice of party strategists, were stepping up their efforts to distance themselves from the White House on the war as the campaign enters its final days.

"President Bush isn't getting our frustrations — it's time to be decisive, beat the terrorists," Mike McGavick, the Republican candidate for Senate in Washington, said in an advertisement that began running this week. "Partition the country if we have to and get our troops home in victory."

In Rhode Island on Tuesday, Senator Lincoln Chafee, a Republican struggling against a challenge from Sheldon Whitehouse, an antiwar Democrat, began a new television advertisement reminding Rhode Island voters, "I stood against the Senate and president and voted no" on the war.

In a debate a day earlier, Mr. Chafee indicated he would be willing to call on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to step down; Mr. Whitehouse has been pressing Mr. Chafee to do just that in his television advertisements. In Tennessee, Bob Corker, a Republican candidate for Senate, said it was time for a new plan and a change in leadership at the Pentagon.

In New Jersey, Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican challenging Senator Robert Menendez, has started a new advertisement that says he wants to "change the course in Iraq; Replace Rumsfeld." In Indiana, John Hostettler, a Republican congressman, reminds voters in his latest advertisement that he voted against the invasion of Iraq because "the intelligence did not support the claim that there were weapons of mass destruction there."

To date, none of the Republicans who have spoken out have called for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, and some had expressed previous reservations about the war or opposed it initially. But their willingness to break so publicly with the White House in the closing days of the campaign — in some cases, with the active encouragement of the some of the party's own strategists — is evidence of the extent to which they view the war in Iraq as a lethal issue this fall.

It is especially striking because Mr. Bush has defended the war, and attacked Democrats over it, with increasing force in the last several days.

The mounting death toll in Iraq over the last month and apparent differences between the United States and the Iraqi government over how to proceed have given Democrats new opportunities to criticize Mr. Bush's handling of the conflict and make the case that electing a Democratic Congress is the first step toward finding a solution.

Across the country, Democrats are broadcasting television advertisements that feature battle scenes and photographs of their Republican opponent with Mr. Bush as they call for sharp changes in the Iraq strategy.

"We have certainly advised candidates to not appear that they are marching in lock step with the administration in terms of how the Iraq war is being conducted," a senior Republican Party Senate strategist said, insisting on anonymity in exchange for disclosing political advice being given to candidates. "If you aren't speaking out against the way that this war has been conducted, you are dead in the water."

"The candidates have been in a tough position for some time," this party official said. "The way that has been enunciated before — stay the course versus cut and run — any changes to that are certainly welcome."

In attacking Mr. Kerry and defending the war, the White House clearly made the calculation that achieving what has been its main strategic goal this year — firing up a dispirited conservative base — would outweigh any risk that might come in spotlighting a war that Republican Party officials said had become a huge burden for its candidates. The White House took the unusual step of releasing advance excerpts of Mr. Bush's attacks.

In his remarks in California on Monday, Mr. Kerry said: "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Mr. Kerry said that he botched a joke that his aides said had been prepared as follows: "Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush."

Mr. Bush, speaking to a cheering crowd at a campaign rally late Tuesday afternoon in a half-empty arena at the Georgia National Fairgrounds in Perry, said Mr. Kerry had insulted the intelligence of Americans troops.

"The senator's suggestion that the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated is insulting, and it is shameful," he said. "The members of the United States military are plenty smart and they are plenty brave, and the senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology."

Mention of Senator Kerry's name drew boos, which were amplified after Mr. Bush quoted his remarks.

Mr. Kerry, a Vietnam veteran, called a news conference in which he accused Mr. Bush of twisting his words for political gain. "The White House's attempt to distort my true statement is a remarkable testament to their abject failure in making America safe," he said. "It's a stunning statement about their willingness to reduce anything in America to raw politics."

Some Democrats were quick to distance themselves from the man who had been their standard-bearer just two years ago.

"This is an example of politics at its worst," said Scott Kleeb, a Democratic candidate for Congress in Nebraska. "Many of us have serious concerns over the current situation in Iraq, but no one should question the intelligence and dedication of our troops. Senator Kerry's remark was disrespectful and insulting."

Still, at least some of the students who attended Mr. Kerry's speech at Pasadena City College said they did not think the senator was belittling troops.

"I don't think he was saying our soldiers are dummies," said Natalie Courtney, 21, the student body president, who said she was an independent. "I think he was saying you have to protect yourself. The current government does not have our best interest in mind. Don't let the government lie to you."

But Charles Huang, 19, a sophomore who described himself as one of the few conservatives at the college, said he was offended by the comment and thought Mr. Kerry did owe American troops an apology.

"I was kind of offended that someone would say that," Mr. Huang said. "I think he was trying to crack a joke, but it was inappropriate."

The contrast of Republican candidates distancing themselves from the White House even as Mr. Bush defended his policy again on Tuesday — "We will fight in Iraq and we will win in Iraq," he said to cheers in Georgia — reflects what Republican Party officials said was a pragmatic message they were sending to candidates: do whatever it takes to win.

In one sign of the deteriorating situation for Republicans, Mr. Bush is now expected to fly to Kansas this weekend to campaign on behalf of a Republican incumbent, Jim Ryun, who just a month ago was not considered endangered.

"Whatever they feel they've got to do to move their numbers, they have got to do," said one senior Republican Party official, who spoke on condition of anonymity in exchange for talking about party strategy. The official added that the White House believed it was better to have Republican candidates complaining than to have to deal with a Democratic Congress in January.

But asked about the advertisement by Mr. McGavick, the Republican candidate for Senate in Washington, a senior White House official, who requested anonymity to discuss political strategy, said, "That's not the message we'd be running."

Elliott Bundy, a spokesman for Mr. McGavick, said that the White House had not complained about the advertisement and that Mr. McGavick had to address Iraq head-on, given the public opposition to the war. "Iraq is the No. 1 issue, and you are fooling yourself if you think it isn't," Mr. Bundy said. "Even Republicans who think the mission is worthwhile, they're frustrated and the president doesn't seem to get it all the time."

On Tuesday, one week before Election Day, millions of dollars were being injected into the most competitive races in the country. Both sides were carefully tracking the day-by-day spending of their rivals and outside groups.

With a flurry of polls as their guide, Republicans redirected resources on Tuesday, pulling back on races in Colorado, Ohio and Pennsylvania in hopes of shoring up seats elsewhere. The largest infusion of money was reported in Missouri, Montana, Tennessee and Virginia.

White House, Kerry Exchange Accusations (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 1, 2006

The White House and Sen. John Kerry traded their harshest accusations since the 2004 presidential race on Tuesday, with President Bush accusing the Democrat of troop-bashing and Kerry calling the president's men hacks who are "willing to lie."

The war of words, tough even for this hard-fought campaign season, came after Kerry told a group of California students on Monday that those unable to navigate the country's education system "get stuck in Iraq."

The two parties are searching for any edge amid indications Democrats could take back the House and possibly win control of the Senate in next week's midterm elections. Though neither Bush nor Kerry is on any ballot, the bitterness with which they fought each other as 2004 rivals spilled over as both campaign hard for their parties in a race shaped in large measure by public doubts about the Iraq war.

White House press secretary Tony Snow was asked about Kerry's comment at his regular briefing with reporters, and had clearly come prepared with a lengthy attack. He said the quote "fits a pattern" of negative remarks about U.S. soldiers from the decorated Vietnam veteran and suggested that whether Democratic candidates — particularly those running on their military service backgrounds — agree with their 2004 standard-bearer should be a campaign litmus test.

Bush, campaigning later in Georgia, said Kerry's statement was "insulting and it is shameful."

"The members of the United States military are plenty smart and they are plenty brave and the senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology," Bush said during an appearance for a former GOP congressman, Mac Collins, who is trying to oust Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall. There were boos at the mention of Kerry's name and cheers at Bush's call for an apology.

Kerry, who is considering another run for the White House in 2008, angrily fired back.

At a hastily arranged news conference in Seattle, Kerry said: "I apologize to no one for my criticism of the president and of his broken policy."

Kerry said the comment in question was "a botched joke about the president and the president's people, not about the troops ... and they know that's what I was talking about."

It came during a campaign rally for California Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides. Kerry opened his speech at Pasadena City College with several one-liners, saying at one point that Bush had lived in Texas but now "lives in a state of denial."

He then said: "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

That, Kerry said, was meant as a reference to Bush, not troops. Kerry said it is the president who owes U.S. soldiers an apology — for "a Katrina foreign policy" that misled the country into war in Iraq, failed to adequately study and plan for the aftermath, has not properly equipped troops and has expanded the terrorist threat.

"I'm sick and tired of a bunch of despicable Republicans who will not debate real policy, who won't take responsibility for their own mistakes, standing up and trying to make other people the butt of those mistakes," he said. "It disgusts me that a bunch of these Republican hacks who've never worn the uniform of our country are willing to lie about those who did."

Unsubstantiated allegations about Kerry's Vietnam War heroism from a group called Swift Boat Veterans for Truth figured prominently in the 2004 Kerry-Bush race.

Other Republicans issued demands for an apology from Kerry.

GOP Sen. John McCain, like Kerry a decorated Vietnam veteran and a potential 2008 rival, said while campaigning for Republican candidates in Indiana that "the suggestion that only the least educated Americans would agree to serve in the military and fight in Iraq is an insult to every soldier serving in combat today."

Added House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., struggling to keep his party in control of Congress: "Our soldiers risk their lives in the face of grave dangers on the battlefield, and no one who chooses to courageously and selflessly defend our country can be considered 'uneducated.' "

Kerry Says He "botched Joke" And Lashes Out At GOP (BOS)

By Andrew Ryan

The Boston Globe, October 31, 2006

An angry Senator John F. Kerry castigated Republicans at a nationally televised press conference this afternoon, accusing conservatives of twisting his words of a "botched joke" to suggest that students who do poorly in school will end up as soldiers serving in Iraq.

"My statement yesterday, and the White House knows this full well, was a botched joke about the President and the President's people not about the troops," Kerry said at a press conference in Seattle. "The White Houses attempt to distort my true statement is a remarkable testament to their abject failure making America safe.

Kerry continued: "I'm sick and tired of a whole bunch of Republican attacks, most of which come from people who never wore the uniform and never had the courage to stand up and go to war themselves."

The Democratic senator and 2004 presidential nominee has been under fire since he spoke Monday at campaign rally in California. According to the Pasadena Star-News: "Kerry then told the students that if they were able to navigate the education system, they could get comfortable jobs - "If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq," he said to a mixture of laughter and gasps."

Conservative pundits have accused Kerry of suggesting that if students don't do well in school, they could end up in Iraq. White House Spokesman Tony Snow and Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney both called on Kerry to apologize.

"I apologize to no one for my criticism of the President and of his broken policy," Kerry said this afternoon. "If anyone owes our troops in the fields an apology it is the President and his failed team and a Republican majority of the Congress that has been willing to stamp, rubber stamp, policies that have done injury to our troops and to their families."

Before Kerry's press conference, Romney issued a statement through his spokesman while he campaign from Republican gubernatorial candidates in Idaho and Oregon.

"Senator Kerry owes an apology to the thousands of men and women serving in Iraq, particularly the many patriotic soldiers from Massachusetts who come from all backgrounds to defend our freedoms," Romney said.

Kerry Draws Republican Fire Over Iraq Gaffe (FT)

By Edward Luce And Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

The Republican Party on Tuesday gained a late burst of energy in its flagging midterm election campaign following remarks by John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, in which he said college students could “get stuck in Iraq” if they do not study hard.

While campaigning in California, the Massachusetts senator told a college crowd on Monday: “You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don’t, you get stuck in Iraq.”

George W. Bush on Tuesday seized on Mr Kerry’s remarks: “The senator’s suggestion that the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated is insulting and shameful,” said the US president at an election rally in Georgia. “The men and women who serve in our all-volunteer Armed Forces are plenty smart – Senator Kerry owes them an apology.”

John McCain, the leading Republican contender for the 2008 presidential nomination and - like Mr Kerry - a veteran of the Vietnam war, also responded strongly: “The suggestion that only the least educated Americans would agree to serve in the military and fight in Iraq is an insult to every soldier serving in combat.”

Republican strategists, who have been watching helplessly as opinion polls have turned against them in the last six weeks, on Tuesday drew renewed purpose from a gaffe that many believe could help motivate the party’s demoralised supporters to turn out to vote at the polls next Tuesday.

Meanwhile some Democratic strategists worried about Mr Kerry’s response to the Republican Party’s criticism of his comments, which appeared to deepen the controversy. Mr Kerry referred to Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, as a “stuffed suit” and said that his remarks had been directed at Mr Bush rather than at US soldiers serving in Iraq.

“It disgusts me that these Republican hacks, who have never worn the uniform of our country, lie and distort so blatantly and carelessly about those who have,” said Mr Kerry. “If anyone thinks a veteran would criticise the more than 140,000 heroes serving in Iraq and not the president who got us stuck there, they’re crazy.”

Mr Kerry's ebullient response was in sharp contrast to the way he handled the 2004 presidential campaign, in which his campaign team waited more than a week before responding to the negative advertisements put out by the "Swift Boat" veterans questioning the senator's war record.

"This was a slip of the tongue and the American people are not going to let this sway them over the important issues facing them in this election, which includes the Iraq war," said Simon Rosenberg head of the New Democratic Network, a centrist group in Washington.

However, some Democrats suggested Mr Kerry's remarks would almost certainly damage his presidential hopes. "Senator Kerry botched his remarks – as he has in the past," said James Carville, campaign manager for Bill Clinton in the 1990s. "But Mr Bush has botched the war in Iraq."

Bush Calls Kerry Remarks Insulting To U.S. Troops (WP)

By Jim VandeHei And Chris Cillizza

President Bush last night accused Sen. John F. Kerry of disparaging U.S. troops in Iraq, echoing the 2004 strategy of ridiculing the Massachusetts senator to raise anew questions about Democratic leaders and their commitment to the troops. The highly coordinated White House effort came as Republicans sought to shift the focus away from an unpopular war and GOP scandals that are putting their congressional majorities at risk.

The controversy erupted after Kerry told a California audience on Monday: "Education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. And if you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Yesterday, Bush, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the American Legion and many GOP candidates pounced on the comment from the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee to accuse him of insulting U.S. troops. The president said Kerry owes service members an apology -- echoing a parade of prominent Republicans who criticized the Massachusetts Democrat throughout the day.

After reading Kerry's comments to a GOP audience in Georgia, Bush said Kerry's statement was "insulting and it is shameful. The members of the United States military are plenty smart and they are plenty brave, and the senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology." The White House tipped off the networks to when Bush would attack Kerry, so the comments could be carried live and make the evening news.

In his defense, Kerry said that his comment was a "botched joke" and that he was referring to Bush's intellect, not that of American military personnel serving in Iraq.

In a statement released only moments after Bush spoke, Kerry said: "I make apologies to no one about my criticism of the President and his broken policy that kills and maims our heroes in Iraq every single day. This pathetic attempt to distort a botched joke about President Bush is a shameful effort to distract from a botched war."

The unusual back-and-forth that has little to do with the 2006 midterm elections comes as Democrats are planning to end the campaign by bashing Bush and GOP candidates for supporting the U.S. war policy. A senior Democratic strategist said the party will run Iraq-focused ads in at least 15 of the most competitive House races between now and Election Day.

The strategist, who would not discuss internal strategy on the record, said the Kerry comments are an unnecessary distraction but would soon be forgotten. Democrats, who faulted Kerry for failing to respond forcefully enough two years ago, said the senator fell into a GOP trap of debating Democratic support for the troops instead of Bush's management of the war.

With less than one week until the elections, Democrats are trying to expand the number of competitive House races by running ads in districts that are normally reliably Republican. The list includes the districts of several GOP incumbents, including Rep. Ron Lewis (Ky.), who won in 2004 with more than 60 percent of the vote. It is not just Democrats who see the House playing field expanding. The Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan handicapper of races, added the races of several Republicans to its chart of highly competitive contests, including the one for Rep. Jim Ryun's Kansas seat, for which Democrats started running ads over the weekend.

All these numbers and rankings show that Democrats have successfully expanded the playing field beyond the traditional 20 to 30 competitive races the parties have fought over for the past several cycles. As a result, Democrats no longer have to win

80 percent of the tossup races to win the 15 seats they need for the majority. They have built in some room for error and, by doing so, have improved their chances of taking control on Nov. 7.

Republicans -- whose endgame strategy is to limit losses -- are trimming spending for open seats in Colorado and Ohio, which they expect to lose, to help protect endangered GOP incumbents in the final days. They plan to end the campaign by warning that a Democratic Congress would raises taxes and liberalize social policy.

Some candidates are also playing up the economy, with a Washington Post-ABC News survey finding consumer confidence at a three-year high. Republicans said some races that looked bleak a few weeks ago appear more competitive, citing the contest for the Texas seat vacated by former House majority leader Tom DeLay.

In the Senate races, Democratic strategists said that, based on their internal polls, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) now appears more vulnerable than Sen. James M. Talent (R-Mo.). Several public polls released over the past few days show former Navy secretary James Webb (D-Va.) leading Allen.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee plans to spend an additional $1 million to prop up Allen. Republicans also intend to spend more money than originally planned to assist Sen. Conrad Burns (Mont.) in a race that many GOP strategists had written off a few weeks ago. Democrats need to pick up six seats to win control of the Senate.

Kerry, White House Exchange Words Over Iraq 'Bad Joke' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 1, 2006

A bitter dispute about Iraq that dominated the 2004 campaign between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry resurfaced Tuesday as they traded barbs a week before voters decide control of Congress.

Kerry told a college crowd Monday: "You know education, if you make the most of it, and you study hard, and you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Bush said Kerry's comments were "insulting" and "shameful" to U.S. troops. "The members of the United States military are plenty smart, and they are plenty brave, and the senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology," the president said Tuesday at a rally in Georgia.

Kerry, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, said his comments at Pasadena City College in Southern California were distorted by "assorted right-wing nut jobs." He said he was trying to make a joke about Bush and his team's preparations for the Iraq war.

The dust-up came a day after Rep. Charles Rangel called Vice President Dick Cheney "a son of a bitch" for saying the New York Democrat doesn't know how the economy works.

Stephen Wayne, a government professor at Georgetown University, said the barbs foreshadow "two years of strident, partisan rhetoric" regardless of who controls Congress after Nov. 7.

Polls show Democrats are in a position to win control of the House of Representatives and possibly even the Senate.

"It does not facilitate compromise," Wayne said. "It does not facilitate legislative output."

Thomas Mann, co-author of The Broken Branch, a book on Congress, said Kerry gave Republicans "a target" just days before the election, the outcome of which will affect the remainder of Bush's presidency. He's not sure, however, if the Bush-Kerry flap will have a long-term impact.

"These things have a shelf life of about a half-hour," he said.

The Cheney-Rangel spat began with the vice president's warnings about a Democrat-controlled House. If Democrats pick up 15 seats, Rangel is in line to lead the House Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax laws.

DOJ_NMG_0089413

In two TV interviews Monday, Cheney cited Rangel's objections to Bush's tax cuts and predicted Rangel would block efforts to renew them. "I think Charlie doesn't understand how the economy works," Cheney said on Fox News.

Rangel responded, when asked by the New York Post, that Cheney is "such a real son of a bitch, he just enjoys a confrontation."

On Tuesday, White House press secretary Tony Snow said Cheney did not take Rangel's comments personally and "had a big hearty laugh" when told of them.

Rangel expressed regret in an interview with USA TODAY but did not back down. "It's not the first time the vice president has taken a cheap shot at me," he said. "I should have just ignored it."

A year ago, Cheney said Rangel might be "losing it" after the New York Democrat compared Bush to Bull Connor, the segregationist Alabama official who resisted civil rights in the 1960s. Rangel, a Korean War veteran, has also accused Cheney of "sending other people's kids to war." Cheney did not serve in the military.

Rangel said he tends not to deal with Cheney on policy issues and prefers to work on fiscal matters with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, whom he has praised.

While not predicting the results of Election Day, Rangel said Americans are tired of all the political bickering: "Republicans and Democrats are going to have to work together if we don't want gridlock."

Bush, Kerry Clash As Campaigns Heat Up (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- On a day of heated coast-to-coast campaign confrontations, highlighted by a confrontation between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry, a flurry of surveys showed the battle for a Senate majority heading for a photo finish that could hinge on a tight contest in Missouri.

Tuesday's rapid fire developments included the sharp collision between familiar antagonists -- the White House and Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who lost to Bush in the 2004 presidential campaign.

Kerry and Republicans, led by Bush, exchanged fire long-distance over whether the senator disparaged American troops in Iraq during a Monday rally for California Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides.

After urging students to make the most of their educational opportunities, Kerry had said, "If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Late Tuesday afternoon, Bush told a cheering throng in Georgia that Kerry's remarks were "insulting" and "shameful," and he called on him to apologize to U.S. troops.

Earlier in the day, Kerry had rejected similar calls from other Republicans. At a hastily arranged news conference in Seattle, Kerry said his comment was "a botched joke about the president and the president's people, not about the troops," and he renewed his attacks on what he termed Bush's "broken policy" in Iraq.

Later, responding directly to Bush in a statement, Kerry said: "This pathetic attempt to distort a botched joke about President Bush is a shameful effort to distract from a botched war."

The pointed criticism of Kerry made clear that the GOP believed he had provided an opening to press its case that Democrats could not be trusted to safeguard America's national security -- an argument Republicans hoped would turn voters to their side in a number of Tuesday's House and Senate races.

Also Tuesday, a new controversy erupted in one of the key, and nastiest, Senate campaigns -- the re-election bid by Republican George Allen of Virginia.

Allen faced criticism from Democrats over taped footage showing his supporters tackling a student who approached him at an event in Charlottesville, Va., and accused him of spitting on his first wife.

The furor over Kerry and the new flap surrounding Allen reflected the intensity of a crucial midterm campaign now in its final days. The series of new polls released in the last two days showed Democrats edging closer to the net gain of six seats they need to control the Senate majority -- even as national Republicans launched new campaign advertisements in states they believe they are gaining ground.

Phil Singer, communications director for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee said of his party's prospects: "You can see the light, but it's hardly a done deal."

Brian Nick, his counterpart at the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said that in his view, the polling underscored that control of the Senate would be determined by get-out-the-vote operations. The GOP generally is considered more adept at these efforts, based on its performance in recent elections.

With the outcome of the battle for the Senate in doubt, Democrats remain confident that they are on track to win the 15 seats they need to control the House. But again, Republicans -- while expecting to lose seats -- predict their organizational prowess will help them hang onto a majority in the chamber.

At his stop in Georgia, campaigning for a GOP challenger to a Democratic House member, the president said, "You may not agree with Republicans on every issue, but you should also realize what voting Democrat in this election would mean for the war on terror."

Focusing on Kerry's comment, Bush said, "The senator's suggestion that the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated is insulting and it is shameful."

Saying that U.S. troops "are plenty smart and they are plenty brave, Bush added that Kerry "owes them an apology."

In his statement released after Bush's speech, Kerry said, "I make apologies to no one about my criticism of the president and his broken policy that kills and maims our heroes in Iraq every single day. ... President Bush owes an apology to our troops and to their families for his disaster in Iraq."

Before Bush took him to task, Kerry was harshly criticized by White House press secretary Tony Snow, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and other leading Republicans -- all of whom said the Democrat's comment impugned the intelligence of those in the military.

In his statement, as he did so often during his presidential campaign, Kerry referred to his highly decorated military service in Vietnam to rebut that charge. "As a combat veteran, I know the dedication, integrity, and commitment of American troops," he said. "I've lived it."

He also noted -- again as he did frequently during his White House quest -- that neither Bush nor Vice President Dick Cheney had been in combat.

The incident involving Allen occurred when Mike Stark, a University of Virginia law student who operates a liberal blog, approached the senator and loudly asked "Why did you spit at your first wife, George?" according to The Associated Press.

Allen was married to Anne Waddell from 1980 to 1984; after their divorce, he remarried.

Three men wearing Allen stickers grabbed Stark, removed him from the hall and threw him to the ground.

The Democratic Senate Campaign Committee quickly distributed via e-mail a video clip of the encounter from a local television station.

Allen's campaign did not return calls seeking comment about the incident. But Nick, the NRSC official, dismissed the Democratic criticism. "Obviously this is a United States Senator and you have to be concerned about someone's safety," he said.

The new surveys showed Democrats holding clear advantages against two of their top targets. In Pennsylvania, separate polls released this week by the Philadelphia Inquirer and a local radio station showed Democrat Bob Casey Jr. maintaining a double-digit advantage over Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

In Ohio, a CNN survey released Tuesday showed Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown leading Republican Sen. Mike DeWine by 54 percent to 43 percent among likely voters.

The CNN surveys released Tuesday also showed Democrat Sen. Bob Menendez holding a 51 percent to 44 percent lead over Republican Thomas Kean Jr. in New Jersey. Four statewide surveys released over the past week have showed Menendez re-establishing a lead of five to seven percentage points.

The most recent public polls have also shown Democratic challengers leading Republican incumbents Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Conrad Burns in Montana. But GOP strategists say they believe both states are still within reach, especially Montana, where President Bush is scheduled to campaign Thursday.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee launched a new advertising buy Tuesday to support Burns, who trailed State Sen. Jon Tester by 46 percent to 43 percent in the last major public poll..

The NRSC also launched a new advertising buy in Maryland, where Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, who is black, is opposing Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin for the seat being vacated by Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes.

Democrats dismiss the GOP optimism, pointing to a Washington Post survey released last weekend that showed Cardin leading Steele by 54 percent to 43 percent among likely voters.

If Democrats maintained the survey leads they now hold in all six of those races, and no other surprises emerge, the party would win a Senate majority if they can capture at least two of the three contests in Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri.

Another CNN survey, completed before Tuesday's incident involving the law student, showed Webb advancing to a 50 percent to 46 percent lead over Allen. Though that advantage was within the poll's margin of error, it tracked with a new Democratic poll and a Times/Bloomberg survey last week that showed Webb overtaking Allen, who had narrowly lead in most polls until recently.

In Tennessee, another CNN survey released Tuesday showed Corker leading Ford by 52 percent to 44 percent among likely voters, and by 47 percent to 45 percent among all registered voters.

Finally, the new polls confirm Missouri's status as the nation's closest race -- and the contest that could tip the Senate.

CNN showed Republican Sen. Jim Talent and Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill, the state auditor, tied at 49 percent among likely voters, though McCaskill held an eight percentage point lead among all registered voters. In the last ten statewide polls compiled on the Website RealClearPolitics.com, neither Talent nor McCaskill has ever held a lead of more than three percentage points.

"This is a classic 51-49 race," said Del Ali, the president of Research 2000, an independent company that polls in the state. "Regardless of who wins, it is going to be disputed."

Iraq War Dominates Election's Final Days (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

In early October, voters in a rural Pennsylvania congressional district received a political mailing that accused the front-runner in the race of using erroneous intelligence to help sell the Iraq war.

The language in the campaign brochure -- which told voters the candidate "failed the nation once" and urged them not to give him "a chance to fail us again" -- wasn't unusual in the home stretch of an election dominated by the war. The surprising part was who issued it.

Although the flier included standard Democratic talking points criticizing the administration's rationale for the war in Iraq, it was sent by the Republican Federal Committee of Pennsylvania, the state party working to protect the incumbent, Rep. Don Sherwood. Mr. Sherwood is facing a challenge by Democrat Chris Carney, a Navy veteran who served in a Pentagon intelligence unit in the run-up to the war.

See continuing coverage2 of developments in Iraq, including an interactive map3 of major attacks. Plus, see a tally of military deaths4. • Q&A: Nation Building in Iraq5

With many polls showing the challenger ahead, the Republicans accused Mr. Carney of leading the nation to war by arguing there was a relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda -- in effect tying Mr. Carney to a pivotal part of the administration's prewar rationale for the invasion.

"I was stunned when I saw the mailing," Mr. Carney says in an interview. "The audacity of accusing someone of starting the war is itself ridiculous. And to impugn someone's military service smacks of desperation."

The fireworks in the Pennsylvania contest highlight a dynamic emerging in the final days before next week's midterm elections. With polls showing that the Iraq war could cost Republicans control of at least one house of Congress, some Republican candidates throughout the country are playing down their past support for the war and beginning to sound like their Democratic opponents when discussing the conflict.

After years of ceding the national security issue to the Republicans, Democrats recruited a slate of military veterans as candidates and are challenging Republicans over Iraq and the party's strategy in the broader war on terror. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) told a New Hampshire newspaper last week Republican candidates should get voters to "focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

Iraq is a vexing issue for both parties, and Democrats are struggling with the war. Leading figures within the party have failed to coalesce around a single strategy for reducing the violence there, and Democratic leaders have offered diverging strategies for Iraq that range from beginning a troop withdrawal before the end of the year to splitting the country into three ethnic regions.

Democrats also are struggling to find a way of criticizing the administration's handling of Iraq without appearing to denigrate the U.S. military personnel serving there. The difficulty of striking such a balance was apparent this week when White House spokesman Tony Snow accused Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts of troop-bashing after Mr. Kerry told students in California that those who don't do well in school "get stuck in Iraq." Mr. Kerry said the comment was a reference to Mr. Bush.

Republicans are facing the bigger problem, as Iraq dominates the public mood before Election Day. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found 37% of registered voters believe the war has been worth its financial and human cost, the lowest level recorded to date in the survey. The poll found that anger over the war in Iraq continues to be the biggest single issue bringing voters to the polls.

Shifting Republican rhetoric on the war is notable for a party that has hewed to the administration's Iraq policies and been reluctant to directly criticize the war effort there. The White House itself last week dropped its "stay the course" language after increasing numbers of Republican lawmakers made clear that they wanted to see a change of plan in Iraq.

Some Republicans have gone further. In Montana, Republican Sen. Conrad Burns raised eyebrows at a debate with Democratic opponent Jon Tester, when he seemed to suggest the White House had a secret plan for ending the war in Iraq. "If you want to go out and spar for a fight, are you going to tell your enemy what your plan is? I don't think so," Mr. Burns said to Mr. Tester. "There is a plan. We're not going to tell you, Jon."

Jason Klindt, a spokesman for the Burns campaign, said the senator "misspoke" during the debate and wasn't "claiming access to any secret" White House or Pentagon deliberations about Iraq. "He used the word 'plan,' but he had meant to talk about 'tactics' and 'benchmarks,'" Mr. Klindt said. "He was saying that you never give away your tactics to your enemy."

In Connecticut -- a state where support for the war is lower than the national average -- Republican incumbent Rep. Chris Shays said at a debate late last month that the U.S. "should have gone in sooner but not for weapons of mass destruction." Mr. Shays is in a tight race against Democratic challenger Diane Farrell, who has been hammering her opponent for continuing to support the Iraq war.

Mr. Shays's campaign manager, Michael Sohn, says the comment was a reference to the lawmaker's belief that the U.S. should have invaded Iraq when former ruler Saddam Hussein launched a crackdown on Shiite and Kurdish guerrillas during the early 1990s.

In Pennsylvania, the Sherwood-Carney race is shaping up as one of the nastiest in the country. The Republican ran unopposed in 2004, but has seen his electoral prospects deteriorate after a former mistress accused him of trying to choke her. Mr. Sherwood has admitted to the extramarital affair, and apologized for it, but denied the choking allegations.

The state Republican Party is targeting Mr. Carney for his prewar work in a small Pentagon office called the Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group, which helped prepare intelligence reports -- later discounted -- that accused Iraq of having ties to al Qaeda.

The Republican mailing cites a report in Mother Jones, a liberal magazine, which specifically mentions Mr. Carney's Pentagon intelligence unit, and a quote from Mr. Carney criticizing the Iraq war. "Chris Carney attacks the same war he helped start," the brochure says. The New York Sun reported earlier about the mailing.

Matt Burns, a spokesman for the state Republican Party, says the mailing was meant to underscore Mr. Carney's "hypocrisy" about Iraq. "This is a conservative district, and when Carney talks to people here he likes to point out the fact that he worked as a Pentagon intelligence analyst. But when he has Democrats like Charlie Rangel come in and fund-raise for him, he denounces the war," Mr. Burns says, referring to the veteran New York Democratic congressman.

Mr. Sherwood's campaign didn't return requests for comment yesterday.

In a race that includes some Republican campaign ads that read as if they were written by Democrats, it is perhaps no surprise that Mr. Carney occasionally sounds like a Republican. The Democratic challenger says he remains convinced that there were ties between Iraq and al Qaeda.

"On a scale from one to 10, where zero is no relationship and 10 is complete operational unity, it was a 2.5," he says.

Mr. Carney says the invasion itself may have been justified by what he sees as evidence of a relationship between Mr. Hussein and Osama bin Laden's terror group. Still, he says, "if you make that decision to go to war, you damn well better be prepared, and they weren't. That's what my race is all about."

October 31, 2006, 6:40 pm Iraq Worries Boost Dems, WSJ/NBC News Poll Finds

President Bush is getting improved marks for his handling of the economy, a new WSJ/NBC News poll finds, but fellow Republicans aren't benefiting as voters focus on Iraq. By a 15-point margin, voters want Democrats rather than Republicans to control Congress. Also, a 54% majority of the electorate now says removing Saddam Hussein from power wasn't worth the human and financial costs, the poll finds.

The national telephone survey of 1,010 voters, conducted Oct 28-30, doesn't account for the vagaries of races for individual Senate seats or House districts; the margin for error is 3.1 percentage points. In the House, Republicans are counting on several factors to withstand the hostile national winds: the political strengths of embattled incumbents, district boundaries drawn after each census to protect them, and Republicans' proven turnout operations.

But the poll's overall findings track the assessments of key strategists in both parties that Democrats have a strong chance of achieving at least the 15-seat gain they need to recapture control of the House. The outcome is cloudier in the Senate, where Democrats must gain six seats to reach a majority. Read the full article. – John Harwood and Jackie Calmes

October 31, 2006, 4:43 pm November Surprise?

President Bush will hold no public events of any kind on Wednesday, an exceptionally light schedule this close to next Tuesday's midterm elections. That sparked questions about whether Bush has a "November surprise" in store. This is, after all, a president who has twice managed to sneak away to Iraq.

At the White House morning briefing, a reporter observed that the light schedule made it sound "like something is cooking there." Spokesman Tony Snow replied, "No, not really."

That left some Democratic political operatives wondering just what Bush and his political guru, Karl Rove, might be up to. Despite polls showing Democrats poised to take control of the House and possibly the Senate, many Democrats remain fearful Rove will pull something out of his hat–disclosing the death or capture of Osama bin Laden, for instance–that will help Republican snatch victory from the jaws of defeat.

If so, Snow is keeping on his poker face. Bush has "some meetings with senior advisers and a Rush Limbaugh interview," Snow said in an email. "No blockbusters." –Yochi J. Dreazen

October 31, 2006, 4:19 pm Voting Absentee?

Foley Mark Foley isn't checking out of rehab just yet, the Palm Beach Post reports. The former congressman, who quit the House abruptly in late September after being confronted with sexually charged Internet messages to teenage male pages, has been under treatment for alcoholism since Oct. 1 at the Sierra Tucson Treatment Center . The stay, originally planned for 30 days, has been extended indefinitely. "Mark has not left the program," a source told the paper. "His release date has yet to be determined."

October 31, 2006, 3:44 pm CNBC Video: Obama, Kennedy, Frist

Big names made predictions in CNBC appearances today. Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy said that domestic and foreign policy issues make next week's races the most important election of his generation; Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) said efficient health-care will be his primary focus, should the Democrats take control of the Senate next week; Sen. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) said he thinks that people are starting to pay attention to races, with the economy figuring more importantly than past scandals. Also, Meet the Press's Tim Russert outlined key Senate races and said that current surveys show Republicans are likely to lose House and Senate seats in next week's election — the question is how many.

October 31, 2006, 2:41 pm Fight Club Meets Brooks Brothers at Allen Event

Ripples of excitement washed anew through Democratic circles this afternoon, as word began spreading that staffers for Virginia Republican Sen. George Allen roughed up someone at an event at a Charlottesville hotel this morning.

Lo and behold, NBC's affiliate in Charlottesville was on hand for the event and was kind enough to post video from its noon broadcast of the scuffle, which actually isn't as much of a throwdown as we were led to believe.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee immediately sent out an alert about the incident and it got above-the-fold treatment on its Drudge Report parody, the Fudge Report . According to the NBC affiliate, the man was yelling and asking Allen, "Why did you spit on your first wife?"

Blogger W. Michael Stark immediately claimed credit for being the guy in the video, and sent a blast e-mail to political reporters saying he plans to press charges against Allen's staffers this afternoon. "I demand that Senator Allen fire the staffers who beat up a constituent attempting to use his constitutional right to petition his government," he said. "I also want to know why Senator Allen would want his staffers to assault someone asking questions about matters of public record in the heat of a political campaign. Why are his divorce records sealed? Why was he arrested in the 1970s? And why did his campaign batter me when I asked him about these questions?" –Amy Schatz

Chief executives from some of the largest financial service institutions peg "protectionism" as the single biggest threat to continued U.S. economic growth, and they also rank the regulatory environment as a top concern.

Still, a survey by the Financial Services Forum, a group of 20 CEOs from the largest financial institutions, found that most executives expect strong or very strong growth in the U.S. economy over the next year. Their views on the global economy are somewhat tamer, with a majority predicting just "some growth" over the next year.

Paulson

Not surprisingly, the CEOs don't share the concerns of many Democrats in Washington when it comes to China. A majority said they see China as an opportunity for U.S. business, while none labeled it as a threat. The CEOs also predicted that China will fuel global economic growth, with the U.S. just behind the Asian giant.

In the U.S., terrorism, "frivolous" litigation and energy prices are top concerns. Coming in at No. 3 on the list was the "regulatory environment," which is under attack from business in the wake of Sarbanes-Oxley and a crackdown on corporate misbehavior. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who previously chaired the Financial Services Forum, has indicated he, too, has concerns about the regulatory environment and has backed a private-sector effort to recommend regulatory and legal changes. –Deborah Solomon

October 31, 2006, 1:56 pm A True Halloween Story

The lawyer who disclosed President Bush's drunk-driving arrest just before the 2000 election was arrested in South Portland, Maine, after he was spotted on a highway overpass dressed as Osama bin Laden and toting a fake assault rifle, the Associated Press reports.

The costume, according to AP, came equipped with plastic dynamite, plastic grenades, and a plastic replica of an AK-47. Tom Connolly, 49 years old, was charged with criminal threatening, a misdemeanor. Connolly was carrying a sign that read "I love TABOR," (that's the Taxpayer Bill of Rights on the Maine ballot in the Nov. 7 election). But someone who saw it thought it read "I love the Taliban," according to the South Portland Police Chief Ed Googins. "The whole thing is just incredibly bizarre," Googins said.

It's Halloween and the politicos and partisans are trying to scare us.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt emails a news release: "Nancy Pelosi's 'Liberal Shop of Horrors'; All Tricks, No Treats For America."

"If Nancy Pelosi is elected Speaker, the American people not only have to fear a liberal San Francisco agenda, but the real concern might be what bills she refuses to allow the House to consider in the first place," the Missouri Republican warns. "The president can always veto out-of-the-mainstream legislation, but he can't force the Congress to consider a bill."

If that doesn't send a shiver, he elaborates: "Can the American people trust liberal San Francisco values when it comes to our nation's priorities on immigration reform, tax relief, job creation, and homeland security?"

The Democrats apparently caught the fervor early. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee posted a video (complete with pumpkin) on youtube on April 18, highlighting the troubles of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, indicted vice presidential aide Lewis I. "Scooter" Libby and others.

Elsewhere on YouTube, a couple of lighthearted Halloween-themed political videos have popped up. Try "I'm a Democrat", written by John Kramer and directed by Jeff Hadick, or Halloween HamNation from conservative blogger Mary Katharine Ham.

In California, the Republican Party of Orange County takes a Web poll on favorite Halloween costumes: princess, ghost, Dracula, pirate, pumpkin, superhero, witch.

What? No politicians?

Update: The theme has caught on! These just in:

The Rev. Louis P. Sheldon of the Traditional Values Coalition, sends a bloodcurdling email, "Halloween Horror: Federal Court Reform Will Die If Liberals Take Senate." "If we fail," he warns, "the horrors of judicial tyranny will multiply like bodies in a Freddy Krueger movie. Last week, for example, the New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that homosexuals must be granted the same rights and privileges as heterosexual married couples…."

A Democratic National Committee email says, "This Halloween, Republicans in Washington can once again only offer tricks and empty rhetoric to America's hard-working families and seniors, as the GOP saves the treats for their special interest friends." –Mary Lu Carnevale

CNN's polling data, done with Opinion Research, shows Democratic candidates holding onto slim margins in three of five races, including Ohio, Virginia and New Jersey. Republican Bob Corker held a sizable 52%-44% margin in Tennessee over Rep. Harold Ford Jr. And in Missouri, Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill and Republican Sen. Jim Talent were tied at 49% of likely voters. Just 1% of those polled expressed no opinion on the race. The poll has a 4% margin of error.

Could the New Jersey Senate race be safely in control of the Democrats now? The CNN poll was just one of several released this morning on the race, which is the one seat Democrats have worried they could lose to a Republican challenger. Sen. Bob Menendez is trying to hold onto a seat that he was appointed to by now-Gov. Jon Corzine against Republican Tom Kean. A Strategic Vision poll out this morning shows Mendenez barely ahead of Kean at 43% to 42%, far closer than CNN's 51% to 44%. Meanwhile, a Quinnipiac poll gives Menendez a 5% point advantage.

In the Zogby Battlegrounds poll released late Monday, Menendez was ahead by six points in New Jersey, while Corker led by a little more than a point in Tennessee. Talent was up by a little more than a point in Missouri. –Amy Schatz

October 31, 2006, 10:00 am Alaska's Rep. Young Sees No Lost Seats for GOP

Forget the polls, prognosticators and angsty anonymous quotes from Republican Party insiders, Alaska's only congressman, Republican Don Young, has a prediction of his own: House Republicans won't lose any seats next week.

Arguing that the solidifying convention wisdom that Republicans will lose control of the House next week is a creation of the media, Young told an Associated Press reporter: "I'm predicting we're not going to lose any seats." Young added: "My prediction is as good as anybody else's. The day after the election, we'll see who was right."

One thing there's very little doubt about is that the 16-term congressman will be returning to Washington. But the congressman has apparently been running something of a stealth campaign this year, according to the Anchorage Daily News, which mentioned his less-than-rigorous campaign schedule in a story last week.

Noting it's almost impossible to find his campaign's Web site on a Google search, the paper said: "Asked where someone could go to hear Young speak before Election Day, his campaign manager, Steven Dougherty, said: 'A campaign event? We do not have any campaign event.'"

The story apparently didn't sit well with the congressman, who told AP that his campaigning this year isn't particularly different from those he's run in the past and it's too bad if the Daily News doesn't like it.

"I'm not running the campaign for the Daily Screw," Young told AP. "My job is to hear people, find out what's on their minds." – Amy Schatz

October 31, 2006, 7:44 am Early Turnout May Boost GOP

Down in the polls and with their majorities in Congress at risk, Republicans say they have some good news in early-voting statistics that suggest their voter-turnout machine is providing an edge in some tight races. If the trend holds, it could mean that early voting is growing — and continuing to benefit Republicans, who exploited the practice in the 1990s. Experts say early voters could be a bigger factor this year when overall voter turnout could be lower than in 2004, a presidential-election year.

This year, though, Democrats contend that Republicans are exaggerating their successes so far, by highlighting a few races, while ignoring problems they are having in motivating their troops around the country. Democrats also questioned several specific Republican claims, while noting their own early-voting numbers show they are starting to catch up with their rivals in early get-out-the-vote efforts in battleground states such as Iowa.

In congressional districts from Ohio and Florida to New Mexico and Arizona, Republicans report that their get-out-the-vote organization is gaining traction a week ahead of Election Day. The aim of the effort generally is to maximize turnout among their most loyal and reliable voters. If successful, it could help them to hold down their losses in this election cycle and perhaps even retain their majorities in the House and Senate. Read the full article. – John D. Kerry Cancels Mankato Appearance (MFP)

Mankato Free Press, November 1, 2006

The dueling rallies scheduled for Mankato today on behalf of Republican congressman Gil Gutknecht and Democratic challenger Tim Walz lost some of their pizzaz Tuesday night when Sen. John Kerry pulled out of the Democratic rally.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the front-runner for the 2008 Republican nomination for president, is the star attraction at a rally at the Midwest Wireless Civic Center for Gutknecht and Gov. Tim Pawlenty.

Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee pulled out of the DFL event, which will still be held, as the result of a controversy over comments he made Monday in California.

Walz communication director Meredith Salsbery said Kerry canceled his visit to keep the focus on the issues and away from Kerry's comments and McCain's response.

She wouldn't comment on whether Walz asked Kerry not to campaign for him, but said the decision was ultimately the senator's choice.

Both of today's rallies are free and open to the public and are expected to last about an hour. McCain will be in the East Banquet Hall at the Civic Center. The event begins at 10:10 a.m., but people need to arrive by 9:50 a.m. The doors open at 9:15 a.m. No backpacks or other bags are allowed.

Doors open at MSU's Taylor Center at 11 a.m. for the Walz event with music by Martin Zellar beginning at 11:15 a.m. The rally begins at noon. Parking around campus is expected to be very limited, but shuttle buses will run starting at 10:30 a.m. from the Madison East Center.

Braley Asks Kerry Not To Campaign (QCT)

By Ed Tibbetts

Quad City Times, November 1, 2006

BREAKING NEWS: (Updated: 6:06 p.m.) Democratic congressional candidate Bruce Braley has asked John Kerry not to campaign with him Thursday in the Quad-Cities as planned, citing the flap between the White House and the senator over his remarks concerning Iraq.

Jeff Giertz, a campaign spokesman, said Braley cancelled their appearance Tuesday afternoon.

"He's not condoning the partisan bickering," Giertz said of Braley, a lawyer from Waterloo who is running against Bettendorf businessman Mike Whalen for Iowa's 1st District Congressional seat.

DOJ_NMG_0089422

The White House harshly criticized Kerry, a senator from Massachusetts and the party's 2004 presidential nominee, on Tuesday for remarks he made Monday in California, where he encouraged people to work hard in school lest they "get stuck in Iraq."

President Bush said Kerry was suggesting "the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated," calling the remark "insulting and shameful."

Kerry said the remark was a botched joke aimed at the president, not the troops, according to CNN. And he said the White House response is proof of its willingness to "reduce anything in America to raw politics."

The Braley campaign had confirmed the appearance with Kerry in the Quad-Cities, but Giertz said Braley, unprompted, asked that Kerry not attend.

Kerry's office could not immediately be reached for comment Tuesday night.

"We're upset with the partisan bickering that's going on between Kerry and the White House," Giertz said, adding that it does not contribute to a solution in Iraq.

He added that Braley thought Kerry's remarks were "inappropriate."

Late in the day, Republicans challenged Braley to repudiate the remarks.

Russ Perisho, a spokesman for Whalen, said this afternoon that the campaign expected to make a comment after Braley and Kerry appeared together Thursday. But after being informed of Braley's decision, Perisho said, "It appears to us Mr. Braley is trying to separate from someone whose views parallel Mr. Braley's right up and down the line."

According to The Associated Press, Kerry, a potential 2008 presidential candidate said Monday: "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." CNN reported today that a Kerry aide said he mangled the remarks in his delivery.

What he meant to say was that if one does not work hard in school, they will "end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq," a remark aimed at the president, not at the troops, CNN reported.

Ed Tibbetts can be contacted at (563) 383-2327 or etibbetts@qctimes.com.

Kerry noted that his words were being characterized as an insult by men whose behavior strips them of the right to respond on behalf of soldiers in a combat zone. Bush couldn't be found to fly the jet aircraft with his name on it, and Cheney had 'priorities' that didn't include military service. The Bush-Cheney claim to the title commanders-in-chief is something of an insult. Finding themselves in Iraq, having volunteered for monthly meetings and two-weeks training every summer, thousands of the troops in Iraq probably have called THEMSELVES names that would be an insult coming from another. Stuck In Nantucket (WSJ)

Talk show hosts across America knelt down and gave thanks yesterday for the gift of Senator John Kerry, whose cultural condescension keeps on giving. A week before Election Day, his fellow Democrats may have had a different (unprintable) reaction.

The American Legion and various Republicans, including John McCain and President Bush, all criticized Mr. Kerry for his comments a day earlier to a student crowd in California: "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

We didn't always do our homework, but it's hard to come to any conclusion other than that Mr. Kerry was saying that only fools and knaves, not patriots, end up fighting in Iraq. Mr. McCain said the Senator should apologize. But Mr. Kerry instead issued a statement so over the top with invective toward his critics that we wonder if some Republican secretly wrote it to make Mr. Kerry look un-Presidential. Then yesterday Mr. Kerry held a press conference delivering more of the same, and claiming that he was merely attacking Bush policy, not the troops. We don't have space to reprint all of this, but we commend you to OpinionJournal.com for the complete implosion.

For reasons clear only to himself, Mr. Kerry has been acting as if he intends to run for the White House again in 2008. Apparently he thinks he can win. We've long thought that Democratic donors would soon enough convince him otherwise, but his behavior this week may speed up the reckoning. Congratulations, Senator Clinton; another competitor bites the dust.

John Kerry Thinks (WT)

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

When you get right down to it, the thoughtless foot-in-mouth disease of Sen. John Kerry is a strain unique to him. The senator gives elitism a bad name.

DOJ_NMG_0089425

"Education," Mr. Kerry told a rally this week for Phil Angelides, the Democratic candidate for governor of California, "if you make the most of it, if you study hard and you do your homework, and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Stuck in Iraq -- that's what Sen. Kerry thinks happens to people who don't study hard. You end up in the uniform, serving your country and getting shot at. Nice going, Senator Winter Soldier.

In a press conference to explain himself yesterday, Mr. Kerry rejected calls by the White House and Sen. John McCain to apologize to the American soldiers in Iraq. Instead, he repeated his litany of criticism of the Bush administration's handling of the war, accusing Republicans of a political trick to exploit his remarks. He called his remarks "a botched joke." Some joke. Some botch.

We have news for Mr. Kerry, beyond conveying our assessment that this arrogant, incredibly elitist and defeatist and altogether reprehensible statement reminds us why he isn't president and never will be: Patriotism and selflessness are why young Americans readily put themselves in harm's way for their country's sake. This C student is just plain wrong on the facts.

U.S. recruits are better educated than the average American of equivalent age. In fact, 98 percent of U.S. military recruits have a high-school education or G.E.D. Only 75 percent of equivalent-age American youths do. For senators who can't do the math, that's 23 percentage points past just plain wrong. The Heritage Foundation's recent study, "Who are the Recruits?" lays out these numbers and more. Who would compare what 19- and 20-year-olds do in combat to what the typical college sophomore is doing. (Sometimes best not to know.)

We understand that Mr. Kerry's primary aim on Monday was to bomb the White House to get at the commander in chief. The troops were an afterthought. Which, come to think of it, is the point -- just as it was in the 1970s, when Mr. Kerry made a career of smearing American troops as killers on his return from Vietnam.

It's one thing, bad enough, to be an elitist who knows the facts. It's another to be an elitist who doesn't know them. So thank you, Mr. Kerry, for speaking so candidly. People can see clearly who you are.

Democrats Increase Hope Of Winning House (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 1, 2006

After a decade in the political wilderness, Democrats are beginning to predict confidently if quietly that they will win control of the House in next week's elections, and possibly emerge with a relatively robust majority.

The optimism coincides with a Republican retreat Tuesday in three costly, highly competitive races in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Ohio, as well as polls showing continued public dissatisfaction with President Bush and the war in Iraq.

In addition, fundraising is running significantly stronger than two years ago, $104.5 million through Oct. 18. That represents an increase of more than 30 percent, and has allowed Democrats to launch late-campaign television advertising in several districts in recent days in an attempt to maximize their gains on Election Day.

Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster, said in an interview there has never been an election in which a president's approval rating was below 40 percent "and his party has not lost the 15 seats" that Democrats need to gain control this year. Bush's approval ratings hover in the mid- to high 30s.

Despite the developments, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader, and Rep. Rahm Emanuel the head of the campaign committee, have told aides to avoid predictions of victory before the votes are counted.

"Anybody who's been involved in politics for the past 10 years can tell you that a week out you've still got a long week ahead of you," said Bill Burton of the Democratic campaign committee. "And we are absolutely not taking anything for granted."

Republicans, too, say that with a week of campaigning to go, Democrats are ill-advised to celebrate. They note than an extraordinary number of races remain very close, and that their GOP get-out-the-vote operation will help pull enough of their candidates to victory to preserve their majority.

Eager to persuade conservatives to vote, President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Republican leaders attack Democrats steadily as favoring a policy of retreat in Iraq and higher taxes at home.

The White House and several Republican lawmakers criticized Sen. John Kerry during the day for saying that young men and women unable to navigate the country's education system "get stuck in Iraq."

In remarks prepared for delivery in Georgia, Bush called the statement by his 2004 Democratic presidential rival "insulting and shameful," and called on him to apologize. Kerry lashed out at the president's men and said: "I apologize to no one for my criticism of the president and of his broken policy."

Democrats must gain six seats to win control of the Senate next week, but the House is viewed as more within reach.

Karin Johanson, executive director of the campaign committee, told one group last week that Democrats felt confident they had locked up 10 of the 15 seats they need to prevail, according to participants in the meeting who spoke on condition of anonymity.

But other officials and strategists with long experience in congressional campaigns have turned far more bullish about Democratic chances, and party strategists say no more than two of the party's incumbents who are seeking new terms are in jeopardy of defeat.

In an interview, Mellman said he wasn't counting victories before they occurred. At the same time, he said polls consistently show Democrats with such a large lead on hypothetical ballot tests that they are "outside the realm of historical experience."

"I think if the election were held today we would win," said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic lobbyist who retains close ties with party aides and lawmakers from his days as top aide to Rep. Dick Gephardt, the former House democratic leader.

Recalling disappointments from 1996 and 2000, Elmendorf said, "people are very cautious because we've been up this hill before." He added, "the thing that gives people on our side the most confidence is all our friends on the other (Republican) side think they're going to lose."

Erik Smith, a consultant for Chris Murphy, a House candidate in Connecticut, said, "every day the Democrats' chances of taking the House seem to improve. More races become competitive and races that had been competitive are opening up a little bit."

Strategists involved in key races express even stronger confidence as long as they are free to speak on condition of anonymity. One recently put the party's chances of victory at "100 percent," while another said the only remaining question is the size of the Democratic majority in the Congress that convenes in January.

Mellman said academic models predict Democratic gains of between 14 and 32 seats. Elmendorf said a majority of 15 to 20 seats is possible, indicating gains of 30 to 35 seats on Election Day. Others predicted gains in the same range.

One of the most reliable indicators of competitive seats is party-financed television commercials or other political activity designed to augment a candidate's effort.

By that standard, more than 50 Republican-held seats are competitive, and Democrats have made six-figure investments in television advertisements in many of them. Republicans have done likewise.

Republicans pulled back in three such races during the day, including Rep. Curt Weldon's re-election bid in Pennsylvania and open seats held by Rep. Bob Beauprez, running for governor of Colorado, and Bob Ney of Ohio, who recently pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

In recent days, Democrats have moved into districts long viewed as untouchable. They launched advertisements in a western district in Nebraska; for an Idaho seat; and as a challenge to Rep. Jim Ryun in Republican-heavy Kansas.

At the same time, the overall political environment coupled with the prospect of Democratic landslide victories in New York by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and gubernatorial contender Eliot Spitzer has prompted House Democrats to spend heavily in several districts.

Reports filed with the Federal Election Commission show that as of Monday night, the Democratic campaign committee has spent significant amounts on television advertising on five of the state's nine seats currently in Republican hands.

GOP Reins In Spending In 3 House Races (AP-Y)

By David Espo

DOJ_NMG_0089427

Signaling retreat, House Republicans are scaling back television advertising in three highly contested races, officials said Tuesday, including Rep. Curt Weldon's scandal-tinged bid for re-election in Pennsylvania and open seats in Colorado and Ohio.

Some of the funds will be spent to help other Republicans in races that remain competitive.

In contrast to the Republican strategic retreat, House Democrats are expanding the number of districts where they are advertising, an indication of growing confidence as Election Day approaches. In recent days, the party's campaign committee has moved into districts in New Hampshire, New York, Kansas and Nebraska that have long been in GOP hands.

Democrats must gain 15 seats to win control of the House and six to capture control of the Senate on Nov. 7.

Of the two, the Senate appears a more difficult challenge, and Republicans moved during the day to fortify their position.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee reported it would spend an additional $1 million in the campaign's final days to help Virginia Sen. George Allen in a re-election race that has become far tougher than originally expected.

At the same time, Senate Republicans decided to advertise on behalf of embattled Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana for the first time since August, and beefed up its support for Sen. Lincoln Chafee, trailing in the polls in Rhode Island.

Additionally, the party will begin an independent ad campaign in Michigan for the first time this year, hoping to prevent Sen. Debbie Stabenow from winning a new term.

The information about the various moves came from public records at the Federal Election Commission as well as experts in both parties who track television advertising and campaign strategy. They spoke on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to discuss confidential matters in public.

Weldon, a 10-term lawmaker who appeared to be cruising to re-election not long ago, has become ensnared in a federal corruption investigation. The government is investigating allegations that he used his influence to help his daughter's lobbying firm secure contracts worth $1 million from foreign clients. The FBI recently raided his daughter's home and office in what Weldon termed a politically motivated inquiry.

It appeared that much of the advertising money the National Republican Congressional Committee had intended for his seat in the campaign's final days would be redirected to help Pennsylvania Reps. Michael Fitzpatrick and Jim Gerlach.

The two other races where Republicans are scaling back advertising include the Ohio district that convicted Rep. Bob Ney has represented, and the one Rep. Bob Beauprez vacated to run for governor of Colorado.

House Republicans have reported spending more than $3 million to hold Ney's seat so far, and it appeared that at least a portion of the money intended for that race will now be spent to help Rep. Deborah Pryce, who is locked in a difficult campaign elsewhere in the state.

The Colorado race pits Democrat Ed Perlmutter against Republican Rick O'Donnell. Perlmutter has led comfortably in recent polls, and Republican strategists apparently concluded the money ticketed for that race could be better spent trying to help re-elect Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, seeking a new term in a different part of Colorado.

In Ohio, Democrat Zack Space is running against State Sen. Joy Padgett. Her campaign has been hindered by Ney's refusal to resign from Congress even though he pleaded guilty to felony corruption charges earlier in the month.

Liberals Keen On Takeover Aid Centrists (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic candidates who oppose abortion, gun control and gay rights have some unusual allies this year: liberal online activists desperate for their party to win control of Congress.

Putting aside their own preferences, the Internet activists are promoting and raising money for moderates in swing districts across the country. Many of the candidates have military, business or law enforcement backgrounds. Some, such as Virginia Senate candidate Jim Webb and House hopeful Eric Massa of New York, are former Republicans.

As of Tuesday, online activists had contributed some $826,000 to Webb, a former Navy secretary, via ActBlue.com, a clearinghouse that has raised $16 million for scores of Democrats. Massa had $377,000.

"There is not a single issue that takes precedent to the Democrats winning back a majority in the U.S. Senate this year," Jerome Armstrong, founder of MyDD.com, wrote last week.

President Bush's unpopularity, the Iraq war and congressional scandals are making it easier than usual for Democrats to bury their differences for now. The moderate makeup of contested states and congressional districts also helps.

"There's a sense of reality here," says Rep. Ellen Tauscher, D-Calif., chairman of the centrist, 47-member New Democratic Coalition in the House. She says 30 prominent House challengers are potential members of the group, which favors free trade, strong security and high-tech development.

The Republican counterpart to ActBlue.com is Rightroots.com, a small operation that has raised $274,000 for 21 House and Senate hopefuls. Most are conservatives tagging their opponents as liberals. Three moderates — Senate candidates Tom Kean of New Jersey and Michael Steele of Maryland and House hopeful Ray Meier of New York — had collected nearly $60,000 from Rightroots.com as of Tuesday. Moderate Northeastern incumbents in tight races are not on the group's list of recipients.

Congressional Republicans have proposed bans on gay marriage, flag-burning, human cloning and Internet gambling that could energize conservatives. Republicans say they have not abandoned the center. The GOP is making "a tremendous effort" to help endangered House and Senate moderates in New York, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Rhode Island, strategist Frank Luntz says.

Former GOP chairman Ed Gillespie says "so-called centrist Democrats," if they win, will end up dragged to the left under pressure from liberal Democrats such as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. She is in line to be speaker if Democrats take control.

Many Democratic bloggers are liberals who don't hesitate to criticize their party. Arianna Huffington and others protested, for instance, when Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine was chosen to respond to Bush's State of the Union Speech. They said he was too conservative.

This week, bloggers reacted angrily when Tauscher told two newspapers Democrats should not run "over the left cliff" if they win a House majority. Self-described progressive Chris Bowers wrote on MyDD.com that he felt "stabbed in the back." He later added that "now that I have had the chance to vent, I'd like to … return to actually trying to win the elections."

The results of a spring survey of 1,936 members of MoveOn.org, the liberal online activist group suggest such pragmatism is widespread. Nearly eight in 10 said Democrats should run moderates in conservative and swing districts rather than "truly progressive or liberal candidates" who have little chance of winning.

Democratic leaders aggressively courted moderates this year. Rep. Harold Ford of Tennessee and Pennsylvania Treasurer Bob Casey, both social conservatives, ran unopposed in Senate primaries after rivals were pressured to drop out. Senate leaders publicly backed Webb, a former Navy secretary for Ronald Reagan, in the Virginia primary. They gave backstage help to Montana Senate President Jon Tester, a wheat farmer and custom butcher, in his primary.

Casey and Tester are leading GOP Sens. Rick Santorum and Conrad Burns, respectively. Ford and Webb are in tight races against Republican Bob Corker and Sen. George Allen.

The purest test of blog power this year has been in Connecticut. Senior Democrats backed Sen. Joe Lieberman, a centrist and Iraq war booster, but online activists helped power anti-war candidate Ned Lamont to a primary win. Lieberman is running as an independent and is ahead in polls, despite a recent survey that showed 60% of Connecticut voters oppose the war.

Some observers say Lamont, a politically inexperienced businessman, failed to capitalize on the war's unpopularity. "The distinction between himself and Lieberman became blurred," says Gary Rose, a political scientist at Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn.

Bloggers, however, point to the party's treatment of Lamont and the Democrats who nominated him. "Total abandonment," Matt Stoller said on MyDD.com.

Bush Gains Ground On Economy, But Iraq Still Tops Voters' Agenda (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

A week before Election Day, a new poll shows President Bush getting better marks for his handling of the economy -- an issue Republicans are emphasizing in the run-up to Tuesday's vote -- but voters' anxieties about Iraq continue to dominate their concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0089429

The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows Mr. Bush, buoyed by a rising stock market and falling gasoline prices, essentially breaking even on the economy, with 46% of voters approving his stewardship and 48% disapproving. That's a gain from 39% approval and 56% disapproval in June.

But as Mr. Bush's party fights to retain control of both houses of Congress, the violence in Baghdad in recent weeks has further darkened Americans' mood about Iraq -- the issue voters say is most important in their election decision-making. The result: Voters want Democrats, rather than Republicans, to control Congress by 52% to 37%, a 15-point margin. The spread matches the widest ever recorded on this question in a Journal/NBC poll.

"Iraq sits in the middle of this election," says Bill McInturff, the Republican pollster who helps conduct the Journal/NBC survey. While Republicans may welcome voters' improving attitudes toward the economy, adds his Democratic counterpart, Peter Hart, "they're getting swamped on the issue of Iraq." (See related article4.)

Indeed, the poll demonstrates how directly voters' attitudes on Iraq translate into ballot choices. A 54% majority of the electorate now says removing Saddam Hussein from power wasn't worth the human and financial costs -- the highest percentage in the Journal/NBC poll since the war began in March 2003. Among those voters, eight in 10 want Democrats to control Congress after the elections.

But among the 37% who say the war has been worthwhile, seven in 10 want Republicans in charge on Capitol Hill. Among all voters, 61% say they feel "less confident" the war will end successfully, while just 27% feel "more confident" about the outcome.

The national telephone survey of 1,010 registered voters, which was conducted Oct. 28-30, doesn't account for the vagaries of races for individual Senate seats or House districts; the margin of error is 3.1 percentage points.

In the House, Republicans are counting on several factors to withstand the electoral headwinds: the political strength of embattled incumbents, district boundaries drawn to protect them and their party's proven get-out-the-vote operations. They could also benefit from an uptick in recent weeks in the number of voters who cite "moral values" as a crucial election issue.

Republican strategists suggest their efforts to boost turnout could add two or three points to a candidate's tally; in both 2002 and 2004, those turnout efforts bested Democrats' less-coordinated programs.

But the poll's overall findings track the assessments of key strategists in both parties that Democrats have a strong chance of achieving at least the 15-seat gain they need to capture control of the House. The outcome is cloudier in the Senate, where Democrats would need to gain six seats to have a majority.

Though Democratic candidates appear to have the advantage in the race for Republican Senate seats in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Montana and Rhode Island, they are locked in tough battles in three key states: Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia.

In all three states, Republicans say, their turnout machine could save the day. Tomorrow, Mr. Bush campaigns in Montana, where Republican hopes are fading for Sen. Conrad Burns, who trails Democratic challenger Jon Tester in polls.

Democrats, meanwhile, cite public and private polls as evidence they will be able to hold on to Senate seats in New Jersey and Maryland, the only two of theirs that have been under threat lately.

Republicans had hoped House races would turn on local issues, such as federally funded projects that incumbents have delivered, in effect protecting their candidates from voters' dismay over Iraq and Republican scandals. But in the campaign's final days, that dismay seems to be overwhelming local messages. A number of Republicans suddenly are considered in greater danger, and in areas of the country long friendly to the party.

Among them are Reps. J.D. Hayworth in suburban Phoenix, Gil Gutknecht in Minnesota, Barbara Cubin in Wyoming and Richard Pombo in California, chairman of the House Resources Committee. Open seats in Nebraska and Colorado, both Republican-leaning states, could fall into Democrats' hands. The developments have expanded Democrats' opportunities beyond the Northeast and Ohio Valley, the regions that have long offered their best chances of making inroads.

As they have since early in the election season, the president and his party are trying to shift voters' focus to two issues more favorable to Republicans: taxes and terrorism.

Late yesterday at a Georgia political rally, Mr. Bush fired off one of his most pointed election attacks to date, suggesting Democratic congressional leaders are potential threats to a successful war against terrorism. He also went after Massachusetts

Sen. John Kerry, who reportedly told California college students Monday, "You know education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework, and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't you get stuck in Iraq."

After the president called the remarks "insulting" and "shameful" and demanded an apology, Mr. Kerry said Mr. Bush was the one who owes troops an apology, for "policies that have done injury to our troops and their families." The senator said his remarks were "a botched joke" that referred to Mr. Bush, not soldiers.

In the Journal/NBC poll, just 15% of voters named terrorism as one of the most important issues in their vote. That's fewer than half the 36% who named Iraq. Some 22% identify job creation and economic growth as a top voting issue. Lately on the campaign trail, Mr. Bush has charged that Democrats would raise taxes and harm economic growth.

In the two weeks since the previous Journal/NBC poll, the percentage of voters who say issues of moral values will be critical to how they vote jumped five points -- to 18% from 13%. That may be at least in part a reaction to last week's New Jersey Supreme Court decision that same-sex couples should enjoy the same rights and benefits in the state as heterosexual married couples. Christian conservative groups and Republican candidates they support have seized on the court's ruling to fire up potential voters.

Mr. Bush has also assailed the court's decision at rallies since last week. But generally, his efforts to steer the campaign debate to more favorable ground -- whether conservative values, taxes or terrorism -- appear to have been hobbled by the bloodshed in Iraq, where more than 100 U.S. soldiers died last month. In the latest poll, 63% of voters now disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of the war.

That has helped sour assessments of Mr. Bush's job performance overall, and left many voters eager to send him a message. Just 39% of voters approve Mr. Bush's performance while 57% disapprove. By 37% to 22% voters say they will be voting to send a signal of opposition to Mr. Bush rather than support; 38% say their votes won't reflect their feelings about the president.

The Journal/NBC survey suggests that Republicans' closing campaign push has firmed up support among some traditional backers, while pushing others away.

White men, who marginally favored a Democratic-controlled Congress in early October, now marginally favor a Republican-led one. But white women, an important swing vote, have drifted away from Mr. Bush's party; they now favor a Democratic-controlled Congress by 52% to 38%.

Both sides hold the allegiance of nine in 10 of their own partisans. But Republican support in the electorate's center has virtually collapsed. By 49% to 25%, independents want Democrats to control Congress. Suburban voters favor Democratic control by a similar 51%-to-39% margin.

Democrats also retain an edge in excitement among their voters, an advantage that has built all year long. Voters who expressed the highest levels of interest in the election prefer Democrats to control Congress by 55% to 37%.

It's Up To The GOP Base (HILL)

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Can the Republicans win control of Congress? They can if they want to. It is up to the vaunted GOP base.

According to the Zogby poll, Republican fortunes, while improving in early October, have fallen since. On Sept. 22, Democrats led in the generic vote poll (Do you plan to vote for the Democratic or the Republican candidate in your district?) by nine points, 42-33. But by Oct. 11, their margin was only three — 37-34. But by Oct. 24 it was back up to 11 points — 44-33 — enough for the Democrats to take control of the House and probably the Senate.

But if you dig deep into the Zogby poll, you find an astonishing fact — independents are turning to the Republican Party while Republican base voters are leaving it!

Among independents, the percent that plan to vote Republican has risen from 15 percent on Sept. 22 to 23 percent on Oct. 11 to 26 percent on Oct. 24. While independents are still voting for more Democrats, it's only by 38-26 compared with 38-15 last month.

But as the Republican Party has gained among Independents, it is losing its base. Republicans who plan to vote Republican in 2006 have dropped from 75 percent on Sept. 22 to 72 percent on Oct. 11 to 68 percent on Oct. 24! Obviously the impact of the Foley scandal has yet to diminish among the morality-minded Republican base.

Historically, the Republican Party is able to attract much more support from its base than the Democrats have been able to do from theirs'. But now Democrats are more loyal than Republicans. On Sept. 22, Zogby had 82 percent of the Democrats voting Democrats and 75 percent of Republicans voting Republican. By Oct. 11, party loyalty on both sides had dropped and only 76 percent of Democrats voted their candidates and 72 percent of Republicans backed their party. But by Oct. 24, Democrats had come back to their party and 81 percent were voting for its candidates while only 68 percent of Republicans were loyal to their ticket.

GOP problems with their base should be curable since Republicans largely agree with their party on all the major issues. Their disloyalty stems from the failure of the Republican Congress and President Bush to pass their agenda and concerns over financial and morality scandals in Washington.

If talk-radio show hosts, cable news stations, and the White House do what they do best – talk to their base – they should be able to turn the situation around. But so far their efforts have been unavailing.

But the Democrats have their problems too. Despite their huge national edge they are not leading in the key Senate races. For example, in New Jersey, Rasmussen's polls have the race between Republican challenger Tom Kean and Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez tied. But, in the same survey, New Jersey voters want Democratic Party control of the Senate by 54-36. So while the party is winning by 18 points, its candidate can manage no better than a tie!

And despite the national trend toward the Democrats, Missouri Republican Sen. Jim Talent still clings to a 50-48 lead over Democrat Claire McCaskill. Likewise in Tennessee, Rasmussen has Republican Bob Corker leading Democrat Harold Ford by 50-48.

To control the Senate, Democrats must win two of these three: New Jersey, Tennessee and Missouri and so far, they trail in two and are tied in the third.

Why are Democrats trailing so far behind the national party trend? Because Republican negative ads are working so well and the GOP financial advantage is making itself felt in individual races. The Democrats, dragged down by their suicidal decision to install the fundraising challenged Howard Dean as national chairman, are simply finding it hard to compete on the airwaves in key states. Even Clinton crony Harold Ickes's much heralded effort to fund Democratic races has fallen far short of its fund raising goals, having raised only $3 million of the projected $10 million for which he had hoped.

So voters in swing states are saying: "I want the Democrats to win, just not the guy running in my district." It is still too early to tell if the national Democratic trend will assert itself in the end or whether the Republicans can pull out the swing districts. But the key will be whether the GOP base itself genuinely wants a Republican Congress or not.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including Rewriting History, a rebuttal to Living History by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Campaigner In Chief Has Limited Reach (WP)

By Dan Balz

DES MOINES -- When President Bush swooped down here late last week, Republican House candidate Jeff Lamberti was happy for the high-level attention -- and the roughly $400,000 in contributions -- the short stopover produced for his campaign. But the man Lamberti is trying to unseat, Rep. Leonard L. Boswell (D), was no less happy to see the president in his district.

As Bush's entourage was heading for Michigan and another campaign event, Lamberti said he would welcome the president back anytime. He also made it clear he does not want the president to be the issue that decides his fate next week: "I trust the voters to be sophisticated enough to know it's between the two candidates."

Boswell had another view, one that underscored the double-edged impact of a presidential visit this fall. Saying his challenger would be little more than a rubber stamp for the White House if he is elected, Boswell said Bush's visit might give both campaigns a boost. "If it ramps up their troops a little bit, it will ramp ours up, too," he said.

His name is not on any ballot this fall, but George W. Bush is the central issue of campaign 2006. Tuesday's vote will deliver a referendum on six years of Bush's leadership -- bold and principled or radically divisive, depending on one's political ideology -- and the wartime policies he has championed.

Other issues may come into play, congressional scandals and performance among them, but in the end, next week's verdict will be remembered for what it says about this president. With Bush's approval ratings hovering just below 40 percent, Republicans are braced for big losses.

GOP strategists know well that no political party has successfully weathered a midterm election with such an unpopular president in office. Bush's challenge as he campaigns in the final days of the election is to find a way to excite and mobilize a fractured Republican base without triggering an even bigger turnout among Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents that could cost his party the House or Senate.

As Election Day draws near, the president has taken on a new role for his beleaguered party, that of optimist in chief. On the stump, Bush is ebullient, defiant, humorous, partisan and totally focused on bolstering morale, mocking Democrats (and the pundits he says are in their pockets) for dancing in the end zone before they have scored a touchdown.

On the surface, he appears little changed from the confident campaigner of two and four years ago, vowing to take the fight to the terrorists, defending his policies in Iraq and shining a spotlight on a string of positive economic indicators. But almost everything about these final days of the 2006 campaign points to the differences between this and Bush's other national campaigns. The politician who has done more than anyone else over the past decade to build and expand the Republican Party has become a liability to Republicans in many parts of the country.

One GOP strategist, speaking candidly about the president on the condition of anonymity, offered this assessment: "I'd say he's at least 50 percent of the problem." In strongly Republican areas, he said, the president can still rally the party's base, but in more marginal districts, Bush is a drag on GOP candidates. "He's the problem," the strategist said. "He should stay away."

"Every midterm functions as a referendum on the president," said Republican pollster Bill McInturff. "In this case, I do think the Foley scandal and the feelings about Congress have made that storyline much more muted and much less true." He added that next week's vote "is not a straight-up, yes-or-no referendum on the president."

In the midterm election four years ago, Bush swept through red and blue states in the final week of the campaign, producing Republican victories in places as disparate as Minnesota and Georgia. This year he has been forced by circumstance to pick his spots more carefully, focusing on areas where sympathy for his presidency is greater and opposition to the Iraq war less intense.

That has taken him twice to Georgia already this week, where there are two Democratic-held House seats that Republicans see as vulnerable. It has taken him to his home state, Texas, to campaign in the district held by former House majority leader Tom DeLay, a seat now in danger of tipping to the Democrats.

Later this week he will be in Montana, where Sen. Conrad Burns (R) has been in an uphill battle all year, and in Nevada, where Republican candidates for governor and the House are running into problems. He will touch down in rural Missouri and western Iowa, where Republican voters are plentiful but less motivated than needed to push Senate and gubernatorial candidates to victory.

But as if to underscore his more limited reach this fall, it was first lady Laura Bush who showed up in Connecticut on Monday to campaign for Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R), one of three vulnerable GOP incumbents in the state. And it was Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) who was there Saturday to campaign for the other two, Reps. Rob Simmons and Christopher Shays.

Opposition to the war has forced Bush to avoid campaigning in these final days in many of the most competitive suburban districts this fall, said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Everywhere he goes, there's this banner above his head -- 'Failed Iraq Policy' -- in these suburban districts," he said.

Republican candidates have welcomed the president in their districts to help raise money for their campaigns, but they have run from him in their television ads. According to officials at the Republican House and Senate campaign committees, just one GOP candidate is using the president in a television commercial, LaVar Christensen in Utah's 2nd District.

Christensen has been running an ad that shows a photograph of him with the president. But the ad never mentions the president. Instead, it opens with a photo of former president Ronald Reagan, with Christensen describing himself as a "conservative, Ronald Reagan Republican."

That hardly means Bush has been absent from television screens this fall. Democrats by the dozens have featured him in their ads, trying to tie their opponents to the president and his policies. Bill Burton, a DCCC spokesman, said that, as of the beginning of this week, Democratic candidates and the DCCC have run more than 90 ads in 34 districts featuring the president and the Democrats' opponent.

In Pennsylvania's 8th District, the DCCC attacked Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick for standing with Bush on stem cell research. In Colorado's 7th District, a party-sponsored ad shows footage of Republican candidate Rick O'Donnell coming off Air Force One with the president and ends with the announcer saying: "Rick O'Donnell. Radical ideas and another vote for George Bush's agenda."

Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) came under attack in another ad for working with Bush to pass the prescription drug bill, which Democrats have criticized as a windfall for drug companies. "The drug companies shaped the law," the ad claims. "George Bush backed it, and Clay Shaw helped write it and ram it through."

To save his congressional seat -- in one of the more bizarre twists in this campaign -- Shaw has turned to another president to inoculate himself against attacks that he has marched in lockstep with Bush. Last week he ran a radio ad touting his cooperation with former president Bill Clinton, who was on his way to the state to raise money for Shaw's opponent, Democrat Ron Klein.

"The greatest moments of the Clinton years came when Democrats and Republicans worked together," the ad said. "Like welfare reform. . . . Signed by Bill Clinton and written by our congressman, Clay Shaw."

The ad went on to cite Shaw's work with Clinton to repeal the earnings tax on Social Security and the bill to restore the Everglades. "More than almost anyone else in Congress, Clay Shaw solves problems across party lines," the ad concludes. "So as Palm Beach County welcomes Bill Clinton to town, let's say 'thank you' to Clay Shaw. He's independent and effective."

With his approval rating just below 40 percent, Bush approaches Election Day less popular than all but two presidents in the post-World War II era. Only Harry S. Truman in 1946 and Richard M. Nixon, who had resigned three months before the 1974 midterms, were lower. Even presidents going into midterm elections with higher approval ratings than Bush's -- Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1958, Lyndon B. Johnson in 1966, Ronald Reagan in 1982 and Bill Clinton in 1994 -- have seen their parties suffer major losses.

The best any president has done with an approval rating below 50 percent was in 1978, when Jimmy Carter was at 49 percent. That year, Republicans picked up 15 House seats, exactly the number Democrats need this year to take control of that chamber.

Bush is less unpopular in states whose Senate races are likely to determine whether Republicans retain their majority. With most voters likely to vote Republican or Democratic based on their perceptions of his performance, those differences are enough to affect the outcome of those close races. That has prompted the president to put Missouri on his campaign schedule for Friday.

Bush also will return to Iowa on Friday. David Roederer, who was Bush's Iowa chairman in 2004, said Republicans wanted the president to add a late stop in heavily Republican western Iowa to help Rep. Jim Nussle (R), a gubernatorial candidate who is trailing Democratic Secretary of State Chet Culver -- in part because he is losing in his own congressional district in eastern Iowa.

"We need to have a good turnout in the west," Roederer said.

In past campaigns, Bush's late visits to Iowa have concentrated on the state's eastern battlegrounds. In 2002 he helped save several vulnerable House seats in eastern Iowa, and two years ago his efforts there helped turn Iowa, a blue state in 2000, to red. This year, Nussle's House district could fall to the Democrats. That Bush will campaign in safe Republican territory, rather than in a competitive House district, is one more indicator of the toll that six years and an unpopular war have taken on his presidency.

AP Poll: GOP Outreach To Blacks Falters (AP-Y)

By Nancy Benac, Associated Press Writer

So much for the Republican charm offensive toward minorities. Black voters are far less likely to approve of the way President Bush is doing his job than voters generally and they are more likely to feel that the country is on the wrong track, disheartening news for a Republican Party that has been trying to curry favor with minority voters in recent years.

In what could be a particularly bad sign for Republicans in next week's midterm elections, black voters also are more likely to say that the Iraq war was a mistake and that recent disclosures of scandal and corruption in Congress will be very important to their vote, according to an Associated Press-AOL Black Voices poll conducted Oct. 23 through Monday.

Black voters have historically voted Democratic, and their votes are critical to Democratic hopes to win tight Senate contests in Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia.

Unhappiness among black voters is reflected by L.C. Washington, a 41-year-old Democratic graduate student from Montgomery, Ala., who says Bush is "the worst president in history," not to mention "the dumbest president I've ever seen — he's the devil." Washington lays blame for a laundry list of ills at the Republican Party's doorstep.

"Republicans are trying to win over black voters," says Washington, but "not doing a good job. Doing a poor job — the war, gas prices, job losses and the layoffs."

Even among black Republicans, there clearly still is work for the GOP to do.

"I don't think Republicans are doing any kind of reaching out to African-Americans," said 71-year-old L.D. Harper of Springfield Gardens, N.Y., who's been a Republican since he was 18.

While black voters say Republicans have done a poor job of representing their interests, they also have misgivings about the Democratic Party. Almost half of black voters said the Democratic Party takes their vote for granted; about a third said the party has done a poor job of representing their interests.

About a fourth of blacks said they weren't confident their votes would be counted accurately.

On the issues, black voters were most likely to rate the economy and health care as extremely or very important to them personally.

The AP-AOL Black Voices telephone poll of 900 black adults, 361 of whom are likely voters, was conducted by Ipsos. The margin of error for the full sample is plus or minus 3.5 percentage points, 5 percentage points for the black likely voters. The overall likely voter results are from an AP-AOL poll released last week.

About nine of 10 black voters have gone for the Democrats in recent elections.

Republicans, particularly party chairman Ken Mehlman, have tried to reach out to minority voters in recent years. Bush's draw on the black vote inched up to a still-anemic 11 percent in 2004. But since then the party has taken a hit because of widespread dissatisfaction with how the Bush administration responded to Hurricane Katrina last year.

Only 38 percent of blacks are confident the federal government would help them in a major disaster, according to the AP-AOL poll.

And while the Republican Party has strongly pushed the candidacies of black Republicans in the coming elections, the survey offers little hope that black GOP candidates hold special appeal for minority voters. More than eight in 10 black likely voters say the race of the candidate makes no difference to them.

"It just depends on their platform," said Kassandra Williamson-Moore, a black Democrat from Indianapolis. "You can't just vote strictly by race."

Prominent black candidates this year include Republican gubernatorial hopefuls Kenneth Blackwell in Ohio and Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania, GOP Senate candidate Michael Steele in Maryland, and Democratic Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr., in Tennessee. Republicans Steele, Blackwell and Swann are behind in the polls; Democrat Ford is running about even with his opponent.

Blacks are disproportionately unhappy with Bush, 89 percent of likely voters disapprove, compared with 61 percent of all likely voters.

But blacks' approval ratings for Congress — disapproval ratings, actually — are roughly similar to those for all likely voters. Some 83 percent of likely black voters disapprove of the way Congress is doing its job, compared with 75 percent of all likely voters.

David Bositis, of the Washington-based Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, said there's little variation in congressional approval numbers by race because Congress is so widely viewed as being "in the trash."

Overall, Bositis said, the Republican courtship of black voters sometimes looks like a case of "one step forward, two steps back."

"They're never going to succeed in attracting more African-American support until the party has some level of catastrophic failure and then decides to go back to the drawing board," he said.

Curtis Gans, director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate, said voter turnout among blacks tends to be lower than among adults in general, but in 2004 they, like Americans overall, turned out in higher numbers.

He said voter discontent could boost turnout similarly this time, adding that: "The group that is the most uniformly anti-Republican at this time is African-Americans."

Two-thirds of black registered voters say they are following news about the campaign, compared with 71 percent of all registered voters doing likewise.

Osama Isn't Running (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

HARD AS IT IS to imagine now, there was a time in the not-so-distant past when the GOP was considered to be the "party of ideas." As the 2006 campaign draws to a merciful close, the only idea national Republicans seem to have left is that, when in doubt, accuse Democrats of being a bunch of terrorist-loving wimps. But as the boy who cried wolf learned the hard way, fear-mongering has its diminishing returns.

The strain of escalating demonization is starting to show. Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), a former GOP wunderkind now scratching for his political life, absurdly accused his opponent, Bob Casey Jr., this week of "aiding and abetting terrorism and genocide." This after airing a commercial in which Casey was shown next to Kim Jong Il and a mushroom cloud. An ad titled "The Stakes," produced by the Republican National Committee, features Osama bin Laden and his minions threatening more attacks.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) last week characterized Democrats' Iraq strategy as "waving the white flag and surrendering." This just weeks after the spectacularly opportunistic retiring majority leader (who can forget the good doctor's "I've seen the video" second-guessing of Terri Schiavo's diagnosis?) concluded that the war in Afghanistan can't be won militarily.

The Republican message reeks of desperation; the party seems spent. That's the nature of the political cycle in Washington — parties eventually overreach after governing uncontested for a time, as their loyalists' desire to stay in power outlasts their enthusiasm for their own ideas. The only reason this election is a cliffhanger is the lack of inspired thinking by Democratic opposition leaders.

President Bush, meanwhile, is also getting into the fear-mongering. "The Democrat approach," he said this week on the stump in Georgia, "comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. And that's what's at stake in this election."

This is why much of the world considers our president a caricature figure — because on occasion he acts like one. It is expected and appropriate for parties to flesh out their differences on national security issues, but it should be a debate about means, not ends.

Part of the Republican playbook consists once again of conveniently confusing the war in Iraq with the post-9/11 war on terror. The disingenuous formulation remains: Criticize the war in Iraq and you're a Bin Laden sympathizer. Voters seem to be growing tired of such manipulation. Who knows, they may even notice that Al Qaeda's leader, in fact, has not been captured — except in the video montages of Republican campaign ads.

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Political action committees representing business interests have boosted their donations to House Democrats in recent weeks, but a significant chunk of that money has not gone to Democratic candidates.

Instead, the money has languished in the accounts of safe incumbents who have given little, or nothing at all, to Democratic candidates in the months leading up to Election Day.

The behind-the-scenes financial maneuvers have come to light in recent days with the filing of reports at the Federal Election Commission (FEC) disclosing fundraising activities through Oct. 18.

Among other interesting developments, the new reports show that Democrats who are poised to become influential committee chairmen if they win control of the House have reaped hundreds of thousands of dollars in political action committee (PAC) contributions over the past several weeks.

The flow of funds, most of it from business interests, who tend to give most of their contributions though PACs, is significantly higher than two years ago when Democrats were viewed as having a slim chance of capturing the House.

Rep. Jim Oberstar (D-Minn.), the ranking member of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, has raised $225,000 for his campaign account from PACs between July 1 and Oct. 18, drawing donations from PACs belonging to business giants such as CSX Corporation and 3M. That amount is nearly $70,000 more than he raised from such sources during a similar stretch in 2004. But during the recent three-and-a-half month period, a $1,000 contribution to Mike Erlandson was the only money he gave to a Democratic House candidate, fundraising records show.

John Schadl, Oberstar's campaign spokesman defended his boss by noting that he has paid the entirety of his dues owed to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC).

"Jim's one of those members who's always kept his dues paid up at the DCCC," he said. "Other members may have let that lag a little but Jim's been a supporter of the DCCC."

Schadl said that Oberstar paid the last installment of his $200,000 in dues last week when he transferred $50,000 to the party committee, a transaction not yet reflected in public reports.

But Oberstar has not given more to the DCCC than what he was asked earlier in the election cycle, before he and other prospective chairmen began reaping a windfall of business giving. Business contributions to Democrats have picked up dramatically since Congress adjourned at the end of September amid the House page sex scandal.

The ranking Democrats on other powerful committees have given lavishly to Democratic candidates as business contributions have begun to pour in.

Rep. Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.), who would become chairman of the Ways and Means committee, raised $269,000 for his campaign coffers, mostly from business PACs, from the end of August to mid-October. During that time he has also given $156,000 to Democratic congressional candidates and $200,000 to the DCCC.

Rangel owed $300,000 in dues to the DCCC because of his ranking position on Ways and Means, but he has far exceeded that goal by having transferred $570,000 to the party committee, according to FEC records.

But other ranking Democrats have not been quite as generous, keeping most of the money they've raised recently, even though they are not considered in any electoral danger.

Rep. David Obey (Wis.), the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, gave $50,000 to the DCCC in the last four months. But during that time Obey raised $203,000 from PACs, almost $40,000 more than what he raised over the same period in 2004.

In total, Obey has given $350,000 to the DCCC this election cycle, more than the $300,000 he owed because of his senior position on Appropriations. But some Democratic candidates may wonder why Obey kept the bulk of his recent fundraising haul despite having $679,000 in his campaign account and facing no real political opposition.

Rep. Collin Peterson (D-Minn.), the ranking member of the House Agriculture Committee, raised $180,000 from PACs between July 1 and Oct. 18. Peterson gave $14,000 to Democratic congressional candidates, even though he raised almost twice as much from PACs compared to a similar period in 2004. Prior to July, however, Peterson gave $250,000 to the DCCC.

Rep. John Dingell (Mich.) owes $300,000 to the DCCC because he is the ranking Democrat on the Energy and Commerce Committee. He has only given $100,000 to the party committee through Oct. 18. That is despite raising $346,000 between July 20 and Oct. 18, according to FEC reports.

During that time he has given $38,000 in contributions to Democratic congressional candidates. He has given more to local candidates in Michigan. He gave over $100,000 during that period to help state-level candidates in the Wolverine State. Dingell, who is serving his 26th term in the House, has $820,000 in cash in his campaign account.

On the Republican side of the aisle, several prominent Republicans have given surprisingly little to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC).

Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, has given only $10,000 from his campaign as of Oct. 18. That could be largely because Lewis is reportedly under federal investigation because of allegations that he did legislative favors in exchange for campaign contributions. He has accumulated hundreds of thousands of dollars in legal bills.

Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), has only transferred $10,000 from his campaign to the party committee. Reynolds is in a tough race but his colleagues may not accept that as an excuse. The so-called "Battleground" fundraising program Reynolds helped organized has asked even the most endangered Republican lawmakers to contribute $75,000 to the NRCC.

Retiring Rep. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.), who formally chaired the House ethics committee, again signaled his dissatisfaction with his party by giving only $1,000 from his campaign to the NRCC. Hefley was removed as chairman of the ethics panel after he presided over its decision to rebuke former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) for several ethics transgressions.

House Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), who has since become embroiled in ethics allegations, has given nothing from his campaign to the NRCC, according to the most recent FEC records.

Pombo is favored to win reelection on Nov. 7, but his race is considered competitive.

Democrats Enjoy Resurgence (HILL)

By Jim Snyder
The Hill, November 1, 2006

Michael McKenna is a Republican and owner-operator of a one-man lobbying shop, MWR Strategies. Those facts led his client, energy company Suez, to ask him the following in a recent phone conversation: What does he plan to do if Democrats retake the House?

"What my plan is, is to adjust to a new reality," McKenna says he told executives from Suez, formerly known as Tractebel.

McKenna said that likely means he will work more closely with his Democratic colleagues through some sort of formal business agreement to lobby on behalf of his client.

"There is no getting around the fact that [Democrats] are going to be more important," McKenna said. Even if Democrats fall short of retaking the House or the Senate, the margins in either body are likely to be narrowed.

Some version of the question posed by Suez executives is being repeated across Washington, as companies, associations and lobbying firms plan for the new reality after the midterm elections.

Many political observers predict Democrats will regain the majority in the House, or at least significantly reduce the voting margins held by Republicans. Less likely, though possible, is a Democratic takeover of the Senate.

While the election is still six days away, the strength Democratic candidates have shown has already produced one shift in Washington: Democratic lobbyists, once marginalized, are seeing a resurgence in their popularity.

"We've had more detailed conversations in the last month than we have had all year," says Patrick Murphy, a lobbyist who has been an active supporter of Democrats. Murphy joined mCapitol Management in July and has been aggressively marketing his ties to Democrats ever since.

"We are ready for the new transition," says Murphy, whose current clients include Eastman Kodak, the American Federation of Government Employees, and the Edison Electric Institute.

Lobbyists close to House Democrats in particular are stressing their ties. Not many lobbyists bothered with House Democrats, they say, because the caucus faced a disciplined Republican majority and had little ability to affect the course of House votes. Now those ties could produce new business.

"In 2005, things were pretty tough for a Democrat. Nobody thought we were going to win," said Steve Elmendorf, a former chief of staff to then-House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) , who is now in the midst of expanding his practice at Bryan Cave Strategies.

As they work to market themselves by stressing those ties, Democrats on K Street are also careful to strike a cautionary tone.

"Nobody's measuring drapes. Nobody's counting their chickens," Elmendorf said.

Any change in the political dynamic will affect industries differently. How members view issues relating to telecommunications, financial services or transportation doesn't necessarily depend on their party affiliation, Elmendorf said.

One industry, though, that may feel particularly nervous about a Democratic takeover is the energy industry, which is a traditionally strong backer of the Republican Party.

Democrats, meanwhile, have called for "windfall" profits on oil companies. A Democratic House may also investigate the rise in gasoline prices or Vice President Cheney's energy task force that often met in secret.

"There are companies that are definitely looking to hire Democrats," said John Northington of Thomas Advisors, a firm that specializes in energy issues.

Northington is a rarity: a Democratic lobbyist who specializes in energy production issues. Oil giant ExxonMobil hired Northington three months ago to lobby the White House on exploration issues and to reach out to Democrats in Congress.

Other lobbyists said energy companies have been calling them, too.

"It is evident across the board that energy companies are desperately trying to identify lobbyists with Democratic credentials, especially in the House," says Stephen Brown, a former counsel to Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.), who is in line to take over the Energy and Commerce Energy and Air Quality subcommittee if Democrats regain the majority in the House.

Brown, who now runs the energy and environment practice at Dutko Worldwide, a broad, bipartisan firm, said several companies have approached him in recent weeks. He declined to name the companies.

Brown favors some issues more aligned with Republicans, like opening the outer continental shelf to oil and gas drilling. But while his practice is bipartisan, Brown adds, "I can talk Democrat."

It may be easy to overstate the nervousness among business groups in town.

Democratic staffers have sought to ease any anxiety among business leaders in the run-up to the election. Many lobbyists don't predict wild swings in policy even if Democrats take over one or both bodies of Congress.

Don Duncan, a lobbyist at ConocoPhillips, said the most onerous measures proposed for oil and gas companies, like windfall profit tax, are unlikely to become law in an environment where the voting margins are close and there is a Republican president with veto power.

"Personally, I'm not that concerned with a change. We'll work with whoever is up there," Duncan said.

Most large companies and trade groups already employ a bipartisan staff, although Republicans, who have control of the House, Senate, and White House, are typically in the top spot.

"At the end of the day, you are going to have to have a strong bipartisan team," Elmendorf said.

But many Democratic lobbyists describe the environment in more hopeful terms than any time since Republicans took over the House in 1994.

Through efforts like the K Street Project, Republican leaders have sought to put their own into top slots of trade groups or large companies. There is disagreement over how aggressively that effort was carried out. But Democrats maintain the effort was real and harmful to the prospects of Democratic lobbyists.

The Association of Oil Pipe Lines last week hired Shirley Neff, a former Democratic aide on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources, to lead the group.

Raymond Paul, a spokesman for the group, said Neff's Democratic background had nothing to do with the decision.

"Our executive search team didn't discuss party affiliation," he said.

While Neff will replace another former Democratic staffer, Benjamin Cooper, the association would likely have felt more pressure to hire a Republican a couple of years ago when Republicans were more firmly in control of Congress, one Democratic lobbyist said.

Win Or Lose, Some Republicans Are Already Pressing For Major Changes (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Win or lose next week, the GOP needs some serious soul-searching, according to several rank-and-file House Republicans who already are arguing in favor of a post-Election Day leadership shake-up.

With just days before voters decide Republicans' fate, most lawmakers contacted for this article are focused on last-minute campaign and get-out-the-vote efforts and won't talk about post-election strategy.

Others, however, believe that change — be it in policy, process, or leadership matters —as soon as possible is the only way House Republicans can climb out of the rut they've been stuck in this cycle.

"If we lose the majority, I think it ought to be a clean sweep — a fresh start," Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) said about the GOP leadership team.

He worries that if the GOP keeps even a fragile hold on its majority, the conference will stick with the same leadership course with only minor changes. This, in turn, will mean continuing to put too much emphasis on trying to keep the majority by handing out earmarks to vulnerable members and special favors to certain groups instead of standing for principles such as fiscal restraint.

Recent conference calls with GOP leaders have done nothing to calm his fears. "When you get on these conference calls … there's not much of a 'Mea culpa on what we've done wrong and here's what we're going to do,' " he said.

Even GOP lawmakers reluctant to discuss anything past Nov. 7 are preparing for a leadership scramble next week.

Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) has indicated that she would like to run for the GOP conference chair, a key communications position now held by Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), who is in the toughest reelection fight of her life. In the last month, Blackburn has hit the talk show circuit to press the GOP's case to voters, appearing on about 20 national TV shows, according to her spokesman.

"Right now everybody's focus is on Nov. 7 and those of us that are looking at leadership races know that the focus has to be on keeping our majority and helping our colleagues win … ," she said. "With that said, and as you look at the last year, we all know there will be a crowded field for different leadership posts when we get ready to have our elections."

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the conference vice chairman and a contender for the full chairmanship, has also hit the media circuit to speak out for Republican candidates. He also gave at least $365,000 from his campaign committee alone to the National Republican Congressional Committee, according to a recent Federal Election Commission report.

Kingston doesn't want to discuss leadership contests, and sticks to the GOP election script that Democrats would raise taxes if they retake control. But he concedes that Republicans need to make critical policy changes after the election, win or lose.

House Republicans must provide more oversight hearings on the war in Iraq and do more to end the nation's addiction to oil by developing viable energy alternatives. "We've got to provide better energy solutions," he said.

Flake is well known for fighting his leaders, especially against earmarks, but he also places some blame for GOP's poor standing on himself for failing to speak out more strongly at key times.

Flake said he deeply regrets not standing up and criticizing GOP leaders' decision early last year to purge the ethics committee of its Republican members after the panel admonished former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) for the third time for ethics violations.

"The rank-and-file members, myself included, should have stood up and screamed," he said. "Its just another indication that we're not policing our own and it goes to the whole earmarking culture [that led to the imprisonment of former Rep.] Duke Cunningham [R-Calif.]."

If the ethics committee had been up and running last year when GOP leaders first heard about inappropriate emails former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to a page, members would have been able to refer it to the panel for investigation. Democrats, at the time, were protesting the purge of GOP members and were refusing to meet the new Republicans on the committee.

"You can blame the Democrats, but we certainly gave them a reason to do what they did," Flake said. "We simply didn't have an ethics committee process that worked at a time when we needed it … I feel badly that I didn't say anything and neither did other members … it's a pox on all of us."

Other members would only speak anonymously of a growing desire within the conference to change at least some of its leaders no matter what happens next week.

"There's a heightened sense that there needs to be a different approach — a refocusing of our priorities," one lawmaker noted. "There is a lot of frustration."

When asked, several GOP sources said they believed that Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) could announce his departure whether Republicans maintain the majority or not, although most believe it is more likely if Republicans lose.

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) could run to replace him or, if in the minority, simply try to keep his job as leader, but he could face opposition in any race for a top spot from outspoken conservatives such as Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) or John Shadegg (R-Ariz.). Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) is also weakened, GOP sources said, and would not fare well in a challenge against Boehner, who beat him for the post after DeLay stepped aside.

"I don't think anyone wants to see that redux," one GOP source remarked.

Others mentioned as possible leadership contenders include: Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) and Tom Feeney (R-Fla.). Reps. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), Pete Sessions (R-Texas) and Phil English (R-Pa.) are all running to chair the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Bill Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard, said, "If they lose the House, it might be time for a change in leadership for obvious reasons — fresh faces, fresh blood … All three would go—Hastert, Boehner, Blunt, from my outside point of view."

Kristol and several other lawmakers interviewed for this article believe at least two members of the team are safe from challenge: Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) and GOP Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.). Both are members of the Republican Study Committee, a large conservative group that has repeatedly challenged GOP leaders to rein in spending. Both have managed to stay above the fray through hard work. Many GOP sources say Cantor could rise in the GOP ranks, considering that he amassed roughly 170 votes in what was then only a hypothetical race for whip earlier this year.

"Eric's worked hard with the battleground program raising money... ," one GOP lawmaker said, "and conservatives and others who are unhappy with the direction of the conference always felt that he would support us if he were in a position to actually make decisions."

Ky. Republican In Toss-up House Race (AP-Y)

By Dylan T. Lovan

AP, November 1, 2006

Democrats have been targeting Republican Rep. Anne Northup for a decade to no avail, but that hasn't stopped them from betting once again that her political luck is about to run out.

DOJ_NMG_0089442

Northup, a five-term incumbent, has a lot of advantages, including a prized seat on the House Appropriations Committee. She has raised twice as much money as her Democratic opponent.

But her ties to President Bush, mounting casualties in Iraq and her district's penchant for leaning Democrat has made the race against Louisville businessman John Yarmuth a virtual toss-up.

Bush is not popular here; the district went for Democratic presidential candidates John Kerry in 2004 and Al Gore in 2000. Four years ago, Northup held on to her seat by beating a political newcomer by just a few thousand votes.

"John Yarmuth wants to make this a race on the popularity of the president, which in this district is not that high," Northup said. "He makes two claims, that it's about President Bush or that I'm a rubber stamp for the president, and it's neither one of those."

Yarmuth, a former Republican who switched parties in 1985, said despite the war and the GOP's troubles, he thinks voters will be thinking about their pocketbooks on Nov. 7.

"Economic security has become the critical factor in their decision-making. They're being squeezed by health care costs, by energy costs and stagnant wages," he said.

A recent Bluegrass Poll by The Courier-Journal of Louisville showed Northup was favored 48 percent to 42 percent for Yarmuth, but that falls within the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Northup said a Yarmuth win would hurt the district, because of her prominent position on the Appropriations Committee and support of a billion-dollar project to build two new bridges on the Ohio River at Louisville.

"This project needs a champion every day," Northup said. She said the project could crumble if Yarmuth were to win the seat.

"If somebody blinks, just by benign neglect, it'll fall apart," she said.

Northup had a strong fundraising advantage as of mid-October, with nearly $900,000 left in her campaign coffers, compared to about $170,000 for Yarmuth.

Yarmuth's campaign is getting some late help from national Democrats.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee began running a television ad critical of Northup on Monday night in the district. The 30-second spot is the first ad the DCCC has run in the district during the campaign, said DCCC spokeswoman Adrienne Elrod.

"This is a race that we definitely see as winnable," she said.

The Republican National Committee had no plans as of this week to run an ad on behalf of Northup, said Northup campaign spokesman Patrick Neely.

Northup has already survived four close races, repeatedly dashing Democratic hopes.

This year's close race has turned the campaign nasty, especially on the airwaves.

Northup's campaign has dug up opinion articles Yarmuth wrote when he was a columnist for a weekly alternative newspaper, the Louisville Eccentric Observer, that he founded. In television ads, she has accused Yarmuth of penning support for marijuana legalization, gay marriage and lowering the drinking age.

Yarmuth has said the columns were taken out of context by the Northup campaign, which created a Web site featuring snippets of Yarmuth's columns and TV appearances over the last 16 years. Yarmuth created his own rebuttal ad that pokes fun at Northup, saying he also "plays golf with Saddam Hussein" and "snatches toys from little children."

Northup's own ads have yet to mention that she is a Republican, and she has not invited President Bush to the district to campaign for her.

In a further distancing from Bush, she recently announced a shift in her views on the Iraq war, calling for the ouster of Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and saying the U.S. military policy needs a change of course.

Yarmuth called Northup's shift "obvious political posturing in the last moments of the campaign."

Northup's change didn't matter to retired truck driver Jim Vibert, who lives in Louisville's south end, a blue-collar area where Northup has won over many Democrats.

Vibert, a Republican, said he has soured on Bush but said he'll vote again for Northup. He said he believes her values are similar to his.

"She's more in line with the thinking around here," Vibert said while sipping coffee during lunch hour at a White Castle restaurant. "I think it's going to be a tight race."

Another south-end voter, Steve Fein, said he is supporting Yarmuth. He said strong gains by the stock market are not improving the economic situation of many in the middle class. He said Yarmuth is a thoughtful candidate.

"He has a lot of good ideas," Fein said.

Northup has held onto the district by effectively appealing to Democratic voters, said Phil Laemmle, a retired University of Louisville political science professor.

"What we have here is a large number of Democratic voters who have consistently voted for Northup," he said.

Laemmle said Yarmuth would be leading Northup if the problems plaguing national Republicans better motivated Democratic voters in the district.

"I think the election has been nationalized in many areas (of the country), but I don't think that strategy is as effective in Kentucky," he said. "It doesn't divide people as much as it does in other districts. If that were the case, Yarmuth would be in a much stronger position."

8th District Battle In Washington A Surprising Tossup (USAT)

By John Ritter

ORTING, Wash. — By all rights, Republican Rep. Dave Reichert shouldn't be having such a tough time winning a second term.

He's the popular former King County sheriff who brought the Green River serial killer to justice in 2001. He represents a district that has never elected a Democrat. His opponent has never held public office, while he's a 30-year public servant. As a freshman on Capitol Hill he landed a coveted post: chairman of a Homeland Security subcommittee.

Yet Reichert's race against Democrat Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft manager, is rated a tossup and considered a key race if Democrats are to regain control of the House. A poll Oct 24-26 by Constituent Dynamics, an independent research firm, had Burner leading 49% to 47%.

Heavy hitters from both parties — including President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Barack Obama — have stumped this fast-growing, affluent suburban region. Al Gore appeared last month with Burner and Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell and lambasted Reichert on global warming.

The national parties have funneled in gobs of money: $1.5 million from the Republicans and nearly $900,000 from the Democrats has been spent so far. The candidates themselves have raised a combined $5.1 million.

Reichert's unexpected struggle against a political novice is due to growing opposition to the Iraq war and scandals in the Republican-controlled Congress, to the 8th District's changing demographics and to Burner's well-financed campaign, political analysts say.

Burner, 35, tries to paint Reichert, 56, as a Bush apologist. Reichert maintains that he votes independently and doesn't always toe the party line. Burner has not called for withdrawing the troops but says Congress should be more assertive over Iraq policy. Reichert says troops should stay put until Iraq's government and economy are stable.

If Burner were running in any other year, Reichert says, “she wouldn't have this kind of showing. All she has is to paint me with the Bush brush. … But Congress is not running the war. We shouldn't be calling the shots. We have been and will continue to ask tough questions and provide oversight.”

Burner says voters she talks to have turned against the war. “They understand that Bush's strategy in Iraq has failed,” she says. “They look at (Reichert's) voting record and the times he's voted with his party and President Bush. They understand if they want to change course, they have to change him.”

Shifts in the district, packed with bedroom communities of commuters to Seattle and Tacoma, haven't helped GOP candidates, says David Olson, a University of Washington political science professor. Recent Asian and Russian immigrants have dropped income levels a bit in the state's most prosperous district.

Bellevue, the district's largest city, "is not the rock-ribbed Republican city that it once was," Olson says. "There's a significant group of blue-collar workers. … That's not the usual image we think of" here.

Wealthy voters usually associated with GOP values are more tech-centered here and tend to be moderate on social issues. "Very much like Silicon Valley," Donovan says.

Women could be a key. "On everything from school prayer to abortion, women in these satellite suburbs are economic conservatives and social liberals," Olson says. "That makes a Darcy Burner an attractive candidate."

In Congress, Reichert reversed his opposition to more federal funding for research using embryonic stem cells after, he said, he investigated the issue. "This is no dyed-in-the-wool follower of the Bush line, up, down and sideways," Olson says. "Part of that is driven by the social liberalism of women in this district."

Here in Orting, in eastern Pierce County, change has been rapid. The city has tripled in size to 6,000 since the early 1990s, including a 12% growth rate in the last year alone. Most of the influx was families with children looking for affordable housing, a group that might have moderated a historically conservative rural town, says city administrator Mark Bethune.

Or maybe not. Stan Gunno, a general contractor among 25 or so who turned out last week for Reichert's appearance, says the congressman will support "finishing the job" in Iraq. Burner, says Gunno, "is running a campaign against George Bush instead of running against her opponent."

Another Reichert supporter, retiree Dixon Blackmer, 67, likes it that Reichert "supports the administration most of the time."

"You want to know if I support Bush and the war? Absolutely," he says. "You want to know do I think we need an exit strategy? Yeah, he has one: We're going to win."

A Democrat In Nebraska (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

This year, open seats have become dangerous territory for Republicans. Only months ago, Scott Kleeb, left, a 31-year-old cattle rancher who is running in Nebraska's Third Congressional District, where voters have not sent a Democrat to the House since 1958, could barely get an audience with Democratic leaders.

This week, after a poll showed Mr. Kleeb with a slight edge, the party sent $100,000 his way. The Republican, Adrian Smith, a 36-year-old real estate agent, had hoped to slip into the seat being vacated by Representative Tom Osborne.

As he campaigns, Mr. Kleeb quips: "I'm a Democrat, and I'm a bull rider. Now which of those two things do you all think is more difficult to be in Nebraska?"

Rep. Wilson Getting Help From Debate, 5-foot Duck (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — It is a sign of the times for Republicans that the political survival of Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), a five-term incumbent and straight-laced U.S. Naval Academy graduate, may now depend on a woman in a duck suit.

Wilson trotted out this campaign prop last week to bring attention to her Democratic rival Patricia Madrid's "ducking" of debates. The unabashed tactic was a page from a challenger's playbook — an easy ploy to draw media attention to a flagging campaign — and it underscored Wilson's position as the underdog in the polls.

"You don't need to know the latest insider tracking polls to know that … Heather Wilson is having trouble closing out her race with rival Patricia Madrid. You just have to know about the duck," quipped New Mexican blogger Joe Monahan.

By Saturday, however, the duck was earning its keep in media stardom. A Madrid supporter had allegedly stomped on its webbed foot in a tussle outside a Democratic rally, prompting a call to police.

"The gentleman stepped on my foot purposely," sobbed the wounded waterfowl, Kathleen Hennessey, a campaign volunteer on leave from Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart's (R-Fla.) office. The Wilson campaign speedily distributed the video to news organizations, drawing attention away from the rally with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa (D).

The duck appeared on crutches with mock bandages a day later.

The avian performance, coupled with ads highlighting Madrid's gaffe in the candidates' one televised debate, are the incumbent's last-ditch maneuvers to stave off an impending Democratic wave.

The last six independent polls in the race have shown Wilson tied with and then trailing Madrid, the state attorney general, marking the first time the perennially vulnerable incumbent has been behind her challenger.

Democrats have sought to nationalize the race by charging that Wilson is a "rubber stamp" for President Bush and congressional Republicans. As approval ratings for national Republicans have slumped so too have Wilson's poll numbers.

"I'd vote for whatever Democrat, any Democrat to take over this Congress," said Robert Lovelace, 56, the night manager at an Albuquerque Econolodge, who describes himself as "a moderate Republican or moderate Democrat." He said he knew little about the race but planned to vote. "The Republicans are in control of everything. They just have too much power. You learn who tells the truth and who hands you a crock of bull."

But political observers expect Wilson to rally in the final week of the race.

"I expect it to further tighten," said Brian Sanderoff, an independent pollster in Albuquerque whose three surveys in the race have shown Wilson leading 45-42 percent, then tied at 44 percent, then trailing 42-45 percent. "Nationally it's not going well for the Republicans, but I haven't seen the Madrid forces counter the buzz about the debate. The Wilson campaign has skillfully developed an ad based on Madrid's debate faux pas that to me looks quite devastating."

During last week's high-ratings televised debate, Wilson asked Madrid to "cite something … that will give the people of New Mexico some kind of reassurance that you will prevent a tax increase."

Madrid was flummoxed, fumbling for 12 seconds before launching into a response about the proportion of the tax cuts that went to the upper class.

"It's been a long time since I've heard that much dead air time on Channel 4!" quipped Wilson afterward.

The Wilson campaign repackaged the exchange into an ad that began airing Sunday with the tagline "Patricia Madrid … Don't take the risk."

That approach could resonate with voters like Richard Anglada, 48, an Albuquerque real estate broker.

"Whether I'm low-income or high-income, I hate taxes. I don't like all the taxes the Democrats would propose," said Anglada, a Democrat. "I am leaning towards Madrid, but I just hate that tax issue. I would probably make up my mind on taxes."

In the past, it has been Democrats and Hispanics that have propelled Wilson to victory in a district where Democrats outnumber Republicans.

In Sanderoff's first poll in the race, in which Wilson was leading, she had 35 percent of the Hispanic vote and 17 percent of Democrats. In his third poll, Hispanic support had dropped to 20 percent and Democratic backing to 10 percent.

"Simple math in this district tells you the Republican wins by luring Democrats and Hispanics," Sanderoff said.

Wilson was clearly aware of those calculations. She held a "Democrats, Hispanics Pledge Support for Heather Wilson" event Sunday with New Mexican musician Al Hurricane.

Tuesday, a prominent Democrat was predicting an exceedingly tight race.

Democratic Governor Bill Richardson told the Albuquerque Tribune that Madrid would prevail by one half of one percentage point.

Drug Benefit Is Popular, But Not Touted Much By GOP (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Republican lawmakers looking to change the subject from unfavorable issues such as the war in Iraq have by and large avoided claiming credit for what the White House views as one of the GOP majority's signature domestic-policy accomplishments: the Medicare prescription-drug benefit.

DOJ_NMG_0089446

President Bush and congressional leaders such as House Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) have urged GOP incumbents to shift the electoral debate toward matters that they say demonstrate the effectiveness of Republican-controlled government.

But few candidates have actively highlighted their support for Part D, which has been under constant Democratic fire. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) has vowed to begin the process of altering the program within the first 100 hours of the next Congress if her party takes control of the House.

Democrats have maintained their drumbeat of criticism of Part D — frequently referring to it as a "disaster" — even as the program appears to have stabilized from significant logistical problems during its rollout in January.

The program has proved popular with those beneficiaries who have joined the Part D program, according to numerous opinion polls.

J.D. Power and Associates released survey findings in September showing 75 percent of Part D enrollees were satisfied with their benefits. This week, the AARP, which endorsed the bill to create the program, issued survey results showing that 48 percent of voters age 42 and older think the program is good for senior citizens, compared with 26 percent who think it's bad.

Bush, Boehner and other Republican message-makers have responded sharply to Democratic criticisms, pointing to such polls and the millions of people newly receiving drug coverage under the program.

But except for the administration, the GOP has been mostly reactive to Democratic assaults rather than aggressive.

Republican campaign sources identified some exceptions on the campaign trail, such as GOP Reps. Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.), and GOP Sens. Jim Talent (Mo.) and Jon Kyl (Ariz.). Each lawmaker is locked in competitive reelection battles against opponents who have targeted them for their roles in drafting the Medicare drug bill.

Nationally, however, the Republican election effort has shied away from Medicare Part D. Neither the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), the National Republican Senatorial Committee nor the Republican National Committee has run any advertisements highlighting the program this year, spokespeople for the organizations said.

While the national campaign operations have chosen not to highlight Part D, big business has. Between July and September, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce paid for television spots targeting eight Senate races and 26 House races. The advertisements praised lawmakers by name, including some Democrats, for their votes in favor of the bill that created Part D.

In 2003, Bush and the congressional Republican leadership cajoled an often recalcitrant rank-and-file to support the legislation to create the drug program with promises that tackling the potent Medicare issue would win them strengthened support among the politically motivated older voting bloc.

The president reiterated this argument last month. "My own view is our candidates and the people who voted for this ought to be out there traveling to senior centers all over their districts and their state, saying, 'Look what we did,'" Bush remarked on Oct. 20, the AP reported.

One of the central figures in the creation of the program agrees. "They're crazy not to take credit for it," said former Medicare chief Tom Scully, who added, "It's a huge positive in my opinion." Scully left the administration three years ago and now works as a lobbyist at Alston and Bird and is a partner at the New York-based investment firm Welsh, Carson, Anderson and Stowe.

One Republican campaign operative denied that GOP candidates would not benefit from Part D this year. "Just because it's not a central theme in every race … doesn't mean it's not a political winner," said NRCC spokesman Ed Patru.

Scully suggested that Republican candidates simply are not comfortable taking credit for an expansion of an already large entitlement program. "Republicans traditionally are fearful of talking about Medicare," he said.

Moreover, Scully said, the low-income people who stand to benefit the most from the program do not usually support Republican candidates.

The program may be popular with Medicare beneficiaries, but it is not with segments of the GOP. Fiscal conservatives in particular were displeased that Republicans enacted the largest entitlement-program expansion since Medicare itself was created during the Johnson administration.

The measure passed the House over the objections of 25 Republicans who voted against it and with the support of at least a handful who gritted their teeth when voting for it.

The electoral atmosphere also simply is not conducive to Republicans touting their accomplishments, said GOP pollster Bill McInturff of Public Opinion Strategies.

Furthermore, Part D does not appear poised to play a significant role in voters' decision-making this year, McInturff said. The public's reaction to the drug benefit has been "muted" and the issue has made only a "very modest" impression on voters younger than 65 years old, he said.

Democrats Discover New Political Frontier (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

LAKEWOOD, Colo., Oct. 31 — Campaigning in suburban Wheat Ridge in the rapidly fading October twilight, Ed Perlmutter, the Democratic Congressional candidate, knocked on the door of Maxine Dunham, a registered independent.

"Already voted," Mrs. Dunham quickly reassured Mr. Perlmutter, peering out to tell him he had locked up her support. "You can relax."

Mr. Perlmutter is probably unlikely to relax in the final days of his closely watched race with Rick O'Donnell, his Republican opponent, as the two kick their sophisticated get-out-the-vote machines into high gear. But Mr. Perlmutter and fellow Democrats in Colorado and neighboring states believe that unaffiliated voters like Mrs. Dunham are the key to what could be a turnaround in the party's political fortunes in the region.

Despite a Republican edge in registration, Democrats are discovering the Mountain West — and Colorado in particular — to be a new political frontier as the party benefits from a potent mix of changing demographics, anger over the war in Iraq, resentment toward conservative social initiatives and millions of dollars' worth of advocacy advertising.

Republicans acknowledge that the political terrain is shifting along the Continental Divide but argue that any realignment will be temporary and due to the Iraq war more than any other factor.

"We still have more registered Republicans by a pretty significant margin," said Representative Tom Tancredo, an advocate of tough immigration laws who is running for re-election in a nearby district, "but it certainly appears an increasing number of independents or unaffiliated voters are now breaking more for the Democrats than the Republicans."

If that trend holds, Democrats could be in for a big day next Tuesday. The Democratic candidate for governor, Bill Ritter, is leading in his race against Bob Beauprez, a Republican congressman. If Democrats can retain control of the State House and Senate, which they gained in the 2004 elections, they would have total control of the state government for the first time since the early 1960s.

"It really is incredible," said Tom Schaller, a political scientist at the University of Maryland who explores the potential for Democratic gains in the West in a new book, "Whistling Past Dixie." "They had nothing three years ago."

Mr. Perlmutter has consistently led in polls in the Seventh District race in the Denver suburbs. Should he win, it would give Democrats at least a four-to-three advantage in the state's Congressional delegation. The fact that two other House races are even remotely competitive illustrates the changed political dynamic after years of Republican dominance.

In neighboring states, Democrats are seen as having a good chance of capturing a Senate seat in Montana, are battling in what should be safe Republican House seats in Idaho and Wyoming, and have their eyes on Republican seats in Arizona and New Mexico.

The increasingly blue tinge of the formerly red region — some say it gives new meaning to the phrase "purple mountains" — has the national party seriously considering holding its 2008 presidential convention here at the foot of the Rockies.

Republicans are hardly surrendering. Mr. O'Donnell is pushing ahead and on Monday trumpeted an endorsement from Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, hoping the McCain name would resonate with independents.

Using a high-tech voter identification model, Mr. O'Donnell spent more than $30,000 to mail a letter of support from Mr. McCain along with his own 38-page platform to 20,000 independents and Democrats deemed receptive to the message.

"It was sent very strategically," said Mr. O'Donnell, who believes he can pull off a victory, although he acknowledges a tough environment for Republicans. "I picked a heck of a year to run for Congress," he said Tuesday as he led volunteers on a local cleanup campaign intended to send the message that he would also help clean up Congress.

Mr. Perlmutter has also focused on independents, trying to sway them by presenting his case that Republican control of Washington has been a failure. "I just think that over the last few days the unaffiliated voters have really been watching what is going on closely, and they are leaning to the Democratic side," Mr. Perlmutter said.

Mr. O'Donnell said he believed that Democratic electoral expectations in the West were overblown and that even if Democrats did have some success, Republicans would quickly recover.

Analysts and activists say the Democratic rise has been building quietly but steadily. Robert Duffy, a political science professor at Colorado State University, said he thought Republicans began losing the public's confidence after 2002, when the General Assembly was not seen to be responding strongly to an economic downturn but was instead caught up in political fights over redistricting and other peripheral issues.

"The state legislature and the governor seemed to be incapable of doing anything about it," Dr. Duffy said of the economic situation.

He and others said that many in the West, where Republicans exhibit a pronounced libertarian streak, had also grown weary of the social agenda that stirs Republicans in the South.

"They want someone to provide solutions to problems, and they are tired of the government getting too much in their business out there," said Nancy Keenan, a former state legislator in Montana who is now president of Naral Pro-Choice America, an abortion rights group that has been actively engaged in Western Congressional races.

In one respect, the region's conservative leaders have fallen victim to their own success. Exerting strong control over the party in many communities, conservatives have been able to deliver victories for their candidates in party primaries over more moderate Republicans.

But the conservatives then struggle in the general election, sometimes because of hard feelings over the primaries, and Democrats have been able to sneak in. Party infighting over an open Republican House seat in the district around Colorado Springs is considered a factor in giving Democrats a chance at that seat.

Members of both parties say there is another important but less well-known explanation for Democratic success in Colorado: an assertive advocacy campaign by wealthy progressives in the state who have poured millions of dollars into pro-Democratic advertising through independent 527 organizations, groups so named after the provision in the tax code that allows political spending as long as it is not formally coordinated with parties or candidates.

The 527 groups were considered instrumental in the 2004 elections, when Democrats achieved a surprising takeover of the legislature and, at the federal level, won a Senate and a House seat. They have been active again this year, particularly in an effort to unseat Representative Marilyn Musgrave, who has supported a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage.

Democrats say the 2004 gains laid the groundwork for an expansion this year because the Democratic legislature was able to work with the departing Republican governor and address pressing problems in education, health care and immigration, demonstrating to skeptics that Democrats could govern.

Both Mr. Perlmutter and Mr. O'Donnell, competing for the open seat now held by Mr. Beauprez, have said throughout the campaign that they will bring a similar sensibility to Washington, promising to inject new thinking into a Congress that has been plagued by partisanship and stalemate.

Now it is up to the voters in this evenly divided district, where the romance of the Rockies meets the pressures of 21st-century suburbia, to make a choice.

"I think people are ready," Mr. Perlmutter said. "They have seen enough ads."

How The GOP Lost The North (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Most of the House seats that the Democrats are expected to take from Republicans are in the Northeast and industrial Midwest, heartland of the old Republican Party of Lincoln, McKinley and Eisenhower. Many of the Republicans holding these seats are a distinct minority in a party now dominated by Southerners who are more supportive of executive branch authoritarianism and yet also more government-phobic. And the Republican moderates, judging by their own comments, are boiling mad that the Democrats are going after them.

"There is no one who has voted more often with the Democrats than Linc Chafee," Susan Collins, the Republican senator from Maine, told the New York Times of her Rhode Island colleague, who is trailing Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse in the polls. "Yet that didn't stop them from going after him with everything they had."

And we all remember how moderate Republicans stopped the conservatives who control their party from going after moderate Democrats in previous elections, right? How they pleaded with Tom DeLay not to push through his mid-decade reapportionment of Texas, which led to the ousting of such veteran conservative Democrats as Rep. Charles Stenholm? How they deplored the campaign that Republican Saxby Chambliss waged against Georgia Democratic Sen. Max Cleland, who'd lost both legs and an arm in Vietnam, for being soft on national security?

Indeed, it was precisely the Republicans' success at defeating the centrist and center-right Democrats in the South over the past two decades that has driven the GOP steadily rightward. And for all their protestations of moderation, the northern Republicans -- from Susan Collins to Lincoln Chafee to Rep. Chris Shays -- abetted that transformation. While some of them may have favored raising the minimum wage, all the Republican moderates in the House voted for rules that prohibited the Democrats from bringing a minimum-wage hike to the floor unless, as their Republican leaders dictated, it was linked to other provisions (such as a permanent repeal of the estate tax) that would doom it in the Senate. While they may have harbored doubts about the wisdom of the president's course in Iraq, their party conducted no oversight hearings.

Since George W. Bush's election, the rightward gallop of the Republicans has only accelerated. Karl Rove became convinced that independent voters were a myth, prompting Bush to govern as if only his most conservative supporters really mattered. Denny Hastert let no bill come to a vote in the House unless a majority of the Republican caucus backed it -- essentially giving veto power to the House right-wingers. Gerrymandering has made many Republican members more fearful of a primary challenge from the right than of a Democratic challenge in the general election.

But what next week's election seems likely to illustrate is that the laws of thermodynamics -- in particular, the one that states that for every reaction there is an equal and opposite reaction -- have not been repealed. Upstate New York, the Philadelphia suburbs, Connecticut's tweedy enclaves and the Microsoft precincts surrounding Seattle seem poised to show that they've had it with the party that restricts funding for stem cell research. In Arizona and Colorado, secular libertarians have grown estranged from the party that invested the power of the federal government in the cause of keeping Terri Schiavo in a vegetative state. In Ohio, voters look to be revolted not just by the corruption of their state and national Republican parties but also by the party's indifference to the collapse of the state's industrial economy.

Historically, the major parties in America have yoked together the most disparate groups for long periods. The New Deal Democrats were a party of Northern liberals and Southern segregationists. But once Lyndon Johnson committed the Democrats to civil rights for African Americans, the white South up and left -- a process that took 40 years to complete but that left the Democrats struggling to assemble congressional and presidential majorities and that converted the Republicans into a party where Southern values were dominant. Now the non-Southern bastions of Republicanism may themselves up and leave the GOP, seeing it as no longer theirs.

Susan Collins may protest that she has a quarrel with the Democrats, but it's her own party that provoked this transformation. And in a larger sense, her quarrel is really with history.

What If It's A Tie? (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

With polls nail-bitingly close, one possible result is that the Senate will divide 50-50 between the two parties. For a hint of how that may work, consider the only time that has happened, for six months in 2001 (before James M. Jeffords, then a Vermont Republican, became an independent to caucus with the Democrats), when the two parties worked out a collegial power-sharing agreement. Republicans maintained control of the Senate because Vice President Dick Cheney had the power to break tie votes.

But while the Democrats lost a bid to have co-chairmanships of committees, they won an equal number of committee seats and an equal share of the money to run them. Senator Tom Daschle, the Democratic leader, called it “miraculous”; Senator Trent Lott, the Republican leader, called it “a framework for bipartisanship.” But that was fresh off the 2000 elections, when everyone was pledging bipartisanship.

Could it happen again? Democrats admit they have considered the possibility, “What was done in 2001 should serve as a useful framework,” said Jim Manley, a spokesman for the Democratic leader, Senator Harry Reid. Not so fast, the Republicans say. They do not want to be seen even considering the idea of losing control, so much so that a senior Republican aide would speak only anonymously. “If the Senate were ever to return to that ratio,” the aide said, “the previous agreement is not precedent.”

GOP Grip On Senate Hinges On Tight Races (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

Republicans say the latest evidence gives them reason to think they will maintain control of the Senate, although Vice President Dick Cheney may not feel free to leave Washington often during the next two years.

"There is this for the Republicans -- at least the bleeding seems to have stopped on the Senate side, and in a few House races," said pollster John Zogby. "Republicans can still turn this around."

Race-by-race surveys of Senate contests by pollster Scott Rasmussen show that Republican-leaning voters may be "coming home" in closely watched states like Tennessee and Missouri, while the GOP is poised for a potential upset in Maryland.

To prevent Democrats from taking over the Senate, Republicans must hold their net losses to five -- which would leave the Senate split 50-50, with Mr. Cheney available to cast a tiebreaking vote -- and election analysts say four of the GOP's incumbent senators likely will fall on Nov. 7:

•Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania -- a reliable foe of abortion and same-sex "marriage" and a strong supporter of President Bush -- trails pro-life Democrat Bob Casey by 16 percentage points in the latest poll.

•Conrad Burns in Montana is trailing Democratic state Sen. Jon Tester, and has been hammered by Democratic ads highlighting the Republican's involvement in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Meanwhile, Republicans have been buoyed by a strong stretch run by Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in Maryland, where the former state Republican Party chairman seeks the seat being vacated by Democratic Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes.

Mr. Steele still trails Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin in most polls, but turned in a solid debate performance Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" and this week won the endorsement of important black Democrats in Maryland. "If he gets over 20 percent of black vote statewide, it does have a significant impact for the politics of both parties," Mr. Zogby said.

Republicans have also hoped to pick up a Democratic seat in New Jersey. However, six different major polls since Oct. 10 show Republican Tom Kean Jr. trailing Sen. Robert Menendez by as many as 6 percentage points in a state where institutional advantages favor the Democratic incumbent. "If we had a functional party in New Jersey, we might win that one," said one veteran Republican observer.

Republicans say they feel increasingly confident about holding onto the Tennessee seat being vacated by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. The most recent CNN poll showed Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker with a 52 percent to 44 percent lead over Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., although Rasmussen showed a much narrower 49 percent to 47 percent lead for Mr. Corker.

Perhaps the most encouraging recent development for Senate Republicans has been the comeback by Missouri Sen. Jim Talent, who some polls had shown trailing by as much as 9 percentage points to Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill just three weeks ago.

The most recent polls indicate the Missouri contest is a dead heat, with CNN showing both candidates at 49 percent, and Rasmussen giving Mrs. McCaskill a 48 percent to 47 percent lead.

However, Republicans have become concerned as recent polls show Sen. George Allen losing ground in Virginia. A Rasmussen poll released yesterday showed Mr. Allen with 46 percent to 51 percent for Democrat James H. Webb Jr., a former Republican who served about a year as Navy secretary in the Reagan administration.

Republicans says that their well-honed voter-turnout operation can make the difference in close races, but election analyst Charlie Cook remains skeptical about Election Day prospects for the GOP.

"In the House, Republicans are most likely to see a net loss of 20 to 35 seats, and with it their majority," Mr. Cook wrote in the latest issue of National Journal. "In the Senate, the GOP could lose at least four, but a five- or six-seat loss is more likely."

Tennessee Republican Senate nominee Bob Corker led Democrat Harold Ford by 8 percentage points in a race that could determine who controls the Senate, according to a poll released Tuesday. The survey of 541 likely voters conducted by Opinion Research for CNN showed former Chattanooga mayor Corker favored by 52%, compared with 44% for U.S. Rep. Ford. The error margin is +/-4 percentage points. Previous polls had them neck-and-neck for Sen. Bill Frist's seat.

“This is all about getting out the vote,” Corker told supporters in Knoxville. “Let's energize our base.” In the same poll, taken Thursday through Sunday, Corker led 47%-45% among 897 registered voters, with a +/-3-point margin of error. “This race is a dead heat and it's been a dead heat for a month,” Ford adviser Michael Powell said.

Bush to campaign for Talent in Missouri

President Bush will travel to Missouri on Friday to campaign for Sen. Jim Talent, the first time the two will appear together at a public campaign event in the state this year, the White House said. Details were not released. “The president wants to do everything he can to help him win re-election,” White House spokesman Alex Conant said. Talent has seldom mentioned the president in stump speeches or in his TV spots. Recent polls continue to show Talent and Democratic State Auditor Claire McCaskill running about even.

NFL player wants off mom's election team

New Orleans Saints' quarterback Drew Brees has asked his mother, Texas 3rd Court of Appeals candidate Mina Brees, to stop using his picture in her campaign TV ads. The athlete is shown in the uniform of his former team, the San Diego Chargers. In the ads, which had aired on Austin stations, she says, “I'm a football fan, and I have to be. … Drew Brees is my son. But there's one difference between him and me: I want to sit on the bench.” Drew Brees has referred to his relationship with his mother, a Democratic attorney from Austin, as “non-existent.” The NFL player said “my mother is using me in a campaign, and I've made it known many times I don't want to be involved.”

Keystone Poll Bodes Ill For GOP (PTR)

By David M. Brown And Brad Bumsted

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 1, 2006

Democrat Bob Casey has opened up a 15-point lead over Republican U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum -- more than double the lead the challenger held in September -- according to a Pittsburgh Tribune-Review/WTAE-TV Keystone poll released today.

Casey leads Santorum 53 percent to 38 percent, with 9 percent undecided, according to the telephone poll of 626 registered voters conducted over five days ending Sunday. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.9 percentage points.

A Keystone poll conducted in late September showed Casey, the state treasurer from Scranton, with a 7-point lead over Santorum, of Penn Hills, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate.

"(Santorum) is falling further behind as voters seem to be rejecting his shift in course toward focus almost exclusively on the war on terror," said Keystone Poll director G. Terry Madonna, a political science professor at Franklin & Marshall College, Lancaster County.

"It's a campaign theme that's not working well," Madonna said.

Casey's lead, combined with Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell's 25-point advantage over Republican challenger Lynn Swann, could portend disaster for Republicans on Tuesday, when voters head to the polls. Rendell, of Philadelphia, leads Swann, the former Steelers star from Sewickley Heights, by 58 percent to 33 percent, the poll shows.

Political analysts are pondering whether the margins favoring Rendell and Casey will benefit fellow Democrats in congressional and legislative races.

"It's clearly not a positive sign for Republicans in real competitive races lower on the ticket to have their headliners trailing this late in the campaign, but it's not necessarily a death knell," said Christopher Borick, political science professor at Muhlenberg College in Allentown. "Pennsylvanians have a clear record of splitting tickets."

Votes for Casey or Rendell won't automatically translate into votes for other Democrats if a Republican candidate is perceived as having done a good job, said Al Neri, editor of The Insider, a statewide political newsletter.

"It's a very informed electorate," he said.

Santorum trails Casey in nearly all regions, including by 3 points in Central Pennsylvania, where Republicans traditionally enjoy their strongest support.

Santorum leads only in Northwestern Pennsylvania, 50-41 percent, the poll shows. Casey leads by 27 points in Allegheny County and 16 points in the southwest, where U.S. Rep. Melissa Hart, R-Bradford Woods, is seeking to beat back a strong challenge from Democrat Jason Altmire in the 4th Congressional District.

Casey also leads by 33 points in Philadelphia and 27 points in the Philly suburbs, where three Republican Congressmen are fighting for their political survival.

Santorum, who is seeking a third term, has been hurt by his close ties to the Bush White House, analysts say. The president's approval ratings have dropped to an all-time low in Pennsylvania. Only 32 percent hold a favorable opinion of Bush, and only 31 percent say he is doing an excellent or good job.

Poll participant Charles K. Hillman, 68, of Monongahela, Washington County, said he will vote for Casey because he doesn't like the direction the country is going under Republican control. Hillman is upset that American soldiers are dying in Iraq in what seems to be "a civil war."

"I do not trust Santorum, and I don't like Bush at all," he said. "I'm voting for a change."

Walter J. Nichols, 42, of Commodore, Indiana County, said he will vote for Santorum because he is consistent in his views. Nichols likes Santorum's opposition to gun control and abortion.

"Santorum has a platform he sticks with. He believes in what he says, and he stands for something," Nichols said. "Bob Casey seems to be the typical politician. Whatever you want to hear, he's going to say."

Santorum spokeswoman Virginia Davis dismissed the poll's significance.

"No matter how you shake it, there's a range of numbers" in various polls, she said.

At least 55 polls have been conducted since January, all of them showing Casey with a lead of at least 5 points and as high as 23 points, according to RealClearPolitics.com.

Davis, however, said Santorum will rely on superior Republican get-out-the-vote efforts.

"The investment we've made in our grassroots doesn't have a return until election day," Davis said.

Casey spokesman Larry Smar said the latest Keystone poll reflects that "Santorum's often desperate attacks are backfiring, and people clearly want a change."

"They see Bob Casey talking about issues that concern them," such as health care and jobs, Smar said.

One in three of those polled who indicated they will vote for Casey said their primary motivation was to oust Santorum. Another third said the war in Iraq is the most important issue in determining their Senate vote. Twelve percent identified the war against terrorism as the most important issue.

Rendell spokesman Dan Fee said the numbers are consistent with other recent independent polls. The lead won't change the governor's strategy, Fee said.

"We are going to get out as many of our voters (to the polls) as we can," he said.

Swann spokesman Leonardo Alcivar disputed the poll's results.

"It's simply not a 25-point race," he said. "If it were, Rendell wouldn't continue to pour millions of dollars into negative ads."

Heckler Subdued At George Allen Event (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, November 1, 2006

A heckler who confronted Sen. George Allen at a campaign appearance Tuesday was put in a chokehold and slammed to the floor by three of the Republican's supporters in an incident captured on video.

Mike Stark, a liberal blogger and first-year University of Virginia law student, approached Allen at an event in Charlottesville, loudly asking, "Why did you spit at your first wife, George?" according to witnesses.

Three men, all wearing blue Allen lapel stickers, immediately grabbed Stark, dragged him backward and slung him to the carpet outside a hotel meeting room, according to video captured by WVIR-TV in Charlottesville.

Stark said later in a telephone interview with The Associated Press: "I am a constituent. I am allowed to ask my U.S. senator questions."

A new statewide poll conducted for CNN showed Allen's Democratic challenger, former Navy Secretary Jim Webb, with a slight lead in a bitterly contested race that could help determine whether the GOP retains control of the Senate.

In a Monday posting on "Calling All Wingnuts," the blog Stark publishes, he hinted that he would attempt to provoke Allen before the TV cameras.

"Im also trying to `Roger and Me' George Allen whenever I can," Stark wrote, referring to director Michael Moore's 1989 documentary in which he repeatedly tried to confront former General Motors' chief executive Roger Smith about the company's downsizing.

In August, Stark similarly approached Allen after a speech at a hotel near Staunton, loudly asking if he had ever used a common six-letter epithet against blacks.

That was two weeks after Allen, at a rally, referred to a Webb volunteer of Indian descent as "Macaca," which is considered by some to be a racial slur.

Democratic Activist Claims Abuse By Allen's Staffers (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

A Democratic activist who verbally confronted U.S. Sen. George Allen at a campaign rally in Charlottesville yesterday was shoved, put into a headlock and thrown against a window by three men wearing Allen stickers, according to a widely disseminated video of the incident.

W. Michael Stark, who identified himself in an e-mail after the incident as a University of Virginia law student, yelled a question at Allen (R) about whether he had ever spit on his first wife, an unsubstantiated charge that has been circulating on liberal blogs on the Internet. Allen supporters hauled him away from the senator as television cameras rolled.

"I demand that Senator Allen fire the staffers who beat up a constituent attempting to use his constitutional right to petition his government," Stark wrote in an e-mail.

Charlottesville Police Lt. Gary Pleasants said Stark reported the incident yesterday and indicated that he wanted to press assault charges against the men. Pleasants said police are investigating and trying to determine the names of the Allen staffers involved.

"We will find out who the people are, give him the information and he can go to the magistrate and try to obtain a warrant for them," Pleasants said.

On the video, Stark was heckling Allen about rumors that embarrassing material is contained in records from the senator's divorce. Those records have been sealed by a judge and are not accessible. Allen's current wife, Susan, is his second and the mother of his children.

Allen aides accused Democrats and the Webb campaign of orchestrating the event as a way of getting news organizations to write about the Internet rumor. "These are the typical Jim Webb tactics," said spokesman Dan Allen, no relation to the senator. "It was disappointing to see, and this certainly has no place in Virginia politics."

Kristian Denny Todd, a Webb spokesman, said Stark has no affiliation with the Webb campaign. "I have no idea who this guy is or what he was trying to accomplish," she said. "I saw the video, and from what I saw, he was wrestled to the ground by a bunch of Allen supporters so that is not very nice behavior."

Dan Allen said Stark pushed him as Stark tried to approach the senator and Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), who was campaigning with Allen. "He did it in a very menacing way," Dan Allen said.

Stark countered: "I never raised my hands above my waist. I was manhandled."

The event was recorded by a local television station and was broadcast widely yesterday on CNN. Within hours, the video was also uploaded to YouTube, a video-sharing Web site.

In the video, Stark can be seen being shoved back by several Allen supporters. A man puts Stark in a headlock, and Stark wiggles out and struggles. The man then wrestles Stark to the ground, knocking his head against a window.

Student Tackled At Allen Campaign Event (CDP)

By Bob Gibson

Charlottesville Daily Progress, November 1, 2006

U.S. Sen. George Allen, R-Fairfax County, spoke at a Charlottesville rally of his supporters Tuesday and then watched as it ended with a law student being wrestled to the floor by Allen supporters.

Allen was walking with Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., toward an Omni Charlottesville Hotel lobby after their upbeat campaign speeches when University of Virginia law student Mike Stark approached him and loudly asked if he had ever spat at his first wife.

Television cameras recorded the shoving and tackling that followed and quickly spread images from it around the world on CNN, other networks and Web sites as Stark, 38, was pushed to the lobby floor and escorted from the hotel by three men wearing Allen stickers.

Allen ignored the question and shrugged off the incident.

“That guy’s typical of the Webb campaign, and that’s just their negativity,” Allen said, referring to the campaign of Democratic challenger Jim Webb of Falls Church. Stark, a liberal blogger who confronted Allen two months ago at a Staunton hotel with questions about racial insensitivity, said he is not associated with any campaign.

One of the men who pushed Stark away from Allen, former Albemarle County GOP Chairman John Darden, said he was simply trying to protect Allen and Dole and stood between the law student and the senators not knowing what Stark’s intentions might be.

“It was crazy,” Darden said. “This guy kept coming toward George. I had my back to the guy, just blocking him out, and he pushed me.” Darden said he yelled at Stark, “You are getting personal,” and pushed back as Allen and aides walked away toward the back of the lobby.

Four hours later, Stark, a first-year law student and former Marine, went to Charlottesville police headquarters and tried to obtain an assault warrant. Police said they would assign an investigator to the case today, and no warrant was issued Tuesday.

Allen's former wife, Anne Waddell, later issued a statement calling Stark's question "a baseless, cheap shot." She said that she and Allen divorced more than 22 years ago and sealed the divorce records because it was a personal matter.

Allen and Dole headlined the hour-long rally attended by about 150 supporters of the junior Virginia senator and former governor seeking a second six-year term. They said Allen should win Nov. 7 based on his record in office, including his strong support for continuing tax cuts, building job growth and protecting Virginians as governor by abolishing parole for convicted felons.

Both senators said they viewed passages from Webb's six novels as "degrading of women."

In remarks to reporters, Allen said, "Those excerpts are, I think, demeaning of women and he will have to explain those passages. … The judgment will be on the part of the people of Virginia."

Allen did not say he had read any of Webb's novels but "I've read those excerpts" depicting explicit sexual behavior and incest.

At the rally, two women who said Allen had affected their lives through his leadership offered testimonials.

Rhonda Winfield of Stuarts Draft, who lost her son 22 months ago in the war in Iraq, called Allen "a tremendous leader for this country" and explained how the senator had written her and shed tears with her over her son's death.

Winfield said she gave Allen his dog tags, which the senator placed on his dresser mirror and told her "that he would never, ever support our withdrawing in defeat" from Iraq. Winfield's son, Marine Lance Cpl. Jason Redifer, died at 19.

Teresa Sayers of Galax, who had been stabbed eight times by her former husband, credited Allen for abolishing parole so her assailant would spend 85 percent of his 36-year prison sentence behind bars instead of just 20 percent.

Allen also helped her by protecting her job through a crime-victim protection act during "a devastating time in my life," Sayers said.

Dole, who chairs the re-election committee of Senate Republicans, said an Allen victory "could be important in the United States Senate in terms of our maintaining our majority." Allowing Democrats to control the Senate would be giving control to a "Trojan horse" full of senators with a stealthy agenda of raising taxes.

Marriage Measure May Turn On Allen (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

A state constitutional marriage amendment designed to motivate conservative voters and help Virginia Sen. George Allen's re-election campaign appears to be backfiring, at least among black voters.

The Republican senator probably will benefit from evangelical Christians voting for the amendment. But, the amendment also will drive turnout among the state's black voters, many of whom are questioning whether Mr. Allen is racially insensitive and deserves a second term.

Virginia's black voters support the amendment, which defines marriage as the union of one man and one woman, by more than 60 percent, according to most polls. They also overwhelmingly favor Mr. Allen's Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr.

The black vote is even more crucial this year than most, as Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb are nearly tied in statewide polls leading up to Tuesday's election.

"My people don't see it as a Democratic issue or a Republican issue. They see it as a societal issue," said the Rev. Milton R. Blount, pastor of the predominantly black New Mount Olivet Baptist Church in Portsmouth, Va.

Mr. Blount said his congregants are overwhelmingly in favor of defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman, but they also are traditionally Democratic voters.

Marriage amendments on state ballots in 2004 helped drive turnout among Republican voters and secured President Bush's re-election.

Virginia's majority Republican legislators kept that in mind over the past two years as they crafted the amendment and ensured its placement on the 2006 ballot.

DOJ_NMG_0089456

Most Republicans would only smile when asked whether the amendment's timing was a gift to Mr. Allen, a former Virginia delegate and governor. Privately, they acknowledged they wanted to help Mr. Allen, thinking a large re-election margin would help position him for a 2008 presidential run.

Now, after Mr. Allen has been accused of making racial slurs when he was younger and his highly publicized "macaca" moment, a high turnout of black voters for the amendment might cost Mr. Allen a few crucial percentage points in the neck-and-neck race.

Political observers also think the evangelical vote could be depressed next week because of the congressional page scandal in Washington.

Mr. Allen and most Republican voters favor the marriage amendment as necessary to protect against what they call "activist judges." Mr. Webb opposes the amendment, saying it is unnecessary and would restrict the rights of unmarried heterosexual couples.

The Rev. Charles H. Miller Jr., a pastor from the predominantly black First Church of Jesus Apostolic in Altavista in Southside Virginia, said black voters will side with the amendment because "that is what the word of God teaches."

He recently told his local newspaper that he supports the amendment not "referencing any political party but rather a statement respecting Christian principles."

"I just believe that marriage is man and woman. No gray areas in between," agreed the Rev. Samuel Griffith, a pastor at Union Street Missionary Baptist Church in Danville, Va.

Twenty percent of Virginia's population is black, according to the 2004 census. Mr. Allen won 20 percent of the black vote when elected governor in 1993, and 17 percent in his 2000 Senate election.

A recent poll conducted by The Washington Post showed that Mr. Webb is supported by blacks 81 percent to 11 percent. That same group supported the amendment 61 percent to 34 percent in the poll.

Opponents of the amendment are well-funded and organized, with a large grass-roots operation to turn out voters in Northern Virginia.

Opponents say the measure is unnecessary because same-sex couples already are forbidden from exchanging vows in Virginia. They also say the amendment's language would affect opposite-sex unmarried couples.

That argument has helped shrink support for the amendment, but it is still expected to pass.

The Rev. Benjamin W. Robertson, pastor of Cedar Street Baptist Church of God in Richmond, believes in traditional marriage but plans to vote against the amendment.

"I am the longest-serving pastor in Virginia, and no one has ever asked me to perform a same-sex marriage," he said, adding he fears the amendment would affect heterosexual couples.

Mr. Robertson would not say which candidate he favors. The pastor said many black voters don't like Mr. Allen because he has not voted to increase the minimum wage and he once voted against making Martin Luther King's birthday a state holiday.

He said Mr. Webb is still an unknown to voters.

Others agreed, citing Mr. Webb's past suggestion that affirmative action was unfair to poor whites. He has since tempered those comments.

"I'm not comfortable with either one," said Mr. Blount, who is undecided.

Mr. Webb, who also has the backing of the state's Legislative Black Caucus, was endorsed last week by Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, who became the nation's first elected black governor in 1990.

Mr. Allen has been endorsed by state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a black Richmond Democrat. Both Mr. Wilder and Mr. Lambert oppose the marriage amendment, as do members of the legislative black caucus.

Outcome May Rest On Black Turnout (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Erving Sabb, a black Alexandria barber, sat in his chair at the Hair Clinic and considered what he knew and didn't know about the two men running for the U.S. Senate in Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0089457

"Well, not voting for the Republican, Allen. Never could support him," he said, referring to Sen. George Allen.

"But this Webb fella . . . he used to work for Reagan, didn't he? He was a Republican, too?" Sabb, 61, asked, shaking his head thinking about Allen's Democratic challenger, James Webb. "I vote for Democrats, but I'll only vote for a guy I know is a real Democrat. I want to know if he's really one of us."

Whether Webb, a former Republican and Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, will be able to energize loyal Democratic voters such as Sabb will be critical in determining who wins one of the tightest Senate races in the country.

African Americans, who make up about 20 percent of Virginia's electorate, vote reliably for Democrats and are key to their success in the Republican-dominated state. But Webb has struggled to gain their support because of questions about whether he used a racial epithet to describe blacks when he was younger and because of his stance on affirmative action, which he once called "state-sponsored racism."

Allen has had his own problems with black voters, dating to his days as a state delegate. Blacks have long been turned off by Allen's affinity for the Confederate flag and his 1984 vote against a state holiday commemorating the birthday of Martin Luther King Jr., among other things. Last month, a handful of Allen's former teammates accused him of repeatedly using a racial epithet for blacks when he played football at the University of Virginia, a charge Allen denied.

Allen has tried to mend fences with the state's black community, highlighting his support of black colleges and appearing at several important political events.

Nonetheless, a Washington Post poll conducted last month showed that blacks were overwhelmingly supporting Webb: 81 percent of African Americans said they would vote for the Democrat, compared with 11 percent who said they'd vote for Allen.

But the determining factor, political experts said, will be how many of those voters go to the polls on Election Day, given concerns about both candidates.

"If I was running this race for Webb, the path I would seek for victory is running really well in Northern Virginia and getting a big black turnout in the Tidewater area and the Richmond area," said David Bositis, an expert on black voting patterns at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington. "How many black voters are going to show up . . . that's going to be key."

Successful Virginia Democrats have been helped by high turnout among blacks. In 1989, when L. Douglas Wilder became the first black candidate to be elected governor in the nation's history, African Americans made up 17 percent of voters, according to an analysis by the Weldon Cooper Center for Public Service at the University of Virginia.

In 2001, when Mark R. Warner took the governor's mansion, blacks constituted 15 percent of voters. Both Wilder and Warner won more than 90 percent of their vote.

In between those elections, Republicans Allen and James S. Gilmore III won gubernatorial races in elections when black turnout was less than 14 percent, according to the center's analysis.

Webb probably needs a better turnout than his Democratic predecessors. Many black leaders were initially critical of the former Marine for his position on affirmative action, which has been endorsed by the Democratic party establishment for decades. Webb said he supports affirmative action for blacks but not for other minorities. Otherwise, he thinks preferential job and education programs should be awarded based on economic conditions or not at all.

Webb lost nearly all of the state's majority black communities to Harris N. Miller during the Democratic primary. And although the state's Legislative Black Caucus endorsed Webb in his race against Allen, they did so by a 9 to 8 vote, according to two people who were familiar with the decision.

Webb's effort to woo conservative GOP-leaning voters and independents back into the Democratic column has also clashed with the sensibilities of many black Democrats. His first television commercial, for instance, sought to connect the candidate with Reagan, an unpopular figure among blacks.

After appearing before an audience of black voters in Alexandria last week, Webb acknowledged that he started with an uphill battle reaching out to African Americans.

"The number one thing that I saw is that I worked for Reagan. . . . It was especially hard for the African American leadership," he said, adding that he still believed Reagan was a "very fine" president. "But I've explained my journey on that . . . and it's been a process of us getting to know one another."

In recent weeks, Webb has tried to boost his presence in black communities. Late last month, he visited a dozen black churches in Hampton Roads. In addition, he picked up support from several black newspapers and received the endorsement of Wilder, now the mayor of Richmond. Wilder plans to campaign with Webb today in Richmond, and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) will join him on the stump there tomorrow.

Some activists said that Webb's opposition to the Iraq war will help with black voters, overriding other potential concerns. Recent polls have found that blacks are more likely than whites to say that the Iraq war was a mistake.

"I think there's going to be a lot of support for him," said Robert James, a black Democratic activist from Arlington County. "He opposed the war early, and in regards to affirmative action, we're beginning to like what we see."

That view was borne out by those who attended the Alexandria event, where Webb received enthusiastic applause when he talked about raising the minimum wage and his concern about a growing economic divide in America.

"Now that I'm beginning to hear more of his message, I'm beginning to feel more comfortable," said Thad Denney, 52, an insurance agent from Fairfax, who was at the event. "I'll admit it, I only knew him from his days as Navy secretary and didn't know where he stood. I wasn't sure if I was going to vote for him . . . but I'm thinking about it now."

Allen also has tried to mend fences with the black community, appearing at an NAACP dinner earlier this month and signing a lifetime membership to the organization. At the dinner, Allen said that he was not perfect and looked forward "to joining hands" with black voters.

Supporters say that Allen has pushed education programs, including Virginia's Standards of Learning and the federal No Child Left Behind law, that are especially beneficial to blacks.

He also picked up an important endorsement from state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III (D-Richmond), a leading black lawmaker, who said in an interview that Allen has "appeared to be trying hard" to reach out to black voters and will help secure federal money for Virginia's historically black colleges.

Still, there is long-standing anger toward Allen and skepticism about his support for black colleges.

In an interview, Harrison B. Wilson, president of Norfolk State University from 1975 to 1997, said that when Allen was governor he never visited the school, turning down three invitations to speak at its commencement ceremony. "Every other governor came and had lunch with me and visited campus and spoke at commencement while they were in office," said Wilson, who recently aired his feelings about Allen with his church congregation.

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign director, said black church leaders and William Harvey, president of Hampton University, continue to support his candidate.

Lambert said he wasn't concerned.

"I kind of like to judge people on what they do now," Lambert said. "I think George has changed an awful lot. I didn't like some of the things he did as governor as well, but at the same I time I think our relationship has improved tremendously. He is very apologetic for things that happened earlier in his life."

A Star Of Red-state Virginia Has A Fight On His Hands (CSM)

By John Dillin

The Christian Science Monitor, November 1, 2006

FALLS CHURCH, VA.

A few months ago, when the warm breezes of summer were wafting across Virginia's Blue Ridge Mountains, George Allen could justly expect only one result from Election 2006 - he would be reelected easily to the US Senate.

Senator Allen's supporters were already quietly looking beyond November. There were whispers in Republican circles about Allen running for the White House in 2008.

Yet as autumn drew near, there was an abrupt change in the political climate. The winds from the Blue Ridge grew cold. Very cold.

Jim Webb, a decorated, twice-wounded combat marine with family roots in the hamlets and hollows of Virginia's mountains, suddenly threatened Allen's comfortable lead.

Starting in February with no money and few supporters, Mr. Webb had built strength. In June, he won the Democratic Senate primary against an opponent who outspent him 3-to-1. As summer turned to fall, Webb picked up momentum. Allen was now fighting for his survival.

Political polls have seesawed. The latest Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times survey found Webb slightly ahead, 47 percent to 44 percent.

This remains Allen's race to lose, however. Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, explains that in federal elections in Virginia, "Republicans almost always win the close races."

Republicans hope so. Otherwise, this election could become part of a major shift in Washington. A Democratic victory here, combined with other states where Republicans are in deep trouble, could tip the balance in the Senate to the Democrats, and give President Bush a rough finish to his second term.

GOP notables, including the president, have rushed to Virginia to help the senator's embattled cause. Mr. Bush raised $500,000 for Allen in a single day Oct. 19.

Democratic worthies, including former President Bill Clinton, smell an upset. Mr. Clinton, on the same day Bush was here, raised a similar $500,000 for the Webb campaign.

It's that close.

So why is Allen - one of only six men in Virginia history to be elected both governor and US senator - in such trouble? After all, he's well known and widely liked across the state. Though a native Californian, he has close ties here. He graduated with history and law degrees from the University of Virginia, and was a quarterback on Virginia's football team.

True to his college, founded by Thomas Jefferson, Allen preaches his adherence to "Jeffersonian principles," one of which is the centrality of the family to America's social and political order, notes Peter Onuf, Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation professor at the university.

To understand Allen's problems, however, one needs to look no further than the war in Iraq, as well as to an obscure word with Portuguese origins - "macaca."

First, Iraq. The war might not be such a problem for Allen, except for Webb. Allen has backed the president in the war from the outset. And Webb has opposed it. As security problems grow worse in Iraq, it is "advantage Webb."

What makes Webb so effective on Iraq in a conservative, pro-defense state like Virginia is his extensive military record along with a gravitas that drives home both the human and economic costs of the conflict.

A 1968 graduate of the United States Naval Academy, Webb later served as a Marine Corps company commander in the Vietnam War. He came away with the Navy Cross, Silver Star, two Bronze Stars, and two Purple Hearts. He knows first- hand the bitter price of war in blood, treasure, and heartbreak.

Some Democratic consultants privately lament that Webb is not what one of them calls "a natural politician" - something Webb readily concedes. On the campaign trail, Webb is a stern, straight-backed man of about 6 feet who seldom smiles and carries himself more like a drill sergeant than a glad-handing politician.

Webb comes from a military background that he traces back to the Scots-Irish who fought, and often defeated, the armies of English kings. He is clearly proud of his ethnic heritage, which he explored in his 2004 book, "Born Fighting: How the Scots-Irish Shaped America."

Since leaving the military because of his war wounds, Webb has become a millionaire writer of six novels, as well as his non-fiction volume on the Scots-Irish. But he is never far mentally from his warrior days.

The Webb family's commitment to the military continues with his son, James Robert Webb, now in Iraq with the Marines. The candidate brushes aside questions about his son's tour, but wears a pair of marine boots on the campaign trail.

Since leaving the military, Webb has been a party switcher. Originally a Democrat, he quit after President Jimmy Carter, also a Democrat, pardoned draft dodgers after the Vietnam War.

When Ronald Reagan became president, Webb joined his Republican administration, first as an assistant secretary of defense, then as secretary of the Navy. But his party hopping continued.

Webb told reporters recently in Arlington that before the Iraq war began, he warned that it could become a quagmire. When Bush ignored such advice and plunged into Iraq, Webb dumped the GOP and returned to the Democrats.

Webb was only marginally responsible for another of Allen's problems. It was a split-second mistake by the senator, captured on video. While at a public meeting, Allen spotted a young Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent who had been recording Allen's speeches at various locations. The senator knew the man worked for Webb, and speaking to him, referred to him as "macaca," and welcomed him "to America."

Allen claims he just made up the word "macaca." But it turns out that in some countries, the term is considered an insult and refers to a genus of European monkey - although it doesn't appear in most dictionaries. (This reporter finally found it in a 12-1/2-pound, unabridged Webster's.) Allen apologized for any offense, but critics charged him with uttering a racial slur. Damage control pulled Allen away from the message of his campaign for days.

Webb has interpersonal problems of his own, however. Most of those problems are with women, some of whom have criticized his writing about women in the military.

A prime target has been a 1979 article, "Women Can't Fight," in the Washingtonian magazine. There are claims that the article prompted extreme hostility toward female cadets at the Naval Academy.

Webb has apologized, but some former cadets still fume about it.

The candidate recently called together reporters and several retired women military officers to counter the criticism. Nine former women officers endorsed Webb, though like the senior officers they once were, some of them gently dressed down the former marine, who appeared to wince at least once.

Retired Army Col. Barbara Lee reread his articles before joining "Veterans for Webb." She called the article "extremely troubling." But after talking with Webb, she told reporters that he was "a young man then," but is now "a seasoned leader" who has "moved along in his thinking."

As is fitting for a Senate race in Virginia - the home of George Washington, James Monroe, and James Madison - both Senate candidates look into history for inspiration and guidance. Both share a favorite president, Ronald Reagan. Allen is a Reagan Republican, Webb a Reagan Democrat.

And each has a favorite president from America's first century. For Allen, it is Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence. For Webb, it is Andrew Jackson. Webb notes that "Old Hickory," as he was known, was the first populist president, and fought for the little man - something Webb wants to do in the Senate. And besides, Jackson was Scots-Irish.

The Two-Minute Drill (WP)

By Michael Leahy

He would have been forgiven for looking stressed. His fat summer lead of 16 percentage points had disappeared. But George Allen seemed just fine early Saturday morning. If tense campaigns demand that imperiled candidates, like card players, learn the art of the bluff, Allen has mastered the technique.

For the first of seven frenetic campaign events on this day, he had come to Winchester, which is solid Allen turf, a good hour away from his electoral troubles in increasingly Democratic Northern Virginia. About 200 people had come to a small hotel to wear Allen stickers, eat breakfast and wait for his exhortation. The chairman of Virginia's Republican Party, Kate Obenshain Griffin, launched into her introduction by promising the crowd that "if you've never heard George Allen speak, you'll leave here with a passion you've never had before."

Standing off to the side, Allen softly groaned at the effusive praise, as if a tad embarrassed. "Gosh, geez, ahhhhhh," he muttered, his voice all but inaudible. He towered over several seated breakfasters who, never having met him before, shyly, furtively glanced his way. A few Allen aides in the room occasionally rubbed their eyes, stifled yawns. It had been a long week, and Saturday would be even more grueling, with two long rides of more than an hour awaiting them. Presidents have travel perks: Air Force One, helicopters, bulletproof limos that ride along cleared-out interstates. George Allen, like any other senator in a reelection campaign, cruises like a road-weary salesman.

There is nothing more instructive about the unglamorous nature of the midterm election process than to ride for a day in chase of the candidate's vehicle, which on this day would be racing south through Virginia, trying to put some space between the candidate and an increasingly formidable foe.

His name called by Griffin, Allen strode to the front of the room, beaming. "Ladies and gentlemen . . . patriots all," he boomed. "Good mornin'. Are you ready to win?"

"Yesssss!" the crowd howled back. Allen grinned. His ability to stir his political base has inspired comparisons to Ronald Reagan, part of the reason why he was long regarded by many as the chief rival to John McCain for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. But ever since a series of missteps that led some to see him as racially or ethnically insensitive, Allen's poll numbers have been sliding.

If Allen's Democratic rival, James Webb, has been the beneficiary, analysts generally agree that this has less to do with his strengths than with Republicans' woes generally and Allen's in particular. In a recent poll of Republican and Democratic insiders conducted by the National Journal, the sampled political pros said Allen had run the worst of all Senate campaigns in the country.

But on this Saturday, the incumbent sounded like a man 20 points up. He talked happily about how his trademark cowboy boots were ready for the race's final sprint. "I only expected a third of this crowd to be out here on a rainy day," he said, rocketing through his stump speech.

In conclusion, the former college quarterback and son of the famous Washington Redskins coach exhorted his troops: "This is the final two-drill . . . Let's get out to victory . . . The boots are ready!"

Out in the audience, Kenny Noe stood and applauded. A political independent, he has been a longtime supporter of Allen. He is a computer technician from nearby Stephens City and, at 40, savvy about the way the world works. He knows politics is a rough game, but even so he has been disappointed by the tenor of campaigns from both parties this year.

"If I had the opportunity, I'd tell Senator Allen that the campaign and the negative campaign ads are turning me off to the whole process," Noe said. "But a [campaign event] is not the place where you can comfortably talk to someone about something like that."

True. An American political rally has its own rituals. Sunny dispositions are mandatory. Discussion of a candidate's problems is verboten. So Kenny Noe and his wife, Traci, lined up to have their picture taken -- on Traci's cellphone -- with Allen, who was doing what nearly all candidates do in these situations: making happy small talk. Riffing about a good hamburger. The Virginia Tech football game the other night. Allen smiled and positioned himself for the photo. He smoothed his blue blazer and adjusted his red tie. "Let's get your bride in close," Allen said to Kenny. The line moved on. Another supporter shyly approached. Allen shook his hand and smiled at the woman alongside him. "Is this your bride?" he asked brightly.Unscripted Moments

Allen's second stop of the day was to a volunteer fire and rescue unit just outside Berryville. After that he hurried into his campaign's red Ford Explorer and was driven back to Winchester, so that he could stand at the entrance to the Handley High School football stadium, the site of an afternoon game.

He shed his blazer and necktie. He gripped a football, in case incoming spectators wanted him to throw passes their way. Not many people stopped. It was a reminder of just how seldom prominent officeholders intrigue the public. In most cases, Simon Cowell would do better.

A stocky man walked by, trailed by a little boy carrying a miniature ball with a Redskins logo on it.

"That's a good Redskins football," Allen said to the kid.

"I don't like the Redskins," said the boy. That was the problem with a public event like a football game -- a non-campaign event. Nothing was controlled. Supporters did not necessarily predominate. There might be a weird moment. On the other hand, a candidate had a chance to win over undecideds.

Here came another kid, this one lithe and big. "Hey, young man, let me throw you a pass," Allen said.

The kid looked at his father, who nodded.

"Go long, go deep," Allen said.

The kid ran about 15 yards and turned. Allen threw a decent spiral and the boy caught it. His father shook Allen's hand. "I'd appreciate your vote," the candidate said to Thomas Grant Jr., who smiled and wished Allen luck, saying to others, as he walked away, that while he hadn't decided, he thought he might vote for Allen, having enjoyed meeting him.

Buoyed, Allen stuck out his hand toward a thin, mustachioed man with a jaunty black leather cap. "I'm George Allen," he said. "Nice to meet you. Would appreciate your vote."

The man warmly shook Allen's hand and smiled. "Very nice to meet you, too," he said.

Allen began giving him his pitch. "I want you to keep more of your money in your wallet," he said. "And I'd be grateful if you took a look at my stance on illegal immigration. Another really big issue is -- " The smiling man interrupted Allen, amiably. "Can I ask you something? I'm just curious. When will we ever get back to discussing issues? I'm not concerned about the history of a man way back before. And I know it's not just you doing it. It's just that I'd just like to hear more about what all of you are going to do with all the problems, Iraq and everything else. I'm just asking."

Allen nodded. "Yes, and that's right. And I talk about those very important things every day. I really do hope you'll take a look at my positions on taxes and illegal immigration because -- "

"But there is a lot more of the other thing on television -- about the opponents, I mean," said the man, whose name was Larry Banks and who works as a pharmacy technician in Winchester. Banks, 59, had not made up his mind about Allen and Webb, genuinely on the fence about the race, he said, and just as genuinely engaged in their campaigns. "I'd like to hear more about the issues when I turn on the television and it's you on. And, like I said, don't misunderstand, it's not just you, but . . . I guess I'm tired of hearing the slurs from everybody."

Allen nodded. "Well, please take a look at my stance on all those things. And I'd appreciate your vote."

Up at the entrance, Allen's aides were telling him it was time to go; they were already running behind schedule. "Let's go, let's go," Allen responded and, grabbing the football, threw a pass to an aide headed for the red Explorer. "Touchdown."Pedal to the Metal

One of the worst-kept secrets of campaign managers is that they overschedule candidates, are chronically late for everything and try to compensate by having aides drive at some suborbital speed to get to the next event.

Allen headed toward a barbecue at a supporter's house in the town of Sperryville, which was about 58 miles away from Handley High School. Mapquest said it would take an hour and 29 minutes to get there, but Mapquest doesn't count on people driving at 80 to 85 mph.

Allen slept some of the way. The Explorer rocketed south along Route 522, over roadkill in its many forms, around a piece of sheet metal at one point, and once swerving slightly to get out of the way of an erratic driver. Much of the way the SUV was being buffeted by stiff gusts of 30 to 40 mph.

When the Explorer reached the house, Allen ran out and immediately started shaking hands. A bluegrass band was playing on a deck. Supporters wore name tags and Allen stickers. A woman named Connie Hair ran up to Allen to say she had already voted absentee for him. Allen thanked her, hugged his hosts, posed for a few pictures and headed back toward the Explorer, gone. He had been there for 12 minutes.Fact and Fiction

He was off on another long drive south again, this time to Glen Allen, to pick up an endorsement from the National Rifle Association, whose officials waited for him in the parking lot of Green Top Sporting Goods, where a sign carried a huge word in big block letters: GUNS.

Allen was a half-hour late, stepping out of the vehicle even as it was coasting to a stop. He ran toward a podium. About 100 supporters clapped loudly. Cars slowed on the main drag of U.S. 1, right out in front of the store, with motorists craning their necks to see what the fuss was all about. There came the sound of a crash, somebody getting rear-ended. Eventually the candidate took questions, virtually all of which dealt with Allen's charge that novels written by Jim Webb had demeaned women.

When asked whether novelists who had ever written a sex scene, from John Steinbeck to John Updike, were unworthy of pursuing political office, Allen joked, "Are they on the ballot?"

This got a good laugh from his supporters -- proof of the wisdom of staging news conferences while surrounded by boosters. "My opponent runs ads and talks about himself being a writer," he said. "This is part of his record. . . . He can explain those [book] passages. Not just me but others find those passages to be demeaning to women. He can explain those passages."

If Webb's books were grist for fair debate, a reporter asked, should the book by Allen's sister Jennifer be scrutinized, particularly passages that claimed he had bullied her, dragging her by the hair and once dangling her over Niagara Falls?

The boosters fell quiet. Allen stayed composed. "That book is a novel and fiction," he said, "and I love my sister, and she had me escort her down the aisle when she got married. . . . She said it was a novelization of certain events, a lot of it from her perspective [as] . . . a young girl from her view of growing up in a fairly rough and rowdy family, but a lot of those are exaggerations."

He said he wanted to touch on a couple of other "big issues," noting his support of the Virginia Marriage Protection Amendment.

"Amen," a supporter called out.

But Allen got back on point: "My record is an open book, and he can explain passages that he wrote in his books, because he's proud of being an author."

Is this about character? a reporter pressed.

"He needs to explain his passages," Allen said resolutely.

"Thank you," an aide interrupted, ending things.Focused on the Game

Allen made an appearance at a Ducks Unlimited dinner, and then his day ended in Richmond, at the season's opening home game of the Renegades, a minor-league hockey team. The team's president, Allan B. Harvie Jr., had invited him to drop the ceremonial first puck on this evening and, afterward he stayed to watch the game.

At the end of the first period, he was playing with a souvenir hockey stick under the stands, near the locker room, when a reporter who had grilled him at the NRA event appeared.

Allen slipped the stick around the reporter's left ankle and pretended to jerk. "Tripping," he said, but he was smiling, in good humor. His wife, Susan, had come to the game, and so had one of his best friends, and Allen was looking serene, playing a little game, shooting a puck down a hallway and jogging after it, then tapping it further down the hallway, like a kid dribbling a basketball. No one interfered with his game.

"Let George shoot," his wife said.

"I used to play on a pond when I was a boy," Allen recalled, "second to eighth grade, when we were living out near Chicago, when my father was coaching there."

Someone wanted to ask him a last question about Webb, but he was too engrossed in that puck, asking that a friend open a door so that he could attempt to shoot the puck through it. He drew back for a wrist shot -- and the puck flew through the opening, Allen exultant, his wife saying, "You keep on winning."

"Thanks, coach," he said to her.

An aide whispered in his ear, wanting something. "Not now -- can talk about that later," he said softly, and then the aide repeated the question.

"Not now," Allen said.

People began shuffling into the red Explorer. "It's starting all over again tomorrow anyway," Allen said, climbing into the Explorer, at rest.

Sex And The Sinking Candidate (WP)

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

SEN. GEORGE ALLEN implored Virginians four weeks ago to focus less on personal attacks and more on "the issues" in his race for reelection. Now he has seized on an unlikely one: sex scenes in novels written by his Democratic opponent, James Webb. Now there's a pressing concern for Americans in 2006.

Mr. Allen, a Republican whose campaign professes profound moral shock that actual sex should occur in fiction, has spent months trying to extract himself from his own "macaca"-inspired tailspin. When all else failed -- including an Allen ad in which a woman accused Mr. Webb of misquoting her, although he never quoted her at all -- Mr. Allen apparently decided that what he needed was a sex scandal crafted to smear his rival and timed for the campaign's fourth quarter. Lacking such material in real life, he turned to Mr. Webb's novels, most of which concern the wartime experiences of soldiers and international intrigue. There he found -- horrors! -- sex. And what better place to spread the word than the Web site of Matt Drudge, the online gossip-monger. That ensured the story would be echoed by radio talk show hosts in high dudgeon.

Mr. Allen has spent months disparaging Mr. Webb as a writer of fiction, as if a novelist's experience is any more divorced from everyday reality than the life of a U.S. senator. His campaign suggests that because some female characters in Mr. Webb's books are portrayed as sleazy or servile Mr. Webb must himself see women in that light. Please. Maybe Mr. Allen also believes that J.K. Rowling, author of the Harry Potter series, takes too soft a line on wizards.

As it happens, Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary, assistant secretary of defense and Marine company commander in Vietnam, is an acclaimed novelist whose books are widely read. Mr. Allen wouldn't say whether he'd read any of Mr. Webb's novels himself -- only that "I've been reading initiatives and ideas and I'm trying to motivate people and inspire people."

Mr. Allen certainly is an inspiration -- to anyone who believes that political campaigns may be won by diversions and dirty tactics, even as the candidate calls high-mindedly for a discussion of "the issues." Win or lose, he'll be remembered for his performance during this race, and not fondly.

Allen's Fumbles, Romney's Gain (WP)

By George F. Will

Even before the votes are counted, over the Republican Party a "thick darkness broodeth" -- words from a Victorian hymn, for a party with a Victorian tendency. But one Republican, who is not running for anything this year, will emerge from this bruising season with enlarged prospects. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's hopes for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination have been enhanced by Virginia Sen. George Allen's difficulties.

Romney's most formidable rival for the Republican nomination is John McCain, who needs a crowded field of Republican aspirants to prevent the conservative majority of the party's nominating electorate from quickly coalescing around a single candidate. Allen once seemed likely to compete with Romney for conservatives' support.

But Allen, who makes no secret of finding life as a senator tedious, is fighting ferociously for another term, a fate from which his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, is close to rescuing him. As a result, Allen is dabbling in literary criticism. He has read, or someone has read for him, at least some of Webb's six fine novels, finding therein sexual passages that have caused Allen -- he of the football metaphors, cowboy regalia and Copenhagen smokeless tobacco -- to blush like a fictional Victorian maiden and fulminate like an actual Victorian man, Anthony Comstock, the 19th-century scourge of sin who successfully agitated for New York and federal anti-obscenity statutes and is credited with the destruction of 160 tons of naughty printed matter and pictures.

Webb, a highly decorated Marine veteran of Vietnam combat, includes sexual scenes in his fictional depictions of young men far from home and close to combat, something about which he knows a lot and Allen does not. Allen says the scenes are demeaning to women and are evidence of flaws in Webb's character.

This ham-handed grab for women's votes may help Allen win but will not help him escape the perception that, as a presidential aspirant, he is problematic. His ragged campaign has made him seem accident-prone, and by Tuesday he probably will have burned through all the money he could raise. But to be competitive in the nomination contests that begin with the Iowa caucuses in January 2008, a candidate probably needs to have at least $60 million by December 2007. Allen would have to raise that amount in 60 weeks. A million dollars a week is a daunting challenge.

Allen's radically reduced prospects will make it less likely that McCain can duplicate his 2000 triumph in New Hampshire's primary. As one seasoned New Hampshire Republican says, "It is difficult to capture lightning in a bottle twice." It will be particularly difficult for McCain to do so because there is apt to be a spirited New Hampshire contest on the Democratic side. This would draw independent voters who were crucial to McCain in 2000, when he thrashed George W. Bush, receiving 115,606 votes (48.53 percent) to Bush's 72,330 (30.36).

But Bush won the Republican part of the Republican primary, in this sense: New Hampshire independents can vote in either party's primary, and 34 percent of McCain voters identified themselves as independents. A 41 percent plurality of the Republicans voting favored Bush, 38 percent favored McCain.

If one disregards President Harry Truman's brief interest in seeking a second full term in 1952 -- he renounced running on March 29 -- and the ineffectual attempt by his vice president, Alben Barkley, to secure the nomination, 2008 will be the first election in 56 years with neither an incumbent president nor vice president seeking a nomination. If you count the Truman and Barkley episodes, 2008 will be the first such election since 1928.

So the presidential field is uncommonly open, and there is a palpable desire in the country to shuffle the political deck. In their new book "The Way to Win: Taking the White House in 2008," Mark Halperin of ABC News and John F. Harris of The Post suggest why:

"When the current President Bush completes his full second term, it will be the first time since James Madison and James Monroe almost two hundred years ago that back-to-back presidents both served all eight years of two elected terms. Put another way, two of the most divisive figures in this country's history will have commanded the White House for sixteen consecutive years."

Such circumstances should entice many aspirants into the race. Yet with Allen much diminished and perhaps out of contention, and with Rudy Giuliani not yet doing serious groundwork for a national campaign, the Republican field is already down to two. That is good for only one of them: Romney.

Cardin, Steele Put Focus On PG (WT)

By S.A. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The battle for Prince George's County voters is intensifying in the final days of Maryland's U.S. Senate race.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee, will team up a second time with Sen. Barack Obama, the Senate's only black member, to woo voters in the mostly black and heavily Democratic county.

Mr. Cardin, 63, also is lining up last-minute endorsements in the county, including from Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson, a black Democrat who could announce his support for Mr. Cardin as early as today, county officials said.

Prominent black Democrats in the county broke party ranks this week to support Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee and the first black elected statewide in Maryland. The Democratic crossovers have accused party officials of repeatedly snubbing the black community and their county.

Mr. Steele, who lives in Prince George's, will be campaigning alongside his crossover supporters, which include all five black members of the County Council and former county Executive Wayne K. Curry.

The election could hinge on how Prince George's 320,000 registered Democrats vote Tuesday.

The county, which is more than 65 percent black, accounts for a large part the Democratic Party's overwhelming advantage in voter registration.

Maryland has about 900,000 registered Republicans and 1.7 million registered Democrats, of which an estimated 700,000 are black.

Polls show the race in a dead heat.

"Cardin's office called yesterday, and they're having Obama, and I'd like to go," said Mount Rainier Mayor Malinda Miles, whose endorsement could sway some of her 600 constituents. "And Steele also is calling and saying, 'I need you.' I'm torn in between.

"If Wayne Curry and the majority of the council endorsed him ... I think it's going to be a major impact," she said.

Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, refrained from criticizing Mr. Steele when campaigning for Mr. Cardin after his narrow primary victory over Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional representative, and Rep. Elijah E. Cummings of Maryland have said they will not attack Mr. Steele, even as they campaign for his Democratic rival.

"I think that is a tactical decision," Mrs. Norton said last week.

DOJ_NMG_0089466

Though Mr. Cardin won the statewide primary, Mr. Mfume trounced him in Prince George's, winning 74,637 votes to Mr. Cardin's 19,824.

Mr. Cardin, a white 10-term congressman from Baltimore, has struggled to shore up black support.

Mr. Curry and other black Democrats throwing their support to Mr. Steele this week reiterated accusations that party leaders blocked Mr. Mfume's run and criticism that the ticket lacks black candidates.

Both senatorial campaigns made stops yesterday in Prince George's.

Mr. Steele, 48, greeted residents at a senior-citizen center in Brentwood. Mr. Cardin stumped for universal health care outside the Prince George's County Health Department in Cheverly.

"I've been in this county campaigning more than any other county in the state," Mr. Cardin told reporters. "We'll be here the rest of this week, every day, because of the importance of Prince George's County to our campaign."

A Steele campaign spokesman described the push in the county as "aggressive."

About 400 Steele campaign volunteers have been canvassing in the county for the past several weeks. Joe Gaskins, chairman of the Steele campaign in Prince George's, said he hopes to have between 3,000 and 5,000 canvassers in the county on Election Day.

The candidates are engaged in a fierce tug of war for the county's voters, said the Rev. C. Anthony Muse, a Democrat running unopposed for a Prince George's state Senate seat.

"I've seen them both working extremely hard," he said. "Their presence is felt here in Prince George's County. ... Workers are on the ground. People are enthused about this race."

A Black Republican Runs Against The Tide In Maryland Senate Race (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

Washington — Though political momentum appears to be with Democrats around the country, the trend is going the other way in one solidly blue state, where a Republican candidate is gaining on the favored Democrat in a contest with an unexpected racial twist.

The state is Maryland and the candidate is Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, a black Republican running for the Senate against a white Democratic congressman, Benjamin L. Cardin.

Once trailing by more than 10 points, Steele narrowed the margin to where the race is now considered by some to be nearly a tossup. His recent gains reflect growing dissatisfaction among some blacks toward the state Democratic Party.

On Monday, a group of prominent African American Democrats from Prince George's County in the Washington suburbs crossed party lines to endorse the Republican.

"The [Democratic] Party acts as though when they want our opinion they'll give it to us," said Wayne Curry, the former county executive who led the mutiny. "It will not be like that anymore."

Curry and others complained that although nearly 30% of the state's population and 35% of Democratic voters were African American, too many of the statewide Democratic candidates in this year's election were white.

Endorsing Steele "is a way to say, 'Don't leave Prince George's out, and don't leave African Americans out,' " said county council member David Harrington at a press conference.

Racial tensions in Maryland's Democratic Party have been brewing since earlier this year, when Cardin beat back a primary challenge from former congressman and NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume by a margin of 44% to 41%.

Democratic leaders say that Cardin won because he raised more money than Mfume. But Ronald Walters, a professor at the University of Maryland who studies African American politics, said the party leadership rallied early around Cardin, which hampered Mfume's ability to raise cash.

"I was startled by the swiftness of it," Walters said. "It was as if they wanted to foreclose the possibility of anybody else jumping in."

Since winning the primary, Cardin has generally polled well above Steele, which would be expected in a state where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2 to 1. But Cardin's lead began to slip recently, and some polls show it in the single digits.

DOJ_NMG_0089467

One reason, observers say, is that Steele has run a series of clever TV ads, including one known as "the puppy ad." In an effort to inoculate himself against negative Democratic ads, Steele warns voters that they are likely to hear Democrats accuse him of terrible things like hating puppies.

"For the record," Steele says, "I love puppies."

Jennifer Duffy, who analyzes Senate races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, says that Steele's strong performance has been a surprise.

"Mfume didn't have all that much money, and he still got 41%. Which tells me people didn't exactly flock to Cardin," Duffy said. "Steele is a lot better than expected. It's not that Cardin is a bad candidate; he's just a little dull."

On Friday, Duffy officially moved the race — which is for the seat of retiring Democrat Paul S. Sarbanes — from the "leans Democratic" category to "tossup."

"At the end of the day, do I think it's really hard for Steele? Yes," Duffy said. "It's a very Democratic state and a very bad environment for Republicans. But he has made this a race."

Maryland's Democratic Party insists that Cardin is well ahead of Steele, and that even a black Republican in a state with a sizable African American community will have trouble getting elected this year.

"I think the voters understand that a vote for Michael Steele is a vote for George Bush," said state Democratic Party spokesman David Paulson. "Right now, Democrats don't like the guys who are holding George Bush's hand."

Democrats also complain that to attract Democrats and independents, Steele has been softening his positions to make himself sound more liberal. In particular, they cite what they describe as changing statements about his views on abortion and stem cell research.

"You need to round up a search party to find out where he stands on the issues," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.).

And they also point out that because Steele is from Prince George's County, where he got his start in politics, the support he's won there from some black Democrats may not carry over to the rest of the state.

Still, the race has been closer than expected.

Duffy said that Steele's success continued to be an aberration for black Republicans. The other two black GOP candidates who have caught national attention, gubernatorial candidates J. Kenneth Blackwell in Ohio and Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania, are not expected to win.

"Of the three of them," Duffy said, "Steele is the last man standing."

Va., Md. Senate Camps Dig Deep (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Television viewers in Virginia and Maryland are being inundated by a last-minute deluge of commercials from the U.S. Senate candidates and their national political party benefactors, who are pouring millions of dollars into the two states as the bitter fall campaign draws to a close.

The flood of money into the two states means that hardly anyone who watches TV in the next six days will be able to avoid seeing the candidates or their surrogates make a final plea for votes before Tuesday's election. In the Washington area media market, for example, even a casual TV viewer will see 42 campaign commercials for Republican George Allen or Democrat James Webb between now and Election Day, advertising specialists said.

"Each side is dishing it out," said Charlie Cook, who edits a nonpartisan national political newsletter. He said that the money pouring into Maryland and Virginia, especially from Democrats, is staggering. "It's almost as though Chuck Schumer has a printing press in his basement." U.S. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

In Virginia, that committee has bought $2.6 million worth of TV and radio spots that began airing yesterday, bringing its contributions on behalf of Webb to about $6 million. The GOP counterpart has spent $1 million on ads for Allen.

In Maryland, the National Republican Senatorial Committee contributed $400,000 yesterday to air 93 TV spots on behalf of Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) on stations in Baltimore and the Eastern Shore. Democrats have pumped $1.7 million into Maryland for U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.).

The money from Washington, combined with the substantial cash raised by the Senate candidates, reflects how critical Virginia and Maryland are to the national political parties. A Steele victory in Maryland could doom hopes for Democratic control of the Senate. A victory by Webb in Virginia could be a disaster for the GOP.

The advertising intensity is particularly acute in Virginia, one of three states with close contests where control of the Senate is likely to be decided. Allen, who started the campaign with a huge financial advantage over first-time candidate Webb, will be outspent heavily by Democrats in the closing days as he fights for his political survival. A statewide poll for CNN released Monday showed Webb with a four-point lead over Allen among likely voters.

"It's clear to us that the DSCC and [Sens.] Chuck Schumer and Hillary Clinton -- oh, and let me add in John Kerry -- want to buy themselves a U.S. senator," said Allen consultant Chris LaCivita.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd promised a heavy dose of Webb on TV, offering "what he stands for, what he believes in, what type of person he is."

A spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, Dan Ronayne, said he could not comment on the TV push in Maryland but said, "We see it as a very close race."

Steele spokesman Doug Heye was more optimistic. "I think over the past week, this campaign has demonstrated that Michael Steele has more momentum than any candidate in the country," Heye said. "He's worked extremely hard to put himself in a position to win, and that's what we've seen happen."

A spokesman for Cardin, Oren Shur, said: "Michael Steele has been the chosen candidate of President Bush and the national Republicans from Day One in this campaign. We expect that to continue to Election Day."

Even as their mugs were flashing on TV, the candidates in both states took to the road yesterday, courting voters face to face.

Cardin spent the day in Prince George's County and Baltimore, where he spoke to a minority business group. Steele gave a 40-minute motivational speech at Morgan State University in Baltimore. In Virginia, Webb campaigned with former governor Mark R. Warner (D) in rural areas; Allen rallied in Charlottesville with Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.).

With the clock ticking toward Tuesday, the candidates continued to air negative charges, hoping to depress turnout for their opponents. An Allen ad running frequently in Virginia accuses Webb of failing to take seriously the Navy's Tailhook scandal, in which women were assaulted at a Las Vegas convention in 1991.

Webb has responded with an ad denying Allen's accusations.

"After a campaign filled with nothing but attacks on Jim's character, you would think that now, in the last week, [Allen] would find a shred of decency and keep this positive," Todd said Tuesday. "He can't do it."

LaCivita said that Todd's comments were "the pot calling the kettle black."

Allen and Webb also began airing more positive ads yesterday in hopes of appealing to voters' softer sides. By the end of the week, those ads are likely to become almost as ubiquitous as the attacks that viewers have come to expect as candidates attempt to end the campaign on a high note.

In one new ad, called "Bottom Line," Webb looks directly into the camera and -- in a first for him -- directly asks to be elected to the Senate.

"Bottom line: They're not fighting for you," he says of incumbents in Washington. "I will. We need a new direction, on issues like making health care and college more affordable and setting a real strategy to make our nation more secure. If you're ready for change, I'd be honored to have your vote."

Allen countered with a new ad of his own, in which he says he deplores what he calls false character attacks and distortions of his record.

"That's not how we do things in Virginia," he says to the camera. "As your senator, I want to continue fighting for our shared values. Lower taxes, a better education for our children and a safer, stronger America. I'm George Allen, and I approve this message and respectfully ask for your vote."

Campaign Takes Low Road Through Crucial Missouri (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, November 1, 2006

FARMINGTON, Mo. – For Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.), one syllable, like one vote or a one-point margin, could make all the difference.

At a Republican rally on Monday in this small town 90 miles south of St. Louis, Talent first pronounced his home state "Missour-ee" and then as "Missour-ah," prompting a cable television producer to inquire about Talent's sudden twang.

Talent explained that he tends to adopt the inflection of those around him, noting that Sen. Kit Bond (R-Mo.), who introduced Talent to the local crowd, calls their home state "Missourah." It is not unusual for politicians to thicken their accents the farther they travel from Washington.

Talent's shifting inflection could serve as an analogy for competing natures of his appeal to voters; Talent has a studious, bookish reputation but his fight against state auditor Claire McCaskill (D) has been as down-and-dirty as others across the country.

Talent, one of seven GOP senators facing tough contests, is in the third fight for his political life. In 2000, he lost a gubernatorial race by one percentage point. Two years later, he won his current Senate seat by a percentage point.

McCaskill, a proven vote-getter, has won two statewide elections. In 2004, she defeated a sitting governor in the Democratic primary, but lost to then-Secretary of State Matt Blunt (R). Some Democrats said she let Republicans define her and did not spend enough time campaigning in rural Missouri. Now, McCaskill is running a more disciplined campaign, touring southern Missouri in her RV and focusing on appealing to rural voters.

Her advertisements, particularly her most recent and controversial one, have thrown Talent off-stride. Last Saturday during the first game of the World Series, the Democrat aired an advertisement on embryonic stem cell research with actor Michael J. Fox. With his symptoms of Parkinson's disease front and center, Fox endorsed McCaskill and criticized Talent, accusing him of opposing stem cell research.

The ad has drawn huge national attention, and Republican criticism for mendacity, but a supporter of Talent in Clayton, an upscale suburb of St. Louis, told two Talent canvassers that, "The Democrat's ads make Talent look like an idiot."

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) has spent $9.1 million running ads against Talent, alleging that he voted for legislation that would send jobs overseas. The Republican National Committee (RNC) and the Senate GOP campaign committee have spent $7.7 million on ads, polling and mailings.

"They're coming after me," McCaskill told a small group of labor supporters earlier last Saturday morning. "Why even take 30 seconds? They ought to just come out and say it. Claire is Satan's sister."

For weeks, Talent and his allies have alleged that McCaskill's husband beat his former wife and used investments in Bermuda to shield income from taxation; that the couple did not pay taxes on a lakeside condominium; and that as state auditor, McCaskill did not scrutinize the nursing home industry in which her husband made his fortune.

Having learned from her loss in 2004, McCaskill lets no attack go unanswered. She will begin airing a television advertisement tonight rebutting GOP criticism of her oversight of the nursing home industry. She insisted that her criticism of Talent is limited to his voting record in the Senate and that his campaign did not match his character.

"I've known Jim for 20 years … He's not a Prince-of-Darkness kind of guy," she said.

Talent said his campaign style was simply a matter of talking about his accomplishments and contrasting his record with his opponent's.

"Yeah, I talk about my record and what I've done and accomplished. I contrast that with her record … this is all relevant to the campaign," Talent said, referring to McCaskill's family's finances.

While sources from both campaigns said the race would remain close in this traditional swing state, they acknowledged the negative attacks had driven up the candidates' disapproval and unfavorability ratings. A St. Louis Post-Dispatch poll showed the race tied with each candidate pulling in 47 percent of the vote.

Everyone, including both candidates, expect a tight race. Talent said even in a perfect world the best he could do is win by six points, 53 to 47 percent.

Republicans are pouring resources into the state. The Talent campaign is paying volunteers $50 for six hours of working for the campaign. The RNC is expected to send volunteers into the state and local Republicans are recruiting volunteers for the vaunted 72-hour program. In southwestern Missouri, a bastion of GOP votes, Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) is organizing 800 shifts of volunteers to knock on 40,000 doors and make 150,000 phone calls to likely GOP voters, said a campaign aide.

McCaskill loaned her campaign $500,000 last week. The DSCC and the state Democratic party have updated the voter file and labor unions and local and congressional Democrats will help get voters to the polls. Charlie Dooley, the St. Louis County Executive, said he plans to knock on 60,000 doors in the campaign's final week to help McCaskill. Rep. Russ Carnahan (D-Mo.) has deployed his political operation to help McCaskill and Democratic Reps. Lacy Clay and Emanuel Cleaver have done advertisements on black radio stations to encourage black voters.

With six days to go, both campaigns are ginning up support among their base voters. McCaskill began a campaign swing yesterday that will take her from St. Louis to Springfield to Kansas City. She plans to campaign for 24 hours straight starting Friday.

On Monday, Talent, Bond and Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) made stops in five cities in southeastern Missouri. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) campaigned yesterday for Talent and President Bush will visit Springfield on Friday.

Bond, who introduced Talent, hyped his work to combat methamphetamine abuse and increase resources for farmers to produce ethanol. Talent then reassured the base voters that he opposed gay marriage, amnesty for illegal immigrants and any legal consolations for terrorists. He mentioned Iraq only in passing.

At each of the five stops and at an evening fundraiser with Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow, Talent told the crowds that he "thinks" he can win. In a pithy rejoinder, Snow said, "The only difference between President Bush and Jim is that [Bush] knows you're going to win."

Democrats are watching McCaskill to see whether her strategy of appealing to culturally conservative voters will pay off. McCaskill laces her speeches with references to the Bible in an effort to connect with voters on a gut level and to make a case for Democratic policies. If she is successful, many Democrats believe her campaign can provide a road map for how to recapture the White House in 2008.

Her strategy appears to have yielded some dividends. Not only have polls shown her running ahead or even with Talent, she appears to have captured support from some disaffected Republicans.

"We need some changes and Claire is that change," said Bernard Fritz of St. Louis, a recent retiree and lifelong Republican who explained that he was fed up with the war and budget deficits.

For his part, Talent has not closed the deal with the few voters who remain undecided. At the Applebutter Festival in Kimmswick, Mo., last weekend, Orville Sauder, who was selling sausage and elk jerky, said, "I'm not impressed with Talent, but I really am unimpressed with McCaskill."

On Sunday afternoon in Clayton, some voters expressed disgust with both campaigns.

"They ought to quit talking about each other. Neither candidate is talking about themselves yet," said a middle-aged man who asked not to be identified. "I'm a supporter [of Talent], but I am [not sure]."

Chafee Takes Jab At Sen. Harry Reid (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), whose collegial personality has bolstered his appeal in an otherwise blue state, took an indirect shot at Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) during a debate Monday night with his Democratic opponent, state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse.

When Whitehouse blasted Chafee for failing to push for Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation in the wake of escalating chaos in Iraq, the incumbent — trailing his foe by as many as eight points in recent polls — asked Whitehouse why he has failed to question Reid's amended reports to the Senate ethics committee clarifying the details of a $1.1 million land deal.

"Whitehouse is talking about, 'you should call for this, you should call for that,' and the senator is putting out that the current Democratic minority leader, Harry Reid, has got some ethics questions surrounding his conduct and Whitehouse has stayed silent," Chafee campaign manager Ian Lang said. "Does [he] believe that this disqualifies Reid as minority leader?"

Whitehouse spokeswoman Alex Swartsel did not address the Chafee camp's question directly, instead continuing to hammer the centrist Republican as a reliable vote for GOP leadership.

"Chafee hasn't explained why he has continued to support his Republican leadership despite their failure to hold the administration accountable for its failures in Iraq," Swartsel said.

Behind The 'Mob' Ad, A Republican Donor With A History (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

TRENTON, Oct. 31 — A much-criticized television advertisement that uses a mob character to impugn Senator Robert Menendez was financed by a Republican donor who has given more than $6 million this year to start ad campaigns attacking Democrats.

The donor, Bob J. Perry, a Houston home builder, gave $4.45 million in 2004 to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, an independent organization that attacked Senator John Kerry's Vietnam War record, damaging his presidential campaign and leading to protests about the tactics used by such outside groups.

The anti-Menendez ad was produced by one such group, the Free Enterprise Fund Committee, which said it received about $1 million from Mr. Perry. His role in the ad was reported on Tuesday in The Star-Ledger. Earlier this year, Mr. Perry started another group, the Economic Freedom Fund, with a $5 million contribution. Together, the committees are running attack ads in about a dozen states.

In the anti-Menendez ad, titled "Politicos," a stocky character with a leather jacket and a "Sopranos" accent rasps into a cellphone: "We got a problem. Our boy down in Washington, Bob Menendez, he's caught in a federal investigation. The feds start looking at these fixed contracts, and bada-bing, we're in it deep."

"We need to get the bosses to fix this thing, like they did for Torricelli," he says at the end of the ad.

Jill Hazelbaker, a spokeswoman for Mr. Menendez's Republican opponent, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., said the campaign condemned the ad when it started running a week ago. That statement, Ms. Hazelbaker said, "makes clear that we loathe the ad."

She said the Kean campaign could not call on the sponsors to stop running the ad. Campaign finance laws prohibit any direct contact between campaign officials and the independent groups, known as 527s after a provision in the federal tax code that permits them to spend unlimited amounts as long as they do not coordinate efforts with candidates.

But Matt Miller, a campaign spokesman for Mr. Menendez, said: "The Republicans have been very good at getting all their donors to fund side projects to smear Democratic candidates. We saw it pop up in New Jersey with the Free Enterprise Fund ads, which repeated Tom Kean Jr.'s smears."

Todd S. Schorle, a spokesman for the Free Enterprise Fund Committee, said that Mr. Perry provided almost all of the group's financing but that the ad was entirely the creation of the committee staff and the agency that made it, Nelson Warfield and Company. Mr. Schorle said the ad cost $200,015 and was to run for a week, ending today, on cable stations in several North Jersey counties.

When asked about Mr. Perry, Mr. Schorle said, "We don't discuss any of our donors."

The committee has run ads against other Democratic Senate candidates, including Ned Lamont in Connecticut, Jon Tester in Montana and Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee. The Economic Freedom Fund, Mr. Perry's new committee, has run attack ads in at least five states.

In Indiana, the state attorney general filed a complaint against the group and forced it to stop automated telephone calls attacking a Democrat, Baron Hill, who is challenging Representative Mike Sodrel.

Anthony Holm, a spokesman for Mr. Perry, declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0089472

Mr. Perry is the nation's top donor to the independent groups this year, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks federal campaign finance reports. In 2004 he and his wife, Doylene, were the biggest Republican donors to 527 groups, giving $9.6 million.

Senate Dems Outgive GOP (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 1, 2006

More than half of the members of the Senate Democratic caucus have tapped into campaign coffers for six-figure donations to their party committee, while only 15 Senate Republicans have given similar sums with only one week remaining and control of the chamber up for grabs.

From committee gavels to White House momentum, Democrats digging deep to transfer unused campaign dollars stand to reap huge gains if they can net the six seats needed to take over the Senate. But even Democratic senators up for reelection and out of chairmanship contention made unrestricted transfers to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) in October, leaving Republicans at a $6 million disadvantage in the hunt for member money.

Senate Republicans maintain that their majority will survive despite members' reluctance to give directly to the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and some strategists' anxiety over spending shortfalls in key races. The NRSC made a million-dollar negative-ad buy yesterday in Virginia, where the DSCC reportedly is planning to double that number in a bid to vault Democrat Jim Webb over Sen. George Allen (R-Va.).

Allen chaired the NRSC during the 2004 cycle, when he gave $375,000 in campaign cash directly to the committee, according to Federal Election Commission (FEC) records. Current Chairwoman Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) has given the NRSC $100,000 directly from her campaign, which had about $224,000 on hand at the end of September.

Among the members Dole has solicited for six-figure transfers is Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who did not heed Dole's call for $100,000 from a campaign war chest strained by his high-profile reelection fight in 2004.

"What I've done is raise a lot more money than Dole wanted me to contribute," Specter said in an interview. "I'm working hard to maintain the majority."

Specter said he has held fundraisers for three of his committee members up for reelection, Sens. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) and Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), in addition to raising $100,000 through the NRSC's Majority Makers program and giving more to individual candidates through his Big Tent leadership PAC. His greatest effort has been directed at helping fellow Pennsylvanian Sen. Rick Santorum (R), and Specter said he hopes to cut a radio commercial for the embattled senator this week.

Specter's Democratic counterpart on Judiciary, Sen. Patrick Leahy (Vt.), has given $100,000 in direct campaign cash in addition to making appearances for House candidate Peter Welch (D-Vt.).

Specter and Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine), who is up for reelection in 2008, are the only two Republican chairmen who did not give directly to the NRSC. A Collins spokeswoman noted that she has given more than $200,000 to Republican candidates through other avenues.

"We're very pleased to have support from the caucus and we will do everything we can to get as much as we can during the last week," NRSC spokesman Brian Nick said.

Only one Democratic senator who is in line to chair a committee if the Senate changes hands, Appropriations ranking member Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), has not given directly from his campaign to the DSCC. Byrd is heavily favored to stave off GOP challenger John Raese next week, and his office did not return a request for comment by press time about his giving record.

Despite the NRSC's nearly $1 million deficit in cash on hand entering the final stretch of one of the most hard-fought midterms in years, some GOP senators have boosted their giving since the 2004 season.

Senate Rules Committee Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who is widely expected to vie for the majority whip's post if Republicans hold on and Santorum loses his race, transferred $100,000 to the NRSC in September — his first unrestricted contribution since the 2002 cycle, when he was deposed from Senate leadership.

Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), who has announced his intention to take over the NRSC for the challenging 2008 cycle, gave $250,000 to the committee in October while waging a reelection fight against Democrat Jack Carter.

"Obviously, he believes in the NRSC and has always been one to help out fellow Republicans wherever he can," Ensign spokesman Jack Finn said.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) gave the NRSC $50,000 in October, bringing his total transfers to seven times his 2004 level. Allard, who took a seat on Appropriations at the beginning of this Congress, also has done direct mail for Colorado House hopeful Rick O'Donnell (R) and will join a statewide bus tour for Colorado candidates this week.

The predominance of incumbents in need during this cycle compared with 2004 helped motivate Allard, his Chief of Staff Sean Conway said: "I think the difference is that this time, a lot of the colleagues he works with on a daily basis are in tough races, so he wanted to step in and help out."

One senior GOP aide pointed to his own boss's fundraising activities and said the Republicans' failure to match moves like Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) $2.1 million gift to the DSCC did not tell the full story.

"We certainly understand the importance of this election and we understand the stakes," the aide said. "It's not all about the hard numbers you see, but about your organization. It's not just that members are giving some money to NRSC, but they are doing a lot on behalf of their colleagues. A lot of it is the sweat equity that you do."

Yet few Republican senators can match the earned-media power of John McCain (R-Ariz.), who continues to crisscross the country for Republicans but has given no direct cash to the NRSC. On the Democratic side, presidential aspirants such as Joseph Biden Jr. (Del.), Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) have all sent $150,000 or more directly to the DSCC.

In addition to maxing out through his Progressive Patriots Fund PAC, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) hit the $100,000 mark in October with a bequest to the DSCC.

"Taking back the Senate is a priority if we're to get our country back on track, and continuing to support the DSCC and its efforts is another way Senator Feingold is working toward that goal," Feingold spokesman Trevor Miller said via e-mail.

Some Democratic senators have targeted their campaign transfers and PAC contributions outside of the DSCC, often to swing close state-level races. Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), for example, sent $250,000 on Thursday from his unexpectedly full coffers to a Florida Democratic party working to lift Rep. Jim Davis's (D-Fla.) gubernatorial fortunes.

The DSCC did not return requests for comment on Democratic members' money movement.

A Senate Newcomer, Helping Fellow Democrats On The Trail And Drawing Big Crowds (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

MILWAUKEE, Oct. 31 — Senator Barack Obama of Illinois has become the prize catch of the midterm campaign. More sought after than virtually every other Democrat, Mr. Obama was fully booked, long ago, on a schedule to take him across a large swath of the country to help his party try to win control of Congress.

Now, having increased the intrigue of his persona with his recent announcement that he may run for president in 2008, Mr. Obama is winding up the closing days of the 2006 race as what party officials believe is a powerful tool to draw last-minute attention to Democratic candidates.

In stops with candidates in Minnesota and Wisconsin over two days at the beginning of this week, Mr. Obama helped draw large crowds and intense news media attention to earnest but otherwise nondescript rallies.

His travels have a self-serving purpose, as well; he has been on a tour the last few weeks to promote his second book, "The Audacity of Hope," which is set to make its debut on the nonfiction best-seller list. But the publicity he has attracted along the way has been welcomed by party officials.

Other prominent African-Americans are summoned to the Midwest to campaign in black churches (and that is on Mr. Obama's schedule, too, before the week is out). But Mr. Obama also traveled to Rochester, Minn., in a Congressional district that is more than 93 percent white, to campaign on Monday in front of a nearly all-white crowd for Amy Klobuchar, who is running for Senate, and Tim Walz, a candidate for the House.

Mr. Obama then traveled to Milwaukee on Tuesday to campaign for Gov. James E. Doyle at a rally, where Senator Herb Kohl compared his appearance to one scheduled later in the week by former President Bill Clinton.

"So we're going to have a former president," Mr. Kohl told the more than 1,000 participants at the outdoor rally, "but you know, we might just have a future president in town."

And thus on a freezing Halloween morning, Darnell Barrett, a seventh-grade English teacher, carted his class to an outdoor field in Milwaukee to see the junior senator from the state directly to the south. Mr. Barnett said that seeing the governor and the city's mayor would not have justified the journey; it was Mr. Obama, he said, who inspired the trip.

"He's all people are talking about, to be honest with you," said Mr. Barnett, whose class of 20 students stood on their toes to get a glimpse of the stage. "A lot of the kids had heard of him, if you can believe that."

Mr. Obama's message varies little from venue to venue; in interviews and on the stump, he returns to the theme of moving past the divisions of the 1960s, a distinctly post-baby-boom vision that he, at the age of 45, would be conveniently suited to pursue.

He dreams aloud of a political world in which each side tries to understand the other, and speaks of his belief that Americans are fundamentally optimistic. He warns that the current climate risks leaving the country "a little poorer and a little meaner than the one we inherited from our parents," citing universal health care, higher wages, improved education and sounder energy policy as the most pressing goals.

The war in Iraq, which he opposed from the outset, is among the areas where he sounds most like the liberal wing of his party. In other ways, especially in tone and with regard to politics, he insists that neither party has a monopoly on good ideas and frequently declines to criticize President Bush as unfit.

Even on the question of race in a midterm season that has at times had a sharp racial undercurrent, Mr. Obama can be understated.

In an interview on a flight between campaign appearances, the senator said he did not consider an advertising campaign against Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat running for Senate in Tennessee, to be offensive strictly because it seemed designed to provoke bias in white voters. In the advertisement, a blond white woman, scantily clad, says she met Mr. Ford at a Playboy party and asks him to call her.

"What I saw was some pretty crude innuendo," Mr. Obama said. "I would have been just as offended had they used a black woman. The fact that they used a blonde was sort of putting mustard on the hot dog."

Mr. Obama, who has campaigned for Mr. Ford and plans to do so again, is also one of the top donors to federal candidates from his federal political action committee. He has given $374,000 to federal candidates in this election cycle, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

That is more than even Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, whose PAC donated $252,500, and Senator John Kerry, whose PAC has given $82,600. (All three of them have also helped candidates in other, sometimes more valuable ways, like headlining fund-raising events and lending lists of donor e-mail addresses.) Mr. Obama has also been featured prominently in the Democrats' direct mail campaigns.

When questions about the presidential campaign arise, Mr. Obama is quick to say that he is still at the earliest stages of contemplation. He declined to point out differences between himself and Ms. Clinton, except to say that they had disagreed at the outset of the war in Iraq, which she voted to authorize. (He was not in the Senate yet.)

But he did elaborate on the question of experience, which given his brief tenure is certain to follow him if he decides to run. Asked how important experience should be for a president, he replied, "What I think is more important is judgment."

"Judgment can be borne out of experience," he said. "It would be nice to think the more experience we get, the better our judgment is. But I don't think that's the case. I mean, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld have an awful lot of experience, and yet have engineered what I think is one of the biggest foreign policy failures in our recent history. So I would say the two most important things are judgment and vision."

"Well," he added, catching himself, "judgment, vision and passion for the American people, and what their hopes and dreams are."

Many Republicans have been tut-tutting about the author of "The Audacity of Hope" having the audacity to hope.

"I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in," Dick Cheney told Sean Hannity.

Charles Krauthammer wrote that, despite Senator Barack Obama's charms, he could not win in '08: "The reason is Sept. 11, 2001. The country will simply not elect a novice in wartime."

But if there's one thing W.'s reign proves beyond a shadow of a doubt, it is this: Experience, like affectations, can be dangerous.

They will fill up history books with all the myopic misjudgments made by a war council with a couple of centuries of experience, blunders that undermined America's security and integrity, wrecked Iraq, loosed Osama, and made the world more dangerous.

Those on the president's "dream team" of foreign policy advisers were haunted, not strengthened, by their years of past service in top jobs. When they got the chance to run the country again under W., all they wanted to do was finish unfinished business, misapplying old ideas to new crises, like those who sabotage new romances with baggage from old relationships.

On his initial tour as defense secretary, for Gerald Ford, Rummy felt that Vietnam, Watergate and then Jimmy Carter robbed him of his opportunity to rein in the military brass, who were always impudent enough to have opinions about the military. Determined to banish America's post-Vietnam fears about using force, he ended up creating another Vietnam that spurred more fears about using force.

As Bush 41's defense secretary, Mr. Cheney prepared the '92 Defense Planning Guidance draft with his aides Paul Wolfowitz and Scooter Libby. It called for swaggering world domination in the wake of the cold war, asserting that America should intervene to stop any countries — allies or foes — from challenging its supremacy.

A decade later, with a more jejune Bush as president and a more jittery post-9/11 America, Cheney & Co. brought back the loony plan and renamed it the Bush doctrine.

Vice and Rummy corroded the Constitution by using the terrorist attacks as a pretext to correct the past: as Ford administration big shots, they felt emasculated by the post-Watergate reforms; three decades later, they saw a chance to shoot some steroids into executive branch powers.

Condi Rice had been a Russia expert in Poppy Bush's White House, so she and the older cold warriors like Rummy and Cheney readily saw the red menace under every rock. Like the "experts" who failed back in the 1960s to see that Red China and the Soviet Union were enemies of each other, not friends, they naïvely assumed that Saddam and Osama were in bed together and that because they were both bad guys, going after one was going after the other.

George Tenet's experience tracking bin Laden did him no good, because he was so nervous about being the only Clinton holdover that he was overly sycophantish to W., assuring a skeptical president that proving Saddam had W.M.D.s was a "slam dunk."

W. let the past cloud his judgment as well. He went along with Vice and Rummy on invading Iraq because he thought he could avenge and one-up his father simultaneously.

When Sonny, as Colin Powell called him, announced his candidacy in 1999, I asked him if it was scary to run for president knowing so little about foreign affairs.

"There will be moments when situations, incidents will flare up," he replied, blissfully unaware of the conflagration to come. He said he could lean into his dad's advisers, and trust his gut about which ones to trust and which to "kiss off."

Yesterday, Senator Obama, asked about his short résumé, made the same claim that judgment is more important than experience. But he acknowledged that President Bush has given learning-on-the-job a bad name.

"I mean, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld have an awful lot of experience, and yet have engineered what I think is one of the biggest foreign policy failures in our recent history," he told The Times's Anne Kornblut. "So I would say the two most important things are judgment and vision. Well, judgment, vision and passion for the American people, and what their hopes and dreams are."

Those who declaim on the need for Senator Obama to have more experience must forget who's running the country. It often seems that the most inexperienced person alive is George W. Bush — even after six years in office.

Long Island Newsday, November 1, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton blasted President George W. Bush Tuesday for pursuing a foreign policy that had produced "a landscape of failure and disorder," and she urged a return to diplomacy and negotiation in tackling the world's challenges.

"Our country desperately needs a foreign policy based on bipartisan consensus and executed with nonpartisan competence," Clinton, a likely 2008 presidential contender, told a packed gathering at the Council on Foreign Relations in Manhattan.

Earlier in the day, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, another Democrat eyeing a possible White House bid, outlined his foreign policy views at the Asia Society in Manhattan. While not as openly critical of the Bush administration, Edwards said future leaders would have to deal with a vast erosion of respect for the United States throughout the world as a result of the Iraq war.

"It is the single most important responsibility of the next president: We have to restore American leadership," Edwards said. "The chaos we see in the world today is a direct result of that leadership vacuum."

Clinton, an increasingly vocal critic of the White House, labeled the Bush administration "the largest and least competent government we've ever had."

In her remarks, the New York Democrat emphasized the need for the United States to develop an "internationalist" foreign policy that engaged allies on issues including nuclear proliferation and terrorism. While she broke little new ground in her remarks, the speech offered a window into how she might approach global challenges as president.

As she has before, Clinton criticized Bush for squandering global goodwill after the 9/11 attacks and for pursuing a flawed strategy in the Iraq war while neglecting threats such as Iran and North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons. She expressed amazement over the Bush administration's refusal to negotiate directly with either of those regimes, calling it "a simplistic division of the world into good and evil."

Senator Clinton Attacks Bush And The Iraqi Government (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

Calling for "a fundamental change in course" in Iraq, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton presented her most comprehensive criticism yesterday of the Bush administration's handling of the war, and she said the current government in Iraq had so far failed to be part of a solution.

"Only the Iraqi government can take action to create the conditions for a political settlement," Mrs. Clinton said in a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. "Instead, the government in recent days seems to be going out of its way to rebuff our efforts to move in that direction."

"American credibility is held hostage by an Iraqi government that will not fulfill its pledge to seek a political resolution of the rights and roles of the Sunni minority and to determine how oil revenue is allocated," she added.

Her remarks came on a day of increased tension between the United States and the Iraqi government, led by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, after his insistence that the American Army remove checkpoints set up around Baghdad neighborhoods that are Shiite militant strongholds. The Americans complied, and administration officials said the decision was mutual.

In Mrs. Clinton's speech, touching on issues in countries including Afghanistan, China, Iran and North Korea, she presented a broad vision for an internationalist approach to foreign policy. Yet she reserved her harshest criticism for Iraq.

"In human terms, this has been a horrible month," she said. "In political terms, we have finally reached the point of complete absurdity. The administration announces that it will propose timetables or benchmarks, and the Iraqi prime minister denounces them."

Mrs. Clinton went on to say that several basic components should guide future American policy, laying much of the burden on the Iraqi government.

"First, we need to press consistently, privately and publicly, the Iraqis to become serious about achieving an internal reconciliation and political solution," she said. "And present real consequences for their failing to do so."

While she did not expound on those consequences, she suggested that the pressure put on the Iraqi government would be tied to a "phased redeployment" of American troops out of the country beginning this year.

"Phased redeployment will get the attention of the Iraqi leadership," Mrs. Clinton said. Iraqi officials have sent a mixed message in meetings with her, she said, expressing a desire to be a sovereign nation yet saying they are not ready for the Americans to leave.

"It is time for us to force the Iraqi government to face up to that contradiction," she said. Repeating other ideas that she has expressed over the past year, Mrs. Clinton called for a fund to administer oil revenues in Iraq in an equitable fashion. She also called for a meeting of all the countries in the region to discuss the situation.

More broadly, Mrs. Clinton outlined a foreign policy that she said tried to blend "realism" and "idealism," as opposed to what she said was the Bush administration's "simplistic division of the world into good and evil."

One example of that philosophy put into action would entail the possibility of negotiating directly with Iran to prevent it from developing nuclear weapons.

As Mrs. Clinton skipped from discussing one global hot spot to another, she was consistently critical of the Bush administration. Regarding North Korea, she said the White House was investing too much faith in China. In Afghanistan, she accused the administration of prematurely shifting focus elsewhere and allowing the Taliban to regroup.

She also made a broad case for international cooperation. For instance, she said that the treaties and institutions that were effective in limiting nuclear proliferation during the cold war should be modernized instead of abandoned.

The administration declined to comment on the speech, but the Republican National Committee denounced it. “Either the junior senator from New York really doesn’t grasp the stakes in the war on terror or she is so consumed with her political future that she is willing to compromise our security for personal partisan gain,” said Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman.

From Iraq to the broader fight against terror to domestic security, Mrs. Clinton said the administration had failed.

“The people who promised less government,” she said, “have instead given us the largest and least competent government we have ever had.”

Bridge To The Center (WP)

ROCHESTER, N.Y. -- A tinny band strikes up "Happy Days Are Here Again" as Sen. Hillary Clinton makes her way to the podium at a campaign rally. And here in Upstate New York, where Democrats not so long ago were an endangered species, it looks like happy days are indeed ahead.

A week before Election Day, the Democrats are in a dominant position across the Empire State. Clinton is leading her Republican challenger, John Spencer, by nearly 30 percentage points. The Democratic candidate for governor, Eliot Spitzer, is up nearly 50 points over his GOP rival, John Faso. Perhaps most important, Democrats Eric Massa and Jack Davis are making strong races in Upstate congressional districts that have been solidly Republican for years.

A day spent with Clinton on the campaign trail Monday illustrates the broad, bipartisan themes that have helped rebuild the party in Upstate New York. Her comments also signal the legislative strategy that Clinton hopes to pursue next year, when her party is likely to have control of at least one house of Congress and Clinton herself will be the instant front-runner in the 2008 presidential race.

Rochester on a clear fall day seems like an idyllic version of Clinton's own girlhood home in the prosperous Chicago suburbs. It's a sturdy, Rust Belt industrial city -- a place that sees itself in the middle of the political landscape. The mayor, Robert Duffy, is a former police chief who was recruited to run by both parties but opted for the Democrats and now has an 89 percent approval rating. In national politics, it sometimes seems the country is ripped at the seams by extremists on both sides, but it doesn't feel that way in Rochester.

The issues Clinton stresses through the day are classic "bridge to the future" themes articulated by Bill Clinton when he was president, but with a Hillary twist. She starts the morning brainstorming with local leaders on how to make Rochester a hub for "green" alternative-energy technologies, building around a plant that makes fuel cells. Next, she meets with a health-care network and pitches a revival of her failed 1993 campaign to lower health costs and insure the uninsured. Then it's a tour of a poor urban neighborhood being redeveloped with public-private partnerships of the sort the Clintons have long championed. Her last stop is a steel company where she talks about reviving American manufacturing.

Clinton can't match her husband's raw political energy -- his ebullient way of blurring the edges and seeming to be all things to all people -- but she's getting closer. She feels the pain of the doctors and nurses: "We are just skating along, and the ice is cracking, and we're in danger of falling through." At the political rally that ends the day, she turns her version of centrist politics into a war cry, shouting to the crowd that even conservative Republicans are deciding that "there is nothing conservative or Republican" about Bush policies. She leaves the boisterous rally with a Hillaryesque: "Oh my goodness. This is so exciting."

What will happen to this Democratic energy after Nov. 7? Will it coalesce into strategies for effective governing, or will it simply elevate Bush-bashing to a wider stage? The rage among Democratic activists may undermine the party's effectiveness, but you don't see that negativism here. The Democrats are mounting a surprisingly effective challenge in the bedrock GOP 29th District south of here thanks to Massa, a Navy veteran who has bonded with the activists' "Net roots" Internet campaign. Massa's pro-military, anti-Iraq-war stance defines the high ground this year for Democrats.

Clinton says her priorities in the new Congress will be the same issues she discussed here: creating an energy research agency to speed development of alternative technologies; building a nationwide health-information system as a first step toward broader health reform; restoring the budget rules of the 1990s to slow runaway federal spending; and shaping a bipartisan foreign policy that can salvage what's possible in Iraq. She gave a powerful speech Tuesday at the Council on Foreign Relations, staking out this center ground.

I asked Clinton at the end of this long campaign day to sum up where she will be going in 2007 and beyond, and her answer sounded like a version of America as Upstate New York: "Americans are primarily pragmatic," she said. "We are both conservative and progressive. In the pragmatic center, you get people together; you listen, you learn; you don't draw lines in the sand."

Her updated version of the Clinton gospel is obviously working here in Rochester. But for Hillary, the hard part begins the morning after Election Day.

Election Tests How Much Race Matters (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 1, 2006

NEWTON, Mass. — When Democratic gubernatorial nominee Deval Patrick addressed members of the local Chamber of Commerce, he talked about stimulating the state's economy, streamlining regulations and improving public education.

And race? The subject didn't come up.

Patrick, who is African-American, and members of the audience, almost all of them white, insist color isn't a factor in this campaign. “I don't even see him as black,” says Mike Hurley, 54, owner of the local Minuteman Press franchise. He jokes, “It looks like to me that he has a deep tan.”

Colorblind electorate or not, Patrick is likely to make history next week. The political neophyte, who led Republican Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey by 25 percentage points in a Boston Globe poll taken Oct. 22-25, is poised to become the first black governor of Massachusetts and only the second black ever elected governor in any state.

He is one of a new generation of African-American politicians who are changing old assumptions about what offices black candidates can win.

Unlike senior black members of Congress, they are too young to have joined the civil rights struggles of the 1960s. They often haven't gone to historically black colleges or launched careers at black churches. Instead, many graduated from Ivy League colleges and pursued careers at big law firms. They often advocate pragmatism over ideology and aspire — like white politicians — to the most powerful elected offices in the country.

In congressional elections next Tuesday, Memphis Rep. Harold Ford Jr. would be the first black senator popularly elected from the South if he prevails in a tossup contest for the Tennessee Senate seat. Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele is in a competitive contest for the Senate. Keith Ellison, who is black and Muslim, is favored to win a 70% white congressional district in Minneapolis. Angie Paccione, whose mother is black, is in a close contest to represent an 80% white district in Colorado.

A record six African-Americans hold major-party nominations this year for senator and governor — three Republicans, three Democrats — and another 10 are running for such statewide offices as lieutenant governor and secretary of State that often provide steppingstones to higher office.

To win, these candidates have to appeal to white voters, of course — and in a nation where race continues to resonate.

Ads against Patrick and Ford in recent weeks used “subtle and not-so-subtle” racial appeals, says political scientist Kerry Haynie of Duke. Skeptics, among them political scientist Ronald Walters of the University of Maryland, note that 1989 also was proclaimed a breakthrough year, when Douglas Wilder of Virginia became the first black ever elected governor — only to have 17 years pass without a second.

Still, David Bositis of the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies says he's seen a “co-evolution” by black candidates in shaping broad appeals and by white voters in being open to hearing them.

African-American candidates who lose next week will have been undone not by their race but by the same challenges that defeat white contenders, Bositis says.

Republican Ken Blackwell is running for governor in a year the Ohio GOP has been tainted by scandal, for instance, and Lynn Swann faces a formidable opponent in Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell.

"A lot of young kids are getting beyond race in a lot of ways — I say 'getting,' not 'got,' but 'getting,' " says Bill Perry, a middle-age high school teacher attending a rally for Patrick at the DCU Center Arena in Worcester, Mass. "It's just like my generation got beyond 'Are you Irish?' or 'Are you French?' That was our grandparents."

Thousands of people jam the arena, waiting for the chance to see Patrick and former president Bill Clinton. They wave small American flags and — at the urging of the emcee — use their cellphones to create a sort of instant phone bank, calling friends and urging them to vote.

"You ready to win?" Patrick asks to cheers when he comes on stage with his wife, Diane. Even at a rally, Patrick has a low-key, conversational style. He's given to on-the-one-hand, on-the-other-hand expositions on policy reminiscent of Clinton, his onetime boss and political patron.

"It's a pretty heady thing for a kid from the South Side of Chicago to have a president stump for you," Patrick tells the audience. While he's become accustomed to meeting with power brokers in the penthouses of skyscrapers, he says, "What's also wonderful is when the cleaning crew stops you in the lobby and says, 'I'm for you.' "

Patrick, 50, has lived in both worlds. He and his sister were raised by a single mother in one of Chicago's toughest neighborhoods, living on welfare for a time. A teacher recommended him for a program called A Better Chance, which awarded him a scholarship to attend Milton Academy, a tony prep school south of Boston.

It was, he recalls, "like coming to a different planet." He thrived at the private boarding school, graduated from Harvard and Harvard Law School, then worked for the NAACP Legal Defense Fund. That's when he met Clinton, then governor of Arkansas. Later, as president, Clinton appointed Patrick assistant attorney general for civil rights.

Campaigning at the Chamber of Commerce breakfast, Patrick doesn't mention those jobs or his credentials on civil rights. Instead, he notes that he worked in senior posts at Texaco — chairing a task force appointed after the company lost a major race-discrimination lawsuit — and at Coca-Cola. That gives him the background to effectively manage state government, he tells the audience, many of them small-business owners.

"I bring a range of leadership experience in government, in business, in non-profits, in community groups that's broader than any other candidate in the race," Patrick says in an interview with USA TODAY. His skin color hasn't been an issue "because I'm not offering to be the first black governor of Massachusetts," he says. He's appealing to "all kinds of people from all corners of the commonwealth."

His opponent, Kerry Healey, 46, agrees that race hasn't been a significant factor — perhaps, she says, because her election also would represent a political breakthrough. She would be the first woman elected governor in Massachusetts. "That almost takes that all off the table," she says in an interview.

But Healey injected race with two TV ads in recent weeks, according to David Paleologos, director of the Suffolk University Political Research Center. One ad took Patrick to task for writing two letters and contributing $5,000 to a campaign to win parole for a rapist, Benjamin LaGuer, a black man who proclaimed his innocence. Even after new DNA testing proved LaGuer's guilt, the ad shows Patrick calling him "thoughtful."

The second ad shows a white woman being stalked as she walks in a parking garage at night. Depicting Patrick as soft on crime, the announcer declares: "He should be ashamed — not governor."

Healey says the ads raise legitimate questions about Patrick's judgment in supporting LaGuer and the veracity of his initial explanations about what he had done.

Patrick sees a racial message. "There were a lot of reasons why people equated those ads with the Willie Horton ad," he says, a reference to a spot aired against Michael Dukakis in the 1988 presidential race that showed a glowering black man who committed violent crimes while on parole.

Suffolk University surveys showed Healey's attacks on crime initially narrowed Patrick's lead from 21 percentage points in early October to 13 points in the middle of the month. By the end of the month, however, they had backfired, Paleologos says. Patrick's lead rebounded to 27 points.

Patrick, who has never run for office before, seems poised for a resounding victory in a state where 6.8% of the population is black, half the U.S. average. He crushed two better-known white candidates in September's Democratic primary. Now the Suffolk survey shows him leading among every demographic group except Republicans.

When the votes were counted, he won by just half a point.

Wilder, now the mayor of Richmond, related that cautionary tale to Patrick strategists at a political fundraiser in Washington last month. He says "there's no empirical data" to prove that white voters today are any less likely to lie to pollsters about their willingness to vote for black candidates.

"There remains a non-trivial faction of white voters who will not vote for a candidate simply because (the candidate is) black," says Vincent Hutchings, a University of Michigan political scientist who is co-authoring a book called Wedge Politics. "We are kidding ourselves if we argue these people have disappeared from the landscape."

This year's contests will test whether African-Americans who advocate broad political agendas to mostly white electorates can win, he says. Haynie says their prospects are boosted by such high-profile black officials as Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell, the current and former secretary of State, who have "helped pave the way."

To the White House?

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama roiled calculations about the 2008 presidential contest when he suggested last month he might jump in. And Patrick declines to rule out higher ambitions. "I'm not making any plans for national office," he says. But he also notes, "Life is what happens while you're making plans."

Study: Big 3 News Tilts Vs. GOP (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The Big Three television networks have used unprecedented midterm election coverage to bash the Republican Party with negative stories, and plenty of them, a study says.

Only 12 percent of election stories that aired on NBC, ABC or CBS were favorable toward Republican candidates, according to a study released yesterday by the District-based Center for Media and Public Affairs (CMPA).

In contrast, Democrats basked in glory. The study found that 77 percent of the news accounts between Sept. 5 and Oct. 22 offered favorable evaluations of Democratic candidates and lawmakers.

"These numbers are pretty striking," said Robert Lichter, director of CMPA, a nonpartisan researcher of news and entertainment media. "The coverage has become a referendum on Republican leadership. The big question for all three networks is this: Why are the Republicans in trouble and how bad is it going to get?"

While midterms typically garner only tepid interest from broadcasters, the networks have dramatically ramped up their coverage this time around, providing 167 stories during the study period. Only 35 stories had been aired during a comparable time in 2002.

The networks have fixated on a trio of story themes. The CMPA study found that the resignation of former Florida congressman Mark Foley dominated the midterm coverage, producing 59 stories, compared with the war in Iraq, which inspired 33, and national security or the threat of terrorism, which produced 31 stories.

Other issues of potential importance to voters -- the economy or redistricting, for example -- got short shrift, such topics earning mention in six or fewer stories.

Speculating on voter behavior is also popular on the networks.

"Another big question they ask is this: What is it the public is rejecting, and what are they so angry about?" Mr. Lichter added.

DOJ_NMG_0089482

"CBS Evening News" anchor Katie Couric, for example, said yesterday that 2006 would prove a "wave election, where public dissatisfaction changes the political environment" and "incumbents are washed away."

On NBC, Brian Williams led a report from Ohio with the phrase, "Could this red state end up going blue?" ABC News' Jake Tapper also showcased Ohio voters, saying they showed "an extra layer of disillusion with the Republican Party."

Like negative campaign ads, negative news reports may have a destructive rebound effect on a fickle viewing public.

"For the past week, the mainstream media has run story after story about the nastiness of this year's campaign ads -- perhaps as a way to distract our attention from their own dirty tricks," observed Stephen Spruiell of National Review Online yesterday.

"Viewers can get sick of negative TV coverage. They consistently rate the news coverage as one of the worst parts of a campaign, specifically citing negative content," Mr. Lichter said. And its going to get worse in the shrill run-up to Nov. 7.

"The GOP is the story, and they're caught in an echo chamber," he added.

Midterm Elections Offer Rookie Anchors New Battleground By BROOKS BARNES (WSJ)

Add another hotly contested race to the list for Tuesday's elections: Brian, Charlie or Katie?

While NBC's Brian Williams, ABC's Charles Gibson and CBS's Katie Couric have all settled into their new roles as evening news anchors, Tuesday's midterm elections mark their inaugural efforts at presiding over prime-time election results. The stakes are high. Live coverage of national elections is a defining event for news organizations, and viewers, advertisers and cable and broadcast rivals will be watching closely to see how each handles the hot seat.

Ratcheting up pressure are the special demands of this Election Day. Midterm elections are typically sedate affairs that are more important locally than nationally. But this year the results could lead to a seismic shift in political power. With control of both the House and Senate up for grabs, the television audience is expected to be particularly large, with the networks competing with Fox News Channel, CNN and MSNBC for viewers.

The rookies -- particularly Mr. Gibson and Ms. Couric because Mr. Williams has anchored lots of MSNBC election coverage -- have a series of especially difficult races to call. More than a dozen important ones remain too close to predict, raising the specter of recounts. There could be problems in some states with new electronic ballots. Meanwhile, the networks' exit polls, crucial to their system of calling races, are likely to be fuzzy as more people make use of absentee ballots.

The new anchors have strong memories of their predecessors' botched calls in the 2000 presidential election, and they say in interviews that they are determined to get the calls right this time. "If we have learned anything from the last few outings, it is to call no race before its time," Mr. Williams says. "Getting it wrong is forever. Getting it four minutes late is forgivable."

In a change from the 2002 midterm elections, the networks promise they won't project a winner in any state until after all of that state's polls are scheduled to close. In a first, each network has also agreed to send two representatives to a "quarantine room" at an undisclosed location in New York City to comb through exit-poll data. The goal: to prevent early exit-poll data -- which is often unreliable -- from leaking to the Internet, and to monitor the results in a vacuum, without access to a bank of TV screens tuned to various pundits predicting outcomes.

All three anchors have top billing, but each has a veteran co-pilot. Mr. Williams will be joined by his predecessor, Tom Brokaw. Mr. Gibson will have George Stephanopoulos, the anchor of ABC's "This Week" Sunday news program and a former senior aide to President Clinton. Ms. Couric's predecessor, Bob Schieffer, will appear with her.

ABC, CBS and NBC have spent recent weeks conducting intense preparations for a relatively small amount of on-air coverage. Each network plans an hour-long live special at 10 p.m. EST, with another live broadcast on the West Coast at 10 p.m. PST, the same amount of time the networks dedicated to the last midterms.

The three anchors will be judged not only on ratings but also on content and their ability to perform on the spot. One particularly tricky moment for rookie anchors to master: bringing the newscast back from a commercial or a local break. Called a "reset" in TV parlance, the anchor must sum up the news so far in a pithy sentence.

In their normal slots, Mr. Williams holds a commanding lead. For the week ended Oct. 27, Mr. Williams attracted an average of 8.9 million viewers to "Nightly News" on General Electric Co.'s NBC, according to Nielsen Media Research. At "World News" on Walt Disney Co.'s ABC, Mr. Gibson averaged 8.4 million. Ms. Couric averaged 7.3 million on "Evening News" on CBS Corp.'s CBS.

But unlike the audience for presidential coverage, when the networks remain on the air all evening, viewership for the midterm coverage is typically affected by the strength of the show immediately before. By that measure, ABC has the strongest lead-in with "Dancing With the Stars."

"I personally hope a lot of 'Dancing' fans love politics," says Mr. Stephanopoulos, although they apparently didn't earlier this year, when MSNBC pundit Tucker Carlson was the first "star" voted off the show.

All the new network anchors hope to put individual stamps on their coverage. Ms. Couric, for instance, says her broadcast will strive to be "more accessible and meaningful for regular people." She has been pushing producers to interview average voters over stuffy experts. "Clearly we need to communicate some really critical information, but I think we can have some fun too," she says.

Mr. Williams has something quite different in mind. "I would like to harness some of the shop talk that goes on during our commercial breaks" between political junkies such as Mr. Brokaw and Tim Russert, NBC's senior political analyst. "That's actually really good television," Mr. Williams says. He also plans to pay close attention to potential problems with computerized voting machines. NBC and its sister cable network MSNBC are partnering with an organization that operates a toll-free hotline for voters to report irregularities.

Over at ABC, Mr. Gibson will have the most network air time. While Ms. Couric will go off the air and Mr. Williams will move to MSNBC, Mr. Gibson will continue reporting on ABC's "Nightline."

New this time around at every network is a plethora of news offerings on the Internet and cellphones. CBS plans to update its Web site every 90 seconds, while ABC says it will provide updates every minute. ABC will also allow college and high school students to file Internet "perspectives" via video cellphone, Web cam or camcorder. NBC plans extensive additional material on MSNBC.com, along with original newscasts for mobile phones.

"Online was something that was just beginning the last time around," says Jon Banner, executive producer of "World News." "This time we are truly flooding the zone."

AARP's Tax Trap (WSJ)

Social Security was supposed to be a killer issue for Democrats this election year after they defeated President Bush's reform plans in 2005. But suddenly the tables are turning on several Democratic candidates because of their endorsement of the tax-increase agenda of the American Association of Retired Persons, or AARP.

The liberal entitlement lobby has asked candidates around the country to fill out a questionnaire asking, "Will you support a balanced Social Security plan to continue the program's guaranteed benefits for future generations?" That may sound innocuous, but here's how AARP defines its balanced plan on its Web site near the above question: "AARP believes that a bipartisan plan that balances additional contributions from high income workers with modest adjustments in future benefits can maintain guaranteed Social Security benefits for future generations."

Those italics are ours, because in Washington "additional contributions" means a tax increase. And by "high income workers," AARP can only mean anyone earning more than $94,200, which is the 2006 income level above which the 12.4% Social Security portion of the payroll tax no longer applies. Employers and workers each pay half of the payroll levy, and the income cap already rises each year with inflation.

Thus if you make, say, $100,000 a year but live in pricey Los Angeles, tough luck; the folks at AARP think you're rich. They supported the elimination of the income cap for Medicare's portion of the payroll tax (2.9%) as part of the Clinton 1993 tax increase, and now they want to do it for the other 12.4%. A worker earning $150,000 would pay roughly $6,900 more each year in "additional contributions" under this AARP definition of "balance."

Many members in both parties signed this pledge, but for a handful of Democrats in hotly contested House seats (see the table nearby) it's become a political liability. That's because their GOP opponents refused to take the AARP pledge and are making an issue of this Democratic support for raising taxes on middle- and upper-income wage earners. It's certainly information voters ought to have before next Tuesday. Strangely, however, the Democrats are crying foul, and AARP is trying to give them political cover.

Democrat Melissa Bean -- who is trying to hold her seat in an affluent district near Chicago -- now claims she never supported the tax increase she plainly endorsed in answering AARP's questionnaire. And AARP is helping her disavow her pledge by sending a letter to her district's AARP members (as well as to the districts of other vulnerable Democrats who took its pledge). The letter from AARP President William Novelli slams Ms. Bean's opponent David McSweeney for his "ads trying to scare voters."

This AARP complaint about Social Security "scare" tactics is certainly novel, given that its own political clout has been built entirely on scaring seniors. In 2005, it paid for a TV campaign claiming President Bush wanted to "dismantle Social Security." But see if you can follow AARP's latest logic: According to a Chicago Daily Herald interview with AARP spokesman Dave Sloane: "The organization does believe lifting the cap on Social Security taxes and cutting future benefits may be necessary to keep the system afloat." But then he added that to conclude that Ms. Bean supports these policies "is an outrageous leap that is not even close to the truth."

That's not what Mr. Sloane said in previous statements about the purpose of AARP's candidate survey. He was quoted in the Palm Beach Post as saying that the intent of the questionnaire was to "gauge support for the group's position on Social Security . . . We presume that all the candidates would have read the background material and understood our positions."

Translation: AARP was hoping to use its candidate survey to nail down enough support to raise taxes on Social Security and to defeat private investment accounts if Mr. Bush pushes for reform again next year. But now that its scheme has been exposed and is hurting its Democratic pals in tight races, AARP leaders want to deny that this is what they meant. Let's hope Republicans remember this AARP double-dealing, which resembles what the lobby did in endorsing a drug plan for Medicare in 2003 only to call it inadequate now.

One irony here is that the now-disavowed AARP questionnaire is more honest than the group usually is about the choices facing politicians on Social Security. One option -- opposed by AARP -- is to reduce long-term unfunded liabilities by allowing workers to divert some of their payroll taxes into private accounts and tap into the higher returns that private investments offer. This would go a good deal of the way to solving the problem.

Another option -- the AARP "balanced" plan -- requires either raising taxes or cutting the future benefits of young workers, or both. That is, AARP would make today's lousy Social Security deal for young workers even worse. By all means voters should pay close attention to what AARP asked and how the candidates answered. It may have been the most honest moment in these Congressional campaigns.

To Save New York, Learn From London (WSJ)

By Charles E. Schumer And Michael R. Bloomberg

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

In recent months, there has been a lot of media chatter about the possibility of London taking over New York's position as the world's financial capital. Such speculation, although overblown, has focused our attention on a broader and legitimate concern: Unless we improve our corporate climate, we risk allowing New York to lose its pre-eminence in the global financial-services sector. This would be devastating both for our city and nation.

One of the engines of growth for the U.S. economy, the financial-services industry in New York has long possessed significant comparative advantages over London and all other cities. These advantages include the broadest, most efficient and liquid capital markets in the world, and a concentration of the world's biggest financial firms -- which have a much larger presence here than anywhere else. This city dominates global private-equity markets, secondary trading markets, and mergers and acquisitions.

New York has unparalleled quality of life and cultural diversity, which global companies increasingly seek, as well as a dynamic labor market -- our unemployment rate is lower than the nation's. Taken together, these advantages explain why New York's financial-sector employment numbers are greater than any other city's.

Yet while New York remains the dominant global-exchange center, we have been losing ground as the leader in capital formation. In 2005 only one out of the top 24 IPOs was registered in the U.S., and four were registered in London. London is gaining ground in other areas too, but it is not only London we need to worry about. Next year, more money will be raised through IPOs in Hong Kong than in either London or New York.

We cannot ignore these warning signs. That is why New York has hired a consulting firm, which will issue a report in November identifying the specific variables that are negatively impacting our financial-services industry and recommending an action plan to correct them.

Based on the work completed so far, there are four factors that bear close attention: globalization of the capital markets, overregulation, frivolous litigation and incompatible accounting standards. The first factor is beyond our control; advances in technology and communication are allowing capital to flow more freely, making it much easier to locate financial activities anywhere in the world. But we can, and must, do something about the other three factors to maintain and expand our competitive edge.

First, what lessons can we learn from other nations' regulatory systems? Currently, there are more than 10 federal, state and industry regulatory bodies in the U.S. The British have only one such body. Industry experts estimate that the gross financial regulatory costs to U.S. companies are 15 times higher than in Britain. Beyond cost savings, the British enjoy another advantage: While our regulatory bodies are often competing to be the toughest cop on the street, the British regulatory body seems to be more collaborative and solutions-oriented.

With the benefit of hindsight, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which imposed a new regulatory framework on all public companies doing business in the U.S., also needs to be re-examined. Since its passage, auditing expenses for companies doing business in the U.S. have grown far beyond anything Congress had anticipated. Of course, we must not in any way diminish our ability to detect corporate fraud and protect investors. But there appears to be a worrisome trend of corporate leaders focusing inordinate time on compliance minutiae rather than innovative strategies for growth, for fear of facing personal financial penalties from overzealous regulators.

Second, what lessons can we learn from other nations' legal environments? The total value of securities class-action lawsuits in the U.S. has skyrocketed in recent years, to $9.6 billion in 2005 from $150 million in 1997. The U.K. and other nations have laws that far more effectively discourage frivolous suits. It may be time to revisit the best way to reduce frivolous lawsuits without eliminating meritorious ones.

Third, what lessons can we learn from other nations' experiences with international accounting standards? Most European and Asian countries have already begun to adopt international accounting standards, which businesses tend to prefer over the American system. Yet we have set no timetable for doing the same.

In the last quarter of the 20th century, we achieved an almost exquisite balance between regulation and entrepreneurial vigor in American financial markets. We learned that too much regulation stifles entrepreneurship, competition and innovation; while too little regulation creates excessive risk to industry, investors and the overall system.

This delicate balance has been upset by technological advances, making it much easier to locate financial-services activities anywhere in the world. As a result, foreign markets may be tempted to lower regulatory requirements to achieve a temporary competitive advantage. Though deregulation may help some countries gain more business in the short term, over the long term it could hurt the stability and reliability of the global marketplace.

New York cannot afford to lose its place as the global leader in financial services. We have to carefully redefine this balance of innovation and regulation. That is what we seek to do over the next several months.

Our ability to do that, and to answer these three questions, will determine the future of New York -- and, in many ways, the nation. If we do not rise to the challenge, the speculation that New York is losing its pre-eminence in the global marketplace will become more than just chatter.

Mr. Schumer is a Democratic senator from New York. Mr. Bloomberg is mayor of New York City.

North Korea Will Resume Nuclear Talks (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad, Andrew Baston and Neil King Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0089486

North Korea agreed to return to nuclear-disarmament talks with its four neighbors and the U.S. in a deal brokered by China. As part of the deal, the U.S. agreed to discuss its financial restrictions on the Pyongyang regime.

The agreement relieves some of the tension that North Korea created after it conducted its first nuclear test Oct. 9. It comes as countries around the world prepare to enforce sanctions imposed on North Korea by the United Nations Security Council following the test.

President Bush said he was "pleased" by the breakthrough and thanked the Chinese for their efforts in making it happen. Yet other U.S. officials expressed concern over whether North Korea plans to actually engage in talks and isn't simply trying to dodge U.N. sanctions.

A State Department spokesman said the U.S. was willing to discuss lifting financial restrictions that Washington imposed on North Korea last year so long as Pyongyang agrees to return to a September 2005 framework, in which it had promised to scrap its nuclear work in return for aid and other inducements.

Mr. Bush said there was still "a lot of work to do" and that the U.S. planned to send "teams to the region to work with our partners to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced."

A new round of talks could occur as soon as mid-November, said diplomats in Beijing, where officials from the U.S., China and North Korea met yesterday to discuss the talks' resumption. The three countries -- along with Japan, Russia and South Korea -- last met a year ago.

The deal to restart the talks is a significant diplomatic accomplishment for China, North Korea's neighbor and closest ally. Relations between the two have been strained by Pyongyang's drive to demonstrate its nuclear capability. Senior Chinese diplomats went to Pyongyang two weeks ago to begin the process of bringing North Korea back to the table.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who represented the U.S. in the discussions, said China's role validated the Bush administration's longstanding decision to negotiate with North Korea only when other countries are involved. "The close U.S.-China cooperation that we have developed in recent weeks and months is due to the fact that we had a multilateral process," he said.

China in early October joined many other countries in urging North Korea not to undertake a nuclear test. Pyongyang responded by giving the Chinese just 20 minutes' notice that a test would occur. China then joined other countries on the Security Council in a unanimous vote for sanctions. It also held up some bank transactions in cities that border North Korea.

Last November, North Korea walked away from the preliminary agreement forged in the six-way talks, saying the U.S. had ruined the deal by alleging soon after the accord was reached that a bank in the Chinese enclave of Macau had engaged in illegal activities on behalf of the North Korean government.

After the U.S. blacklisted the bank, the Macau government froze about $24 million in North Korean funds there. Subsequently, other banks began refusing to do business with North Korea.

U.S. officials said its investigations of Pyongyang's financial activities began long before the six-way agreement reached in September 2005. Under the framework deal, the assistance North Korea would have received each week exceeded the money frozen in the Macau bank accounts.

But the frozen assets remained a major issue for North Korea and were cited in official pronouncements and in interviews by government and military figures immediately after the Oct. 9 test.

While North Korea put no conditions on returning to the talks, Mr. Hill said, "They wanted to hear that we would address the issue of financial measures. I said we would be prepared to create a mechanism to address these financial issues."

Mr. Hill said he also told the North Korean diplomats that neither the U.S. nor other countries recognize North Korea as a nuclear state.

In South Korea, where the government has been reluctant to take harsh steps for fear of provoking the North further, officials quickly welcomed news the talks would resume.

N. Korea Agrees To Return To Talks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

DOJ_NMG_0089487

North Korea agreed yesterday to return to the six-nation nuclear disarmament talks, just three weeks after it conducted its first test of a nuclear device.

The country's unexpected decision, which was announced by Chinese and U.S. officials in Beijing, will end Pyongyang's year-long boycott of the talks, which have dragged on intermittently for more than three years. Fourteen months ago, North Korea agreed in principle to dismantle its nuclear programs, but hard bargaining is still necessary to determine the sequence and timing of the incentives it expects in return.

Pyongyang had refused to return to the talks until the United States separately negotiated an end to a crackdown on North Korea's counterfeiting of U.S. currency. But that demand disappeared Tuesday during seven hours of meetings, set up by China at Beijing's Diaoyutai State Guesthouse, involving U.S., North Korean and Chinese officials. North Korea instead agreed to a long-standing U.S. proposal to deal with the counterfeiting issue through a working group of the six-party talks.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill emerged from the meetings to say that there was the potential for "substantial progress" in resolving an issue that has raised tensions throughout the region, including the possibility of a nuclear arms race. U.S. officials were privately puzzled by the mercurial government's change of heart, though they said they hope the universal condemnation of North Korea's nuclear test and the swift imposition of U.N. sanctions had played a role.

"In the wake of their test, it became very clear that there were going to be costs and consequences for their actions and that they faced even greater isolation from the rest of the international community," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. The talks are expected to resume either this month or in December.

Some analysts and diplomats have faulted the Bush administration for being inflexible and ideological during earlier rounds, making it difficult to reach agreement. David Straub, a former State Department official who was part of the U.S. delegation to some of the talks, said North Korea probably shifted tactics to deflect international pressure and divide the nations at the negotiating table. Unless both the United States and North Korea "bring significantly different approaches to the talks, the talks will again amount to nothing," he said. "Indeed, both will almost certainly take even tougher lines."

President Bush, meeting with reporters in Washington, praised China's role in setting up the meeting. "We'll be sending teams to the region to work with our partners to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced, but also to make sure that the talks are effective, that we achieve the results we want," Bush said.

Last Wednesday, the Chinese government contacted the U.S. Embassy in Beijing and proposed a trilateral meeting involving North Korea, the United States and China. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Friday authorized Hill to cut short the meetings he had in the South Pacific and to slip into Beijing on an unannounced visit. U.S. officials agreed to try the Chinese idea but had little expectation it would yield a breakthrough.

In January, Hill held a 2 1/2 -hour meeting in Beijing with the Chinese and North Koreans to try to restart the talks, but that effort was not successful.

This time, Hill had seven hours of meetings -- including, at one point, with Kim Gye Gwan, the North Korean vice foreign minister who is Hill's counterpart in the talks, and other North Korean officials. Hill said he told Kim that the United States would never accept North Korea as a nuclear power, nor would any other nation. Hill also told Kim that the U.N. Security Council resolution imposed after North Korea's nuclear test was an "international obligation" and not up for discussion before the resumption of the talks.

The meetings were described as very businesslike. Kim wanted assurances that a Treasury Department action against a Macau bank suspected of money laundering for North Korea would be addressed in the six-party talks. The United States had earlier suggested setting up a working group to address the issue, and Hill reaffirmed that idea. Kim said that was acceptable, according to Hill.

U.S. officials have maintained that the Treasury case was simply an excuse by North Korea to avoid making the strategic choice of giving up its nuclear programs. In earlier talks, Pyongyang had demanded light-water reactors in exchange for abandoning its programs. Though that possible incentive is mentioned in a September 2005 "statement of principles" to guide nuclear negotiations, the United States has insisted that it is only a theoretical possibility that could come at the end of the verified dismantling of North Korea's nuclear facilities.

North Korea set no conditions for returning to the six-party talks on its nuclear program, Hill said. "For us it was very important that no one should create conditions for attending the talks," he said.

Michael J. Green, who oversaw Asian affairs at the White House until last year, said it was significant that North Korea agreed to return without getting relief from the Treasury action or the U.N. sanctions.

"The Chinese exerted real pressure," Green said. He added that he expects China to push North Korea to offer something concrete at the upcoming rounds of talks, such as a moratorium on future tests, a full detailing of its nuclear programs or the return of international inspectors at its Yongbyon facility.

"North Korea is going to cling tenaciously to its nuclear weapons," Green said, but the existence of U.N. sanctions will facilitate coercive diplomacy.

North Korea has blamed the impasse on the U.S. Treasury action against a bank in Macau called Banco Delta Asia, which the department had identified as the main conduit for bringing North Korean-made counterfeit U.S. bills into the international system. The Treasury had determined that senior officials at the Macau bank accepted large deposits of cash and agreed to place the bogus money into circulation.

The bank is also reputed to hold the private accounts of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and his family.

North Korea Will Resume Nuclear Talks (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 31 — North Korea agreed Tuesday to resume nuclear disarmament talks, a first sign of easing tensions since the country's nuclear test this month. But the talks have dragged on inconclusively for three years, and the chances for rolling back the country's now-proven nuclear capability remained uncertain.

China announced that six-nation talks would reconvene shortly after a hiatus of more than a year, and an American envoy in Beijing said they could take place in November or December.

The agreement was a procedural victory for Beijing, which scrambled to reopen a diplomatic channel even as it joined the United States and other international powers in supporting United Nations sanctions on North Korea after the Oct. 9 test.

But Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, has participated in multiple rounds of talks over the past several years while he accelerated his pursuit of nuclear weapons, and some analysts suspect that he agreed to restart talks now to forestall tough enforcement of sanctions and to persuade China and South Korea to ease his government's growing economic woes.

While North Korea's decision to restart the talks is being heralded as a diplomatic breakthrough, American envoys will be returning to the negotiating table to face an adversary that now has a demonstrated nuclear capability — a fact that America will try to minimize even as North Korea tries to exploit it, Bush administration officials and analysts said.

"The dangerous possibility is that North Korea sits down at the table and says, 'We're now a nuclear state, let's deal with it,' " said Bonnie Glaser, a senior associate at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

In an interview on Tuesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice played down suggestions that America's negotiating task would be made more difficult by the North's nuclear test. "Nobody accepts that they're a nuclear power," she said. The North Koreans, she said, "can say it all they wish."

Ms. Rice said the United States would work with the other participants of the talks to force the North to take a concrete step toward ending its nuclear program. She offered few details but acknowledged that two of the possibilities being discussed were a dismantling of one of the North's many nuclear facilities and the readmission of international inspectors.

Other officials who have discussed the administration's internal deliberations have said the dismantling should begin with a facility like North Korea's five-megawatt reactor, which is continuing to produce nuclear fuel, or its plutonium reprocessing center, where spent reactor fuel can be turned into material for weapons.

"We understand it can't go from zero to 100 in the first session," Ms. Rice said. "But the core of this is denuclearization, and we have to have concrete evidence."

Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state responsible for the talks, and Kim Kye-gwan, his North Korean counterpart, met secretly in Beijing under Chinese auspices to hash out terms of resuming negotiations, Chinese state media reported.

Mr. Hill said Tuesday that he expected "substantial progress" at the talks and that they would resume without preconditions. But he acknowledged that previous talks had been plodding and painstaking, and promised no quick breakthrough.

"We are a long way from our goal, still," he said. "I have not broken out the cigars and Champagne quite yet."

For the past year, North Korea had refused to resume negotiations on its nuclear program until the United States lifted financial penalties imposed on a Macao bank last year that have hobbled the country's international financial transactions. Mr. Hill said that he agreed to discuss the matter as part of the nuclear talks — perhaps in a special working group that would convene at the same time as the main negotiations — but that he had made no promises.

The Bush administration accused the Macao bank, Banco Delta Asia, of helping North Korea to launder money from drug smuggling and other illicit activities and to pass counterfeit $100 bills manufactured by the North Korean government. In September 2005, the Treasury Department ordered United States banks to sever relations with the bank, a move that had broad ripple effects, curtailing North Korean access to the international banking system and further isolating the government in Pyongyang.

The talks, which involve Japan, South Korea and Russia as well as China, North Korea and the United States, reached a vaguely worded agreement for nuclear disarmament in September 2005, which North Korea quickly disavowed. The talks collapsed a short time later amid mutual recriminations.

Mr. Hill said Mr. Kim reiterated during their meetings in Beijing that putting the 2005 accord into effect should be the main focus of the renewed talks.

That agreement called for North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program in exchange for a range of diplomatic, economic and energy incentives, but left most of the details to subsequent negotiations that never took place.

"We all reaffirmed, including the North Koreans, our commitment to the September statement and the denuclearization of the Korean peninsula," Mr. Hill said.

Bush administration hard-liners, who have been chafing under Ms. Rice's multilateral diplomatic approach to North Korea, played down the resumption of talks, saying that America is merely back where it was a year ago before the North abandoned the talks, except now Pyongyang has the added bargaining chip of having exploded a nuclear device.

"Where's the stick?" asked one administration official. "We're celebrating the six-party talks, but we're back to endless chatter."

Gary Samore, a North Korea expert who helped negotiate President Clinton's 1994 agreement with the North, said, "I think the North Koreans gamed this all out. They calculated they could get away with a nuclear test if they allowed themselves to be cajoled back into the six-party talks."

But North Korea's commitment to resume talks may reduce the chances that it will soon conduct a second nuclear test, as some in the region feared it might be preparing to do.

Some Chinese experts have argued that North Korea needs to dispel doubts about its nuclear capabilities and complete its quest to become a full nuclear power before it will be willing to bargain away what it refers to as its "nuclear deterrent."

They say that Kim Jong-il may feel he can demand a higher price for disarmament now than he could when some international experts, including some of China's top North Korea specialists, had expressed doubts that the country could make its own nuclear bombs.

Many others disagree, including a growing contingent of Chinese officials and foreign policy specialists who take a skeptical view of the North's intentions and favor a tougher line on China's Korean War-era ally, according to numerous people involved in the debate.

Shi Yinhong, an international relations expert at People's University in Beijing, said he believed that Kim Jong-il's agreement to return to talks was motivated mainly by his desire to head off tough enforcement of international sanctions.

"His purpose has been to develop nuclear bombs and that purpose has not changed," Mr. Shi said. "His goal now is to keep his bombs but reduce the penalty he has to pay by appearing to be negotiating in good faith."

Some Chinese experts said Beijing had made clear that it would exercise considerable economic and financial leverage on North Korea if it continues to develop its nuclear program and refuses to return to talks.

In September, China did not sell any oil to North Korea, Chinese customs statistic show. The cutoff came before the nuclear test but after North Korea conducted a test of its ballistic missiles in July, ignoring Beijing's pleas for restraint.

Beijing provides an estimated 90 percent of North Korea's oil by pipeline, and any sustained reduction in oil shipments could cripple the country's already weakened economy.

Liu Jianchao, the foreign ministry spokesman, said Tuesday, before the resumption of talks was announced, that China had no plans to sever aid or trade with North Korea, but dodged questions about the oil cutoff.

Pyongyang Agrees To Resume N-talks (FT)

By Mure Dickie In Beijing, David Pilling In Tokyo And Anna Fifield In Seoul

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

North Korea on Tuesday surprisingly agreed to return to the six-party talks on its nuclear programme, just three weeks after it conducted its first nuclear test.

In returning to the talks, analysts say North Korea probably bowed to growing pressure from China, its largest benefactor and closest political ally. China's foreign ministry said that Pyongyang's agreement to resume the talks followed a "frank and in-depth" exchange of views.

As the world's big powers work through the details of how to punish Kim Jong-il's regime for the test on October 9, Christopher Hill, the chief US negotiator in the talks, said on Tuesday that the negotiations – which had been stalled for a year – could resume as soon as this month.

However, with North Korea remaining defiant and the US and Japan still lobbying for tough sanctions, hopes remain dim that Pyongyang will agree to abandon its nuclear capability.

"We are a long way from our goals," Mr Hill told reporters in Beijing, after seven hours of talks with Wu Dawei and Kim Kye-gwan, his Chinese and North Korean counterparts.

"I have not broken out the cigars and the champagne yet," Mr Hill said, adding that the timing was "dependent on agreement of all the parties".

In Tokyo, Hiroshi Suzuki, deputy chief cabinet secretary, said North Korea's return to the table vindicated the tough stance advocated by Shinzo Abe, Japan's prime minister. "We feel this is the result of the international community condemning North Korea and the result of the pressure applied under United Nations resolution 1718 and Japan's own sanctions."

Earlier on Tuesday, Mr Abe told the Financial Times, that sanctions were vital to force a negotiated settlement to the nuclear crisis. He said the international community, including China and South Korea, should "make [Kim's] regime aware that, should it continue with its current policy line, it will only find the situation surrounding it worsen by the day. "The economic as well as the food situation is only going to get tougher," he said.

Mr Abe, who built his political career on being tough on Pyongyang, said imposing severe sanctions would not inevitably lead to confrontation.

"We are convinced that this problem needs to be resolved diplomatically and in a peaceful manner," he said. "But I also think Chairman Kim Jong-il and the regime are aware that if they resort to force, that will spell the end of them," he said. Since the test, Tang Jiaxuan, a Chinese state councillor, has travelled to Pyongyang to meet Kim Jong-il and Chinese banks have clamped down on transactions with North Korean companies.

A senior South Korean government official said it was "taken for granted" that North Korea and the US would hold bilateral talks on the sidelines of the multilateral discussions.

Both Japan and the US have said that a return to six-party talks would not be sufficient to prevent sanctions. The cabinet office in Tokyo said last night that in returning to the negotiations, Pyongyang was only doing what it was mandated to do by the United Nations.

Thomas Schieffer, US ambassador to Japan, recently said that only a verifiable end to North Korea's nuclear programme could justify lifting sanctions.

Analysis: N. Korea, U.S. Both Flexible (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, November 1, 2006

The United States and North Korea took a step back from the nuclear brink after both sides showed they could be willing to bend under the calm guidance of Beijing.

Still, with no date set for arms talks to resume and Washington and Pyongyang profoundly lacking in trust of each other, it remains to be seen whether Tuesday's agreement for the North to return to negotiations means an end is near for the North's aspirations of being a nuclear power.

Both the North and the United States had previously stuck to ironclad positions that seemed totally at odds, leaving little apparent room for a breakthrough. Neither side wanted to cave, despite calls from other nations for flexibility.

In keeping with its typical tactics of escalation and brinksmanship, the North test-fired a barrage of missiles in July and then took the unprecedented step of conducting a nuclear test Oct. 9 to goad the U.S. to action. Washington responded by backing tough U.N. sanctions.

If the United States agreed to meet the North's demand for direct talks and other concessions, it would amount to succumbing to nuclear blackmail — at least in some minds.

Instead, U.S. officials demanded the North first return to the international nuclear talks — which also include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea — and said it'd be happy to meet separately just with the North there. That position had softened somewhat just before the North's Oct. 9 nuclear test, with U.S. officials saying the North simply had to agree to return to the nuclear talks first to get some face time with the Americans.

But the North insisted on direct talks with the U.S., in keeping with its view that its nuclear dispute is with Washington alone because of the perceived threat to the regime it sees from the American military.

Pyongyang also wants to be seen as on equal footing with Washington, a desire fueled by nationalistic ideology viewing itself as a great nation and "socialist paradise."

North Korea had also refused to return to the talks until the U.S. lifted financial restrictions against a Macau bank where it held accounts. That move had been part of a Washington campaign to sever the already isolated communist country from the international financial system for its alleged involvement in counterfeiting and money laundering to sell weapons of mass destruction.

China appears to have held the key in getting both sides to compromise and allow all to save "face."

During Tuesday's meetings in Beijing that led to the North's agreement to return to the bargaining table, Chinese and American representives first met and then all three sides had lunch, said U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the main U.S. envoy. Then, the U.S. and North Korean delegations met before all three got together again.

Having China in the room for most of the time meant the U.S. technically wasn't meeting just with North Korea.

For its part, the North stepped back from its demand that the financial restrictions be lifted to return to nuclear talks. But Hill said Washington did agree to discuss the issue at the nuclear talks.

Those negotiations will still be rife with pitfalls, given disagreements between the two sides.

The North has previously refused to dismantle its nuclear program without getting concessions along the way, while the U.S. has said it wants to see the entire program eliminated before giving Pyongyang any reward.

When the talks do resume, the U.S. and North Korea will have a chance to show just how far their flexibility goes.

Bush Cautious On N. Korea Nuke Turnabout (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 1, 2006

In a surprise turnabout, North Korea agreed Tuesday to return to six-nation disarmament talks just three weeks after rattling the world by conducting an atomic bomb test. The breakthrough came after pressure from China and a U.S. offer to discuss financial penalties already in place.

DOJ_NMG_0089492

President Bush cautiously welcomed the deal and thanked the Chinese for brokering it. But he said the agreement wouldn't sidetrack U.S. efforts to enforce sanctions adopted by the U.N. Security Council to punish Pyongyang for its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

He said there was still "a lot of work to do" and the U.S. would send teams to the region "to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced."

The ultimate goal is "a North Korea that abandons her nuclear weapons programs and her nuclear weapons in a verifiable fashion in return for a better way forward for her people," the president said.

The unexpected agreement to restart the talks — before year's end, U.S. officials said — was announced after envoys from North Korea, the United States and China met in Beijing, at China's invitation.

In a statement about the decision, North Korea's Foreign Ministry said the North decided to return to the talks to resolve financial restrictions the U.S. had imposed on its international banking activities. The North's recent nuclear test received scant mention, with the Foreign Ministry referring only to a "self-defensive countermeasure" it had taken against the nuclear threat and financial sanctions from the U.S.

The move represented a step back from the nuclear crisis and was widely applauded, if with some reservations. North Korea has a history of walking away from the six-nation talks, only to rejoin them, then to bolt again.

"We believe that the sooner talks resume, the faster the tension around this problem will fade," Igor Ivanov, chief of Russia's presidential Security Council, said in Moscow.

Japan's U.N. ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, called the development "a welcome first step, but there are many, many other things that we need to closely monitor and watch." Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso was quoted as saying a resumption of talks "is conditional on North Korea not possessing nuclear weapons."

Aso later said that sanctions would be maintained against North Korea in spite of its willingness to return to the talks. In a tough stance against North Korea, Japan has banned all trade and barred North Korean ships from its ports.

Just a week before contentious U.S. congressional elections, it was a diplomatic victory for Bush. Democrats gave it a qualified but skeptical endorsement.

"It may ultimately be a positive step forward, but it is clearly not sufficient to produce the goal we all want to achieve — a halt to North Korea's nuclear weapons' activities," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada. He urged Bush to name a special envoy to Pyongyang and to engage in direct U.S.-North Korean talks.

Republicans cast it as a sign of Bush's foreign-policy leadership. "The president's strategy has effectively isolated North Korea from its neighbors in the region and now appears to have returned that rogue regime to the negotiating table," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

However, China's leaning on its communist neighbor appeared to be the major factor in the progress, not U.S. diplomacy, and Bush acknowledged Beijing's role in Oval Office comments to reporters.

China, the largest supplier of oil for North Korea, has more leverage than any other country with Pyongyang. In a possible sign of Beijing's growing impatience, Chinese exports of diesel and heating oil to North Korea dropped substantially in September from a year ago, though exports of gasoline, liquefied petroleum gas, kerosene and jet fuel rose, according to Chinese customs data.

The six-nation talks — involving North and South Korea, the United States, China, Russia and Japan — have been stalled since last November. North Korea has boycotted them, largely to protest U.S. financial sanctions that target alleged counterfeiting of U.S. currency and money laundering.

Washington has insisted those sanctions, which include a freeze on North Korean bank accounts in Macau, are unrelated to the nuclear weapons dispute.

For its part, the North stepped back from its demand that the financial restrictions be lifted before it would return to nuclear talks. And Washington agreed for the first time to discuss the financial sanctions at the nuclear talks, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the U.S. negotiator, told reporters in Beijing.

Hill said the talks could resume as early as November or December. "We took a step today toward getting this process back on track," he said. But, he added, "We are a long way from our goal still. ... I have not broken out the cigars and champagne quite yet."

White House press secretary Tony Snow sought to play down U.S. concessions. He insisted that the United States made no promises to link the financial-sanctions dispute to the nuclear one, only agreeing that "issues like that may be discussable at some future time."

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack said he was sure there would be "an opportunity for us to have direct talks" with North Korean negotiators in the context of the six-party framework. He said the negotiations would probably take place in Beijing.

The six-party talks had originally been intended to persuade Pyongyang to abandon its nuclear ambitions. But its nuclear test changed the debate and the stakes.

"No one wants North Korea to continue its nuclear weapons program, particularly after the North Koreans tested a nuclear device," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview on CNBC. She said the U.S. wanted "concrete steps" toward denuclearizing the Korean peninsula. "It really doesn't make sense again for us just to go back and talk," Rice said.

The Security Council voted unanimously on Oct. 14 to impose sanctions on Pyongyang, including a ban on major weapons shipments and restrictions on sales of luxury goods.

"The big question now is, will we meet and will we have anything new to talk about? The North still doesn't trust us, and we don't trust North Korea," said John Wolfstahl, a former nonproliferation official with the U.S. Energy Department.

Sen. Carl Levin, the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the development was heartening, but that the next round of talks would be much tougher because North Korea has now tested a nuclear weapon. "I'm afraid North Korea comes back stronger," Levin said in an interview.

North Korea To Resume Six-Party Nuclear Talks (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

BEIJING -- North Korea agreed Tuesday to return to negotiations aimed at halting its nuclear weapons program, three weeks after the regime conducted its first nuclear test.

Washington, Beijing, Tokyo and other negotiating partners get what they want -- a North Korean regime back at the table talking with the outside world rather than posturing and threatening from its isolated corner. But the move threatens to widen the differences among other partners in the talks, made up of the U.S., China, Japan, the two Koreas and Russia, which in the immediate wake of the test Oct. 9 were relatively unified.

China and South Korea will be more tempted to oppose further sanctions at the U.N. Security Council amid concerns that pushing North Korea too far could create an expensive and destabilizing refugee crisis on their shared borders.

After North Korea's announcement that it had done an underground test of a nuclear device, the Security Council imposed sanctions last month that restricted trade with North Korea in missile technology and luxury goods.

Washington and Tokyo feel it is more important to keep pressure on Pyongyang, not only to exact a cost for its action but also to serve as a deterrent for others, especially Iran.

North Korea set no conditions for its return to the bargaining table with sessions expected to begin next month, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill told reporters.

The talks will take as their starting point the September 2005 Beijing joint statement agreed upon by the negotiating parties shortly before Pyongyang walked out. A key goal in the statement is the eventual denuclearization of the Korean peninsula.

North Korea on Tuesday dropped its demand that the U.S. end financial sanctions linked to counterfeiting, money laundering and weapons proliferation before the isolated Stalinist state would return to the bargaining table. Instead, the U.S. financial squeeze, which involves $24 million in a Macau bank, will be considered as a side issue within the six-party framework.

"We need (North Korea) to get out of illicit activities," Hill said. "We didn't start this dance."

With a test under its belt, North Korea returns to the talks in a position of greater strength. This begs the question whether Pyongyang will pick up negotiations where it left them off 13 months ago or cling to a tougher stance reflecting its membership in the nuclear club.

The six-nation talks "can be endlessly gamed by the North Koreans," said Derek Mitchell, an Asia specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "We'll see if they're serious once they get there."

In Washington, President Bush expressed pleasure that the talks would resume and praised the six-party format. In the lead up to next week's midterm election, the news could be used to counter criticism by Democrats of his refusal to hold bilateral talks with Pyongyang.

"I've always felt like it is important for the United States to be at the table with other partners when it comes time to addressing this important issue, and so I thank not only the Chinese but the South Koreans, the Japanese and the Russians for agreeing to come back to the table with North Korea," Bush said in televised comments.

China has a keen interest in resumption of six-party talks. The North's nuclear test, though of a very low yield, upset regional stability and at least temporarily discredited the talks as an institution.

Beijing also sees the format as a way to burnish its global credentials and remain on Washington's good side. Russia quickly welcomed the North's decision to return to the bargaining table.

"We unambiguously assess the informal meeting itself and the statement on resuming the six-sided negotiations as soon as possible as exceedingly positive," Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Alexeyev told the Russian news agency Interfax. "The six-sided talks have been given a chance."

China Pushes North Korea Back To Table For Nuclear Talks (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin And Calum Macleod

USA Today, November 1, 2006

Economic and political pressure from China was instrumental in prompting North Korea to say it would return to disarmament talks. North Korea's announcement Tuesday eased tensions that had escalated after its first nuclear weapons test three weeks ago.

“I am pleased, and I want to thank the Chinese,” President Bush said. He acknowledged, however, that new talks don't guarantee success.

China provides most of North Korea's fuel, and it sharply cut exports of diesel and heating oil to its impoverished neighbor in September, China's customs administration said. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao would not comment on the shipments. A senior Chinese official, Tang Jiaxuan, visited North Korea Oct. 19 and urged it to return to the negotiations.

The announcement also followed a day of meetings among top U.S., North Korean and Chinese negotiators in Beijing that included a private U.S.-North Korean session. The North Koreans had refused to return to negotiations without direct contact with U.S. officials. The meeting was arranged by China, said Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the lead U.S. negotiator.

An Oct. 14 resolution from the United Nations Security Council barred trade and financial transactions that could aid North Korea's nuclear and missile programs.

It was Chinese involvement, however, that was critical. “Today was a good day in the process of having China and the United States work together on this issue,” Hill said.

The Bush administration has been reluctant to deal directly with North Korea and has insisted on using a group of countries, arguing that they have more leverage. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., hailed Tuesday's developments as a victory for the administration's strategy.

Getting North Korea to the table is a diplomatic success, but negotiations will be tough. Shen Dingli, a Korea expert at Fudan University in Shanghai, said “negotiations will be more difficult” because North Korea will enter them as a “de facto nuclear state.”

Hill cautioned that much work needed to be done to prepare for talks. “We're a long way from our goals here,” he said. “I have not broken out the champagne and cigars yet.”

DOJ_NMG_0089495

Hill said the six-nation negotiations, which include the two Koreas, Japan, Russia, China and the United States, could resume as early as this month or December.

North Korea may have enough radioactive material for a dozen bombs, according to the Institute for Science and International Security, a think tank.

The six-nation talks began in 2003. In September 2005, North Korea agreed to dismantle its nuclear program in return for energy aid and U.S. pledges not to attack the country. North Korea left the talks after rejecting U.S. demands that it eliminate its nuclear program before receiving civilian nuclear reactors.

North Korea was also angered because the U.S. government persuaded a bank in Macau a year ago to freeze $24 million in North Korean funds.

N. Korea Agrees To Six-party Talks (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

North Korea agreed yesterday to return to six-nation talks on its nuclear programs after the United States said it will discuss financial sanctions against Pyongyang on the sidelines of the multilateral talks.

The Bush administration insisted, however, that it and other countries would continue working to implement trade restrictions imposed on the North by a U.N. Security Council resolution last month.

"I'm very pleased with the progress being made in the Far East," President Bush said after the North Koreans told U.S. and Chinese diplomats in Beijing they would end their yearlong boycott of the negotiations. No date was set for the resumption of talks.

The limited breakthrough in efforts to resume the talks was announced by the Chinese Foreign Ministry, which said North Korea had agreed in talks with the United States and China to soon resume the long-stalled six-party talks on its nuclear program. The ministry posted a statement to that effect on its Web site yesterday.

"We'll be sending teams to the region to work with our partners to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced, but also to make sure the talks are effective, that we achieve the results we want," Mr. Bush said.

That goal, he said, is to see the North abandon its pursuit of nuclear weapons "in a verifiable fashion."

The teams the president referred to will be led by State Department officials and will maintain political contacts with countries in Northeast Asia, said department spokesman Sean McCormack. He said the teams would not get involved in the practical daily implementation of Resolution 1718.

The U.N. measure was adopted unanimously by the 15-member council in response to North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test. It bans exports from and imports to the North of illicit materials and equipment that could be used to further its missile and weapons of mass destruction programs.

Mr. McCormack said the Chinese informed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice late last week that the North Koreans had requested a three-way meeting with the United States.

Miss Rice asked Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs and chief negotiator on North Korea, to go to Beijing and meet with his North Korean counterpart, Kim Gye-gwan. Mr. Hill was in Sydney at the time, having stayed in the region after Miss Rice's visit two weeks ago.

"We took a step today toward getting this process back on track. This process has suffered a lot in recent weeks by the actions" of North Korea, Mr. Hill told reporters in Beijing.

Mr. Hill said he first met with the Chinese and North Korean delegations together, and then bilaterally with Mr. Kim.

"I made it very clear that the United States does not accept [North Korea] as a nuclear power, and neither does China," he said.

Mr. Hill agreed to discuss financial penalties imposed on the North last year because of counterfeiting and other illegal activities, but he said Mr. Kim did not ask that those sanctions be lifted before the six-party talks can resume.

The talks also include Japan, South Korea and Russia.

Mr. McCormack said the United States hopes the talks will resume before year's end. The venue, as in the past, will most likely be Beijing, he said.

He also said Washington wants the talks to pick up where they left off at the last meeting in September 2005 -- with a joint statement committing all six countries to the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula.

"North Korea faced a qualitatively different geopolitical environment" after Resolution 1718, which was supported by its benefactor China, Mr. McCormack said. "Implementation of 1718 is going to continue."

Recent reports indicate China has taken a tougher stance toward the North than usual. Chinese trade statistics released Monday showed that China, the reclusive country's main energy supplier, did not sell any crude oil to North Korea in September.

Yesterday's announcement came a week before the U.S. midterm election, and both political parties offered speedy interpretations of the events. Republicans said Pyongyang's decision was a vindication for the Bush administration's rejection of bilateral negotiations. Democrats played down its significance, saying it was a small step forward.

"The announcement that North Korea will return to the six-party talks reinforces how effective the president's response to that crisis has been so far," said House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican.

"It may ultimately be a positive step forward, but it is clearly not sufficient to produce the goal we all want to achieve -- a halt to North Korea's nuclear weapons activities," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

Now Nuclear, North Korea Will Talk (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, November 1, 2006

BEIJING

A surprise three-way meeting between US, Chinese, and North Korean diplomats here Tuesday has likely headed off the possibility of a second nuclear test by Pyongyang in the near future. It has also restored six-nation talks aimed at denuclearizing the Korean peninsula, bringing a modicum of stability to a region rocked Oct. 9 by an atomic blast from the cultish military regime of Kim Jong Il.

Given the bristling anger in northeast Asia after the nuclear blast, analysts say it is salutary that Mr. Kim is returning to the table to talk with his immediate neighbors. Talks could resume by late this month.

At a minimum, China and the US - neither of which anticipated the test - need to be seen in the region to be engaged in efforts to deal with Kim, says Ashton Carter at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government.

Yet most observers doubt that the North, having spent 40 years on its atomic program, is likely to give it up without dramatic achievement. Kim agreed to return to the talks without any "preconditions," including the lifting of US-led financial sanctions.

"There has been no real consensus on the main goal of the six-party talks," says Shi Yinhong of People's University in Beijing, who says that North Korea's return is an attempt to regain "strategic flexibility and undercut the hard-liners in the US.

"Now, North Korea has successfully maneuvered to bring the region back to its former status quo," he adds. "They have relieved the tension generated by the nuclear test; the only difference is that North Korea now has gained a nuclear ability."

It remains unclear what status North Korea will formally enjoy as it returns to an international arena of diplomacy that it walked out of last year. But there seems little doubt Pyongyang expects to think of itself as a bona fide nuclear-status nation as talks resume - and is likely to push others to do so as well.

Such a position is leagues from the kind of dismantlement the six-party talks are based on. "No nation that has tested a nuclear device has ever gone on to give up that device," points out Scott Snyder, a Korean specialist with the Asia Foundation. "South Africa gave up its program without having tested. So if I'm a US diplomat, I've got quite a steep uphill right now."

Some Chinese analysts say that Kim's move back to the table is a victory intended to create an aura of reasonability to his program and nuclear test, and to begin a campaign to win back the good graces of China and South Korea, which he isolated by his surprise test three weeks ago.

China's initial outrage over the North's test was quickly tempered by a lack of practical options to rein in the unpredictable Kim.

But its role in furthering North Korean diplomacy was underscored Tuesday when it served as host to what were apparently seven hours of talks between Chinese and North Korean envoys, and US special envoy Christopher Hill.

In the Oval office, President Bush immediately gave credit to China for playing an effective role. An Oct. 31 New York Times report pointed out that in September, according to Chinese trade statistics, China sold no oil to North Korea, whereas it had been averaging about 12,300 barrels a day prior to this.

On July 4, US time, despite warnings from China, North Korea tested a number of missiles, including a Taepodong 2 ballistic missiles capable of reaching US territory in Alaska.

Reaction from other members of the six-party talks was mixed. South Korea, which supports a policy of engagement, was supportive of the development, as was Russia, which said the news was "extremely positive." Japan, on the other hand, stated that it "does not intend to accept North Korea's return to the talks on the premise that it possesses nuclear weapons."

US envoy Hill also sounded a cautionary note, stating that "we're a long way from our goals here."

News of the return by the North to talks was posted in two sentences on the Chinese Foreign Ministry website at the end of Tuesday. Earlier in the day, Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said that Beijing was not engaged in a policy to cut aid or trade in order to force compliance by North Korea, and denied that a cut in oil signaled such a shift.

China is divided between traditionalists who cherish the revolutionary goals of the mid-20th-century communist spirit, and a more pragmatic and internationally minded new generation.

The Bush administration has long been divided on North Korea between hard- liners who feel that any discussions with a regime that grotesquely violates human rights at a mass level is immoral - and moderates who feel that negotiations are an imperfect but necessary tool.

What North Korea's test of a bomb shows, says Mr. Carter, is that the "six-party talks are a theory that doesn't fit the facts.

"The theory is that the US and China both highly value turning around the North Korean nuclear program," he says. "It turns out that China doesn't value that as highly as the US.

"The US would accept the continued existence of a nonnuclear North Korea," Carter says, but has been unable to achieve this through talks.

A US military official in Seoul argues that "the next round of six-party talks will not have any effect in getting Kim to abandon his nuclear program. But at least he will have to sit at the same table as Russia and China, eye to eye, and hear what his neighbors have to say."

North Korea Talks (WP)

NORTH KOREA'S decision to return to the "six party" negotiations on its nuclear program is, first and foremost, a victory for China and its strategy of preserving Kim Jong Il's totalitarian regime. Whether it will contribute to the cause of dismantling the North's atomic arsenal remains to be seen. Beijing hosts the talks, which also include the United States, South Korea, Russia and Japan; the North's refusal to attend for the past year, while testing a long-range missile and then a nuclear warhead, was an embarrassment to its chief patron. It appears China responded toughly: Though it supplies up to 90 percent of North Korea's oil, none was delivered in September. This blunt use of economic leverage -- if that's what it was -- is encouraging, and yesterday's announcement was evidence that it can get results.

The resumption of talks nevertheless falls well short of a breakthrough in the Bush administration's effort to disarm the Kim dictatorship. We hope Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, who conducted lengthy talks with his North Korean counterpart in recent days, is justified in expecting "substantial progress" from the new round. But history suggests that both North Korea and China may have achieved their objectives simply by making yesterday's announcement. Pyongyang no doubt expects that its attendance will result in the relaxation of whatever pressure China has applied and that South Korea will now hesitate to cut back on its own substantial subsidies. U.S. attempts to strictly apply recently approved U.N. sanctions and organize inspections of North Korean cargo ships might falter. While talks continue, China can deflect further pressure from the United States or Japan for steps that might ultimately destabilize a regime it prefers to preserve.

If Mr. Kim really is prepared to give up his nukes, a path has been laid. A "framework agreement" signed by the six parties more than a year ago called for North Korea to dismantle its program and receive aid and security guarantees in return, including normalization of relations with the United States. Critics who harp on the need for the Bush administration to strike a deal with Mr. Kim tend to overlook the fact that this deal has already been struck. The question is whether North Korea is serious about it or whether it agreed to the plan merely to mollify China and South Korea and buy more time to develop missiles and nuclear warheads. The evidence points to the latter explanation: Within weeks of agreeing, Mr. Kim broke off the talks, citing as a reason U.S. action against offshore bank accounts his government was using for criminal activity, including the massive counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

Mr. Hill said yesterday that the Bush administration had agreed to discuss the financial sanctions at the talks, thereby removing Mr. Kim's excuse. Now both he and his sponsors will be tested. If North Korea really wants to act on the framework agreement, that should quickly become clear: The accord calls for the regime to return "at an early date" to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and the international inspections it requires. If not, China will face a question: Is it willing to use its now proven clout with the North to put an end to its nuclear program -- or only to require that it attend meetings?

Keep The Pressure On North Korea (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

NORTH KOREA'S decision Tuesday to return to six-nation nuclear talks is a big diplomatic victory for Washington, and a bigger one for Beijing. Yet there are good reasons to be skeptical about Pyongyang's motives.

Kim Jong Il is a master at the art of weakening the resolve of diplomatic coalitions, and his decision to engage in talks once again may be nothing more than an attempt to stave off aggressive enforcement of U.N. Security Council sanctions. China and South Korea have in the past hesitated to embrace meaningful sanctions, but Kim faces a more united coalition in the aftermath of his nuclear test. The North Korean dictator may be hoping that his willingness to restart talks will erode Chinese and South Korean determination to stand firm and enforce the sanctions.

Such behavior is typical of rogue states eager to buy time or to capitalize on frictions within opposing coalitions. Saddam Hussein was adept at this game too, and nowadays Iran and Sudan seem to be mimicking Kim. The object is to feign flexibility and a willingness to negotiate in good faith — without actually giving anything up — so that those foreign powers most queasy about violating your sovereignty give up the fight to punish you. That's exactly what North Korea did last year, when it signed a broad framework calling for an end to its nuclear program in exchange for economic incentives, then refuted the agreement almost before the ink was dry.

China's support of sanctions in the aftermath of the nuclear test was a welcome departure from its usual nonintervention posture, though its power to influence its neighbor remains unclear. Much has been made, for example, of the fact that China substantially cut exports of heating oil to North Korea in September, widely seen as retaliation for a missile test in July. Yet that same month, China's exports of gasoline and other fuels rose, and the oil cutoff doesn't seem to have had any effect on Kim; he went ahead with his first nuclear test Oct. 9.

It is unquestionably better to hold talks, even with a suspect partner, than not to hold them at all. But no one — particularly the South Koreans, who have so far refused to join the U.S. effort to interdict ships containing potential materials for weapons of mass destruction — should take the agreement as a reason to avoid tough enforcement of existing sanctions. It's now abundantly clear that the South's attempt to woo Kim's regime with economic incentives and engagement has failed. Strong pressure combined with negotiations constitute the only practical way to curb North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

Rice Urges Major Powers To Speed Up Sanctions On Iran (AFP)

AFP, November 1, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called her major power counterparts in a bid to spur tough negotiations at the United Nations over a sanctions resolution against Iran, a senior US official said.

Rice urged the foreign ministers from the other permanent UN Security Council members -- Britain, China, France and Russia -- to overcome the differences that have prevented agreement on the sanctions package, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said.

"She put forward the proposal that we should try to work extremely hard to get that resolution passed as quickly as possible," Burns said.

"We are working very hard at the UN Security Council to push for a resolution," he said.

Iran faces the sanctions after rejecting an earlier UN resolution demanding it freeze a uranium enrichment program many fear is a cover for developing nuclear weapons.

Earlier another senior US official said North Korea's sudden decision Tuesday to give up its nuclear arsenal in the face of UN sanctions had provided a model for confronting Iran's uranium program.

"The Iranians certainly are watching whether or not the world was going to react to what North Korea did," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, referring to Pyongyang's first test of a nuclear weapon on October 9.

"The (UN) Security Council clearly did act, so I think in that sense it was a lesson for Iran in terms of the will of the international community to act," he said.

Diplomats at UN headquarters in New York meanwhile said another meeting of five veto-wielding Security Council members plus Germany to discuss the Iran sanctions resolution was unlikely to take place before Friday at the earliest.

The six are working on a draft resolution drawn up by Britain, France and Germany urging nuclear and missile-related sanctions against Tehran.

Washington has so far refrained from co-sponsoring the draft in a sign it is seeking tougher measures than those proposed by its European partners.

US officials have notably said they want clear guarantees that a nuclear power station being built in Iran by Russia will not give Tehran access to technology or materials that could be used in a weapons program.

Russia and China, both major trading partners of Iran, are for their part believed to be trying to soften the resolution.

Moscow May Back U.N. Sanctions On Iran (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

AP, November 1, 2006

Two senior Russian officials indicated Tuesday that Moscow could back a draft U.N. Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran, in an apparent sign of the Islamic Republic's growing isolation over its nuclear program.

The comments came after months of Russian opposition to sanctions and suggested that Moscow could reluctantly support punishment as a lever of influence over a stubborn Iran. Just last Thursday, the foreign minister said Moscow was opposed to the resolution being drafted by European powers.

On Tuesday, Yuri Volkov, a deputy speaker of the lower house of parliament, said Russia "will apparently have to join a new resolution on Iran proposed by Britain, Germany and France that envisages limited economic sanctions."

And Igor Ivanov, the head of Russia's presidential Security Council, made comments later that also suggested Moscow could support the draft European resolution.

"Resolutions and sanctions are not a goal in themselves. They are just one of the elements," Ivanov said at a news conference. "And if such a resolution is worked out, it will be first of all one of the elements aimed at assisting political negotiations, because only as a result of political negotiations and dialogue can a concrete result be achieved."

Russia and China, both veto-wielding Security Council members with strong commercial ties to Tehran, have consistently been reluctant to support sanctions. But, separately from the Russian comments, China issued muted criticism of Iran on Tuesday over its standoff with the Security Council.

Asked about the Iranian president's declaration that Tehran would oppose any sanctions, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said "the relevant parties should not take any measures that may lead to the escalation of the situation."

China has recently taken a stronger role in nuclear negotiations more generally, and on Tuesday the U.S. and Chinese governments announced jointly that North Korea had agreed to rejoin six-nation nuclear disarmament talks.

Karen Hughes, the top U.S. envoy for public diplomacy, on Tuesday urged Iran to choose the path of negotiations.

"We're working with our international partners to send a message to Iran that the international community is opposed to Iran obtaining nuclear weapons," Hughes told The Associated Press in Dubai.

DOJ_NMG_0089500

"Sanctions against Iran are being discussed. There is a path for negotiations and we hope they choose that path," she said.

Volkov, the Russian lawmaker, has played a low-key role in the past and made no statements on global politics, although he is in charge of inter-parliamentary contacts with Iran. Like most members of the Duma, he belongs to the Kremlin-controlled United Russia faction.

It was unclear whether Volkov has any access to Kremlin decision-making, but Ivanov is a former foreign minister amd longtime diplomatic insider whose security advisory body answers to President Vladimir Putin.

"Any decision in the Security Council must be aimed not at punishing Iran but at achieving our goals through political means," Ivanov said. The goal, he said, is to preserve Iran's right to peaceful nuclear energy while ensuring it does not develop nuclear weapons.

Ivanov's comments suggested that Russia — which is wary of angering Iran by appearing to join the West in calls for punishment and has warned that harsh measures could scuttle chances for a resolution of the crisis — could cast support for limited sanctions as a path toward further talks.

"Russia continues to call for a political settlement," he said.

His remarks left plenty of room for wrangling in the Security Council, and may have been intended more as a signal to a stubborn Iran that Russia's opposition to sanctions has its limits than as a telegraph of its plans for a council vote.

Volkov said "the Iranian leadership's refusal to freeze uranium enrichment activities and engage in a constructive dialogue with leading global powers leaves no chance for a quick diplomatic solution of the Iranian nuclear problem."

At the same time, he said Russia would continue efforts to encourage talks between Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "so that Iran isn't driven into a corner." He also repeated Russia's firm opposition to any decisions that could lead to the use of military force against Iran.

Moscow has been frustrated in its efforts to persuade Tehran to halt enrichment — including by offering to enrich uranium on Russian soil for a peaceful Iranian nuclear program. But Russian officials have repeatedly warned that harsh punishment could make Iran even more recalcitrant and scuttle the chances for a negotiated solution to the crisis.

Syria Still Arming Hezbollah, Politician Says (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

Syria has continued to funnel arms to the Shi'ite Hezbollah militia in defiance of international demands, thus undermining hopes for peace and stability in Lebanon, a Lebanese political leader said yesterday.

Walid Jumblatt, longtime leader of the minority Druze community, is the most senior Lebanese politician to visit Washington since Israel's inconclusive monthlong war with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon.

The conflict devastated large areas of the country and scrambled Lebanon's already complicated political landscape.

"As long as the Syria-Lebanon border is not being monitored effectively, the flow of weapons will continue and there will be instability," Mr. Jumblatt said in an address to the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

Israeli forces pummeled Hezbollah positions during the war but failed to deliver a knockout blow to the Islamic militia, which has resisted demands from other Lebanese factions and from the United Nations to disarm.

The complaint from Mr. Jumblatt, a key figure in the anti-Syrian coalition that dominates Lebanon's parliament, came a day after John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said at a Security Council meeting that Syria and Iran -- Hezbollah's two main sponsors -- were "actively trying to destabilize the democratically elected government of Lebanon" by re-arming Hezbollah.

Syria has denied the charge.

Israel complains that the Lebanese government and a beefed-up U.N. peacekeeping force now in southern Lebanon have failed to carry out key parts of the accord that ended the fighting in the summer, including disarming Hezbollah and enforcing an arms embargo.

Israeli fighter planes yesterday flew at low altitude over parts of the capital, Beirut, and southern Lebanon to monitor what Israeli defense officials say are continuing violations of the arms embargo by Hezbollah.

Mr. Jumblatt, head of Lebanon's Progressive Socialist Party, has been a central figure in Lebanon's sectarian politics for three decades as the leader of the country's Druze community, an offshoot of Islam. He first supported Syria's military presence in Lebanon but broke with Damascus after the death of Syrian President Hafez Assad in 2000.

He was a key player in the anti-Syrian Cedar Revolution that followed the February 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Many blamed Damascus for the attack, and protests forced Syrian troops to withdraw from Lebanon.

Mr. Jumblatt acknowledged yesterday that the image of Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah had soared in the Arab and Muslim world because of the tough resistance his fighters put up against Israel. But Mr. Jumblatt said demands by Hezbollah and its allies inside Lebanon for more seats in a proposed "national unity government" could backfire.

"We have the majority, not Hezbollah," Mr. Jumblatt said. "If they topple the government, there would be chaos and disorder that could lead anywhere.

"If Nasrallah was ordered by the Syrian regime not to agree to national unity, it is a very risky game he is playing."

Israel Fighter Jets Stage Mock Raids (AP)

By Anna Johnson

AP, November 1, 2006

Israel's fighter jets roared over Hezbollah strongholds Tuesday, staging mock raids in its strongest show of force since its war with the guerrilla group ended more than two months ago.

The flyovers, which startled many Lebanese with fresh memories of the war, highlight the unsettled tensions between Israel and its northern neighbor, whose political situation has grown increasingly more uncertain.

The Israeli fighter jets swooped low over south Beirut at least six times in the morning before soaring back into the sky, Lebanese security officials said. The jets could be heard throughout the city, and residents climbed on roofs and balconies to watch.

One woman on her way to work at a clothing store said her hands were shaking after she heard the warplanes because they brought flashbacks of the Israeli airstrikes that pounded her south Beirut neighborhood during the war.

In south Lebanon, officials and witnesses reported Israeli planes staging mock raids over the towns of Nabatiyeh and Tyre. Eight Israeli jets crossed the border and dispersed over southern and central Lebanon, said the officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to give press statements.

The Lebanese army issued a statement saying its gunners fired anti-aircraft artillery at the planes in south Lebanon to try to drive them away.

An Israeli military official said the flights were part of routine reconnaissance activity.

"It was not to send any message. We do this on a regular basis," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of military regulations.

The mock raids came only hours after U.N. envoy Terje Roed-Larsen told the Security Council that the Lebanese government had reported that arms were being smuggled into Lebanon from Syria since the end of the 34-day Israel-Hezbollah war.

The 34-day fighting left more than 1,000 people dead on both sides, according to the U.N. and Israeli and Lebanese officials. Lebanon's Higher Relief Council, a government group, says the vast majority of those were Lebanese civilians. UNICEF also says most of those killed were civilians, and about a third of them were children.

Of the total deaths, 159 were in Israel, including 39 soldiers.

Israel claimed 800 Hezbollah fighters were killed but that figure was not substantiated, with the group only acknowledging 70 of its fighters were killed.

Lebanon and the U.N. have called on Israel to halt military flights over Lebanese territory, calling them a clear violation of the cease-fire.

Geir Pederson, personal representative in Lebanon of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, expressed concern about the overflights that "constitute a breach of Lebanese sovereignty" and of the U.N. resolution that ended the war.

But Israel contends the flights must continue because arms are still smuggled to Hezbollah, the group has armed personnel in south Lebanon, and the two soldiers whose capture by guerrillas sparked the Israeli offensive have not been released, said Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev.

"In the absence of the implementation of these obligations, Israel is forced to continue intelligence flights over Lebanon to monitor these infringements. If there's not a mechanism to prevent illicit arms transfers, we have to monitor arms transfers. If the Hezbollah presence is not removed, there is a need to observe that presence," he said.

American and European officials have stepped up their demands for Hezbollah to disarm in accordance to the U.N.-brokered cease-fire, but the militant group has repeatedly refused to lay down its arms. The refusal has caused internal struggles as the Lebanese army tries to take control of the south, which has been under Hezbollah's control for decades.

Neither an increased U.N. peacekeeping mission, which currently numbers about 7,300, nor some 15,000 Lebanese troops patrolling a buffer zone in south Lebanon have the mandate or the political will to take Hezbollah's weapons by force.

Tuesday's overflights also came hours before Hezbollah's leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah made a rare televised appearance on the guerrilla group's TV channel Al-Manar in which he said the United States has failed in Iraq and that animosity in the Arab world against Washington should not be blamed on Islamic extremism.

Nasrallah, in his first appearance since speaking at a Sept. 22 "victory" rally in south Beirut, accused the United States of being responsible for continued violence in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said America's plans in the Middle East face "failure, frustration and a state of collapse," and predicted the U.S. would be forced to leave the region "within years, not months."

The U.S. has "no future" in the region, Nasrallah said in a taped interview on Hezbollah's television station Al-Manar. "They will leave the Mideast, Arab and Islamic worlds just as they left Vietnam, and I advise those who are counting on them to draw conclusion from the Vietnam experience."

Blair In Secret Overture To Damascus (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And James Blitz

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister, has launched a secret diplomatic move to prise Syria away from its support for radical Middle East groups and policies.

In an initiative that departs from the US policy of isolating Syria, Mr Blair this week sent Sir Nigel Sheinwald, his most senior foreign policy adviser, to Damascus where he met Bashar al-Assad, the president, and other senior figures in the regime.

Downing Street and the Syrian government confirmed on Tuesday night that Sir Nigel, one of Mr Blair's closest aides, met Mr Assad on Monday.

The UK and Syria have maintained diplomatic relations but Sir Nigel's visit is the most high-level encounter between the UK government and the Assad regime since the Iraq war in 2003. The mission precedes a visit to the region that Mr Blair hopes to make before the year's end.

Downing Street insisted the visit did not mark any change of strategy by the UK towards Syria. The US and the UK continue to believe Mr Assad is backing insurgent groups in Iraq, and meddling in Lebanon and the occupied Palestinian territories – charges Syria denies.

However, Mr Blair – now in the final months of his premiership – wishes to use these "back channel" talks to test whether the Syrian regime is serious about seeking to play a constructive role in Middle East peace negotiations with Israel. Britain would also like to see Syria rethink its close alliance with Iran.

Mr Blair once placed high hopes on the British-educated Mr Assad but the UK has found Syria an unwilling ally in its Middle East goals. Damascus has backed the Hamas leaders who have been accused of obstructing plans for a Palestinian national unity government.

In Beirut, Lebanese officials say Syria is supplying arms to Lebanon's Hizbollah and working to undermine its government.

The initiative puts Britain out of step with current Bush administration thinking, though the US said it had been advised in advance of Mr Sheinwald's visit.

DOJ_NMG_0089503

The US pulled its ambassador out of Damascus last year. But a congressional committee headed by James Baker, a former secretary of state, is now looking at US options in Iraq and may recommend renewed contact with Syria over Iraq's future.

Engagement with Syria became fashionable again this summer during the month-long conflict between Israel and Hizbollah. European officials have been arguing for engagement to try to move Damascus away from its alliance with Tehran.

Western relations with Syria reached a new low last year after the assassination of Rafiq Hariri, Lebanon's former prime minister and an opponent of Syria. A United Nations probe is looking at Syria's alleged role in the killing.

International pressure forced Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon and left it isolated, even within the Arab world.

Politicians in Beirut say Damascus will demand the dropping of the UN investigation in return for changing its foreign policies – a price the west may find too high.

The US and UK continue to insist that Syria live up to its obligations under three UN Security Council resolutions concerning Lebanon, a US official said.

"We remain deeply concerned by indications that Syria is seeking to destabilise Lebanon's democratically elected government," the official added.

Israel Defense Minister Eyes Arab Plan (AP-Y)

By Aron Heller

AP, November 1, 2006

Israel's defense minister said Tuesday that a dormant Saudi initiative for Mideast peace could be a "basis for negotiation," indicating a new possibility for talks with the Palestinians after years of stalemate.

The Saudi plan calls for a comprehensive peace between Israel and the Arab world, based on a complete Israeli withdrawal from lands it captured in the 1967 Mideast war — the West Bank, Gaza Strip, east Jerusalem and Golan Heights.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz said he was not endorsing the plan. But he was the most senior Israeli official even to publicly consider it.

"We could see the Saudi initiative as the basis for negotiation. This does not mean that we are adopting the Saudi initiative, but it can serve as a basis," Peretz said at an academic conference at Tel Aviv University.

The Saudi initiative was adopted at an Arab League summit in Beirut, Lebanon, in March 2002. For the first time, it offered Israel normal relations with the entire Arab world in exchange for a complete withdrawal from captured territory.

Israel reacted skeptically at the time, rejecting an addition by Saudi Arabia requiring Israel to recognize the demand to take back Palestinian refugees from the 1948-49 war that followed creation of the Jewish state, as well as their descendants — an estimated 4 million people.

Israel has offered compensation instead, maintaining that demanding a "right of return" is a way of undermining the Jewish character of the state and destroying it from within.

Israel also questioned the meaning of "normal relations" and rejected a total withdrawal from all the territories.

In various unsuccessful rounds of peace talks, Israel has offered an almost complete pullout from the West Bank and Golan Heights, and last year it withdrew unilaterally from the Gaza Strip. However, it maintains that the pre-1967 cease-fire lines are not a border, and it wants to adjust the line to include main West Bank Jewish settlement blocks in Israel.

At the time, Israel asked Saudi Arabia to send an envoy to clarify the proposal, but that did not happen.

In 2003, the Saudi initiative was overtaken by the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, which called for establishment of a Palestinian state in a three-stage process and mentioned the Saudi initiative as part of the basis for the solution.

However, the plan was frozen from the outset when neither side implemented its initial steps. Israel failed to dismantle dozens of unauthorized West Bank settlement outposts, and the Palestinians declined to disarm violent groups.

Peace moves have been stalled since 2000, when the outbreak of Palestinian violence followed a failed summit meeting of Israeli and Palestinian leaders in the United States.

Israel's official position has been that the "road map" is the only plan on the table now, but Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev indicated the Saudi plan could be the basis for talks.

"Israel has never accepted the Saudi initiative but would see positive elements in the initiative, particularly the call for reconciliation and the call for establishing normalized realizations between Israel and her Arab neighbors," Regev told The Associated Press.

Though Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's election platform this year called for a unilateral Israeli pullout from much of the West Bank, he shelved the proposal in the aftermath of the unpopular, inconclusive war with Lebanese Hezbollah guerrillas in the summer.

The addition this week of an ultra-hawkish party to shore up Olmert's governing coalition made a new peace drive unlikely.

In violence Tuesday, Israeli troops shot and killed three Hamas militants in the Gaza Strip as the army pressed ahead with a 4-month-old offensive, Palestinian officials said.

Israel has indicated it would expand its offensive, aiming to stop arms smuggling through tunnels from Egypt to Gaza and rocket fire by Palestinian militants at Israeli towns and villages.

Pause For Peace (NYT)

By Ahmed Yousef

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

Gaza

HERE in Gaza, few dream of peace. For now, most dare only to dream of a lack of war. It is for this reason that Hamas proposes a long-term truce during which the Israeli and Palestinian peoples can try to negotiate a lasting peace.

A truce is referred to in Arabic as a "hudna." Typically covering 10 years, a hudna is recognized in Islamic jurisprudence as a legitimate and binding contract. A hudna extends beyond the Western concept of a cease-fire and obliges the parties to use the period to seek a permanent, nonviolent resolution to their differences. The Koran finds great merit in such efforts at promoting understanding among different people. Whereas war dehumanizes the enemy and makes it easier to kill, a hudna affords the opportunity to humanize one's opponents and understand their position with the goal of resolving the intertribal or international dispute.

Such a concept — a period of nonwar but only partial resolution of a conflict — is foreign to the West and has been greeted with much suspicion. Many Westerners I speak to wonder how one can stop the violence without ending the conflict.

I would argue, however, that this concept is not as foreign as it might seem. After all, the Irish Republican Army agreed to halt its military struggle to free Northern Ireland from British rule without recognizing British sovereignty. Irish Republicans continue to aspire to a united Ireland free of British rule, but rely upon peaceful methods. Had the I.R.A. been forced to renounce its vision of reuniting Ireland before negotiations could occur, peace would never have prevailed. Why should more be demanded of the Palestinians, particularly when the spirit of our people will never permit it?

When Hamas gives its word to an international agreement, it does so in the name of God and will therefore keep its word. Hamas has honored its previous cease-fires, as Israelis grudgingly note with the oft-heard words, "At least with Hamas they mean what they say."

This offer of hudna is no ruse, as some assert, to strengthen our military machine, to buy time to organize better or to consolidate our hold on the Palestinian Authority. Indeed, faith-based political movements in Algeria, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Malaysia, Morocco, Turkey and Yemen have used hudna-like strategies to avoid expanding conflict. Hamas will conduct itself just as wisely and honorably.

We Palestinians are prepared to enter into a hudna to bring about an immediate end to the occupation and to initiate a period of peaceful coexistence during which both sides would refrain from any form of military aggression or provocation. During this period of calm and negotiation we can address the important issues like the right of return and the release of prisoners. If the negotiations fail to achieve a durable settlement, the next generation of Palestinians and Israelis will have to decide whether or not to renew the hudna and the search for a negotiated peace.

There can be no comprehensive solution of the conflict today, this week, this month, or even this year. A conflict that has festered for so long may, however, be resolved through a decade of peaceful coexistence and negotiations. This is the only sensible alternative to the current situation. A hudna will lead to an end to the occupation and create the space and the calm necessary to resolve all outstanding issues.

Few in Gaza dream. For most of the past six months it's been difficult to even sleep. Yet hope is not dead. And when we dare to hope, this is what we see: a 10-year hudna during which, inshallah (God willing), we will learn again to dream of peace.

US Launches Review Of Stalled Policy On Ending Darfur Violence (AFP)

AFP, November 1, 2006

President George W. Bush announced a review of US policy on the Darfur crisis as Sudan persists in refusing the deployment of UN peacekeepers to halt catastrophic violence in the region.

The United States was a principal backer of a United Nations resolution in August demanding the deployment of some 20,000 UN peacekeepers to Darfur, where at least 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million left homeless during three years of civil war.

But the government of President Omar al-Beshir has rejected the peacekeepers and rebuffed a recent initiative to break the deadlock by Bush's personal envoy for Darfur, Andrew Natsios.

Meeting with Natsios at the White House Tuesday, Bush said the diplomat had delivered a "grim report" about the humanitarian situation in Darfur, where government-armed Arab militia have been blamed for much of the violence against civilians.

"The United States is going to work with the international community to come up with a single plan on how to address this issue and save lives," Bush said.

He provided few details, other than to insist that the plan would include deployment of a "credible and effective international force to go into Darfur to save lives".

"The government of Sudan must understand that we're serious," he said.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution on August 31 calling for the deployment of 20,000 peacekeepers to replace an under-funded African Union (AU) contingent of 7,000 that has failed to end violence which the US has called genocide.

The conflict began in 2003 with rebellion by Darfur's mainly black African population seeking autonomy from the Arab-dominated government in Khartoum.

The government responded by arming Arab militia known as the Janjaweed, who have destroyed hundreds of villages in a scorched-earth policy.

Beshir's regime has consistently rejected the deployment of UN forces, charging that the plan was part of a US-engineered plot to invade his country and plunder its resources.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said that following up on Natsios's mission to Khartoum, the Bush administration was mulling "what new or different policy proposals we might make" to end the deadlock.

He declined to provide details, but said discussions were going on both within the US administration, and with Washington's international partners, including Arab states with influence in Khartoum.

"What all that does is underscore the fact that we want to try to get something done on this issue," he said. "There's too much suffering going on there."

Westerners' Arrests Put Yemen On Spot (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The arrests in Yemen of six Westerners said to be members of al Qaeda has highlighted concerns that the region remains a "transmission belt" for Islamic converts looking for a way to join jihadi terrorist groups.

But analysts caution that the facts of the case remain murky and warned that Yemenis had many reasons to try to burnish their counterterrorism credentials by exaggerating the importance of the arrests.

Authorities in Yemen told local reporters over at the weekend that they arrested three Australians, a Dane, a German, a Briton and two other foreigners Oct. 16 and charged them with trying to smuggle weapons to Islamic militias in neighboring Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0089506

"Preliminary investigations indicate that they are members of al Qaeda," an Interior Ministry official said in a statement carried by the state-run news agency, Saba.

A U.S. intelligence official agreed in an interview, saying, "This was a pretty good wrap-up of a group of bad guys."

U.S. and European counterterrorism officials have long been concerned about the possible terrorist recruitment of people with European or Australian nationality. They can travel much more freely than recruits from Middle Eastern nations.

The concern is accentuated in chaotic, failing states such as Yemen, where intelligence gathering and interdiction are more difficult.

Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer told the Australian Parliament on Monday that two of the men were native-born Australians, while the third was a Polish-born immigrant who had become an Australian citizen in the 1980s.

No information was immediately available about the other suspects, but the Yemen Times, citing unidentified sources, reported that the eight were all students at the Al-Iman religious university in the capital Sana'a, headed by Sheik Abd al-Majid al-Zindani.

Al-Zindani has been named a "Specially Designated Global Terrorist" by the U.S. Treasury Department, which said he had "a long history of working with [al Qaeda leader Osama] bin Laden, notably serving as one of his spiritual leaders."

Karin Von Hippel, a former U.N. official and regional analyst, told UPI that there were well-documented arms transfers to Somalia from Yemen.

"It is very plausible that Islamic extremists in Yemen might be trying to get arms" to the Islamic Courts Union, the umbrella group for Islamic militias that have seized control of most of Somalia.

Bernard Haykel, professor of Islamic law and history at New York University and a Yemen analyst, added that Yemen had in the past served as a "transmission belt country," for jihadist recruitment of Westerners, but many come to learn Arabic and study the Koran legitimately.

"The [Yemeni] government has a history of trying to prove they are hunting al Qaeda," he said, however, in reality they have an arrangement with the group. "As long as they don't stage attacks in Yemen, they are left alone."

The U.S. intelligence official said the arrests were appropriate. "This was not for show," the official said.

The Yemeni government was embarrassed in February when 13 al Qaeda militants including the leaders of the attacks on the USS Cole and the French oil tanker Limburg were among 23 inmates who escaped by tunneling out of their prison to a nearby mosque.

Egypt Sends Sadat's Nephew To Prison For Defaming Military (NYT)

By Jano Charbel And Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 31 — Talaat el-Sadat, the nephew of President Anwar el-Sadat and an opposition member of Parliament, was sentenced by a military court on Tuesday to one year in prison on charges that he defamed the military by essentially blaming it for having a hand in his uncle's death.

The case, while attracting less attention than the trial of a former presidential candidate, Ayman Nour, who is serving a five-year prison term on charges widely viewed as politically motivated, comes as Egyptian authorities have shown less and less tolerance for critical opposition.

With increasing frequency, members of the Muslim Brotherhood, a banned Islamic organization that amounts to the only organized political opposition in Egypt, have been arrested and held without charge under a law intended to fight terrorism.

In Mr. Sadat's case, he was stripped of parliamentary immunity on a national holiday by the speaker of Parliament, Fathi Sorour, a prominent member of the governing National Democratic Party.

The papers stripping Mr. Sadat of his immunity were signed the day after his appearance on a satellite television show, an action the speaker has said was perfectly legal.

On Tuesday, a military judge, Brig. Gen. Abbas Attiya al-Nagdy, sentenced Mr. Sadat to a year in jail after a six-day trial. Mr. Sadat was convicted of defaming the armed forces, of spreading false information and of suggesting that the government never executed President Sadat's assassin, Khaled el-Islambolli, and instead conspired to let him go free.

"Talaat el-Sadat is a victim," said Mohammad Abdel Wahab, one of his defense lawyers who also served on the team that defended Mr. Nour. "He was targeted because he is a popular opposition figure who received a staggering 33,000 votes during the last parliamentary elections."

Government and party officials said the case had nothing to do with politics and was based solely on comments Mr. Sadat made on satellite television in which, among other things, he blamed the military for negligence in his uncle's assassination.

"This guy is a loose cannon; he is a populist and he enjoys being a celebrity," Muhammad Kamal, a member of the upper house of Parliament and a frequent spokesman for the governing party, said in an interview when the trial began. He added, "If someone claimed that Bush was behind Sept. 11, this would be investigated. So what is happening is normal."

Mr. Sadat, the often outlandish and outspoken son of President Sadat's half-brother, Esmat, has long been a harsh critic of the governing party and has a reputation for espousing outrageous conspiracy theories, including charges that his uncle was killed as part of an international plot.

But he also has caused deep embarrassment to powerful figures — from leaders of the governing National Democratic Party, whom he publicly accused of corruption, to the Interior Ministry, which he showed at his trial had arrested the wrong person in connection with the killing of 10 people.

A group of Egyptian human rights groups have criticized the decision to bring a civilian before a closed military court and what they said was a violation of his freedom of speech.

Others have said the decision to prosecute Mr. Sadat — regardless of how outrageous his comments may have been — should be viewed as part of a broad political suppression in the country.

"The message is that no one is immune, not journalists, not judges, not parliamentarians," said Wael el-Ebrashi, editor in chief of Sawt el Umma, a weekly independent newspaper.

Mr. Ebrashi will himself face trial next month for printing a list of judges whom his newspaper accused of helping to rig parliamentary elections last year.

During those elections, government security forces surrounded polling places, beating and shooting would-be voters, in an effort to prevent opposition candidates from winning. Even so, independent candidates affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood won 88 seats out of 454 in Parliament.

Egypt's political elite is in a state of anxiety. The president, Hosni Mubarak, is 78, and while there is no clear successor in sight, it appears the president has begun to hand the reins of state over to his son, Gamal Mubarak. At the same time, regional crises — from the war between Lebanon and Israel to the rise of Iran as a regional power — have further undermined the leadership's credibility on the street, political analysts said.

In that environment, the leadership has taken a harder line with its critics.

The United States at one time talked about Egypt as leading the way toward democratic reform in the Middle East. But with the chaos in the region, and the political uncertainty in Egypt, officials in Egypt said the United States had dropped all pressure to make democratic reforms.

Leaders of the governing party, like the younger Mubarak and Mr. Kamal, have said the party intended to move forward with democratic reforms.

Mr. Sorour, for example, announced Tuesday that Parliament would move forward with a plan to amend the Constitution to ensure that in the next presidential election there will be candidates from more than just the governing party.

However, critics, including those within the party, say the plan for making it easier to get opposition members on the ballot is insufficient, because after years of political atrophy there are no credible or effective opposition parties.

The new law is expected to do nothing to pave the way for independent candidates to get on the ballot, which would mean those affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood would be shut out.

Mr. Sadat was taken into custody straight from the courtroom in northeastern Cairo.

He is not allowed to appeal and his only recourse would be to ask President Mubarak for a pardon.

He was also fined about $35.

Security Council Seat Tied To Aid (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0089508

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- Republican and Democratic administrations have insisted for decades they do not engage in the grubby vote-buying practices that are common in elections for key U.N. posts.

Yet poor countries that serve on the influential Security Council typically receive substantially more U.S. aid dollars and find it easier to obtain loans or grants from financial institutions that are strongly influenced by the United States and other economic powerhouses, according to recent academic studies.

Officials from the United States and several international agencies questioned the findings, insisting that they direct assistance on the basis of need, not in pursuit of votes on the Security Council. They said there are scores of factors that drive the distribution of loans and aid budgets that the research did not consider.

Still, the findings underscore the importance the United States places on cultivating even the weakest members of the Security Council, the lone international body with the power to impose universally binding economic sanctions and grant legitimacy to military adventures. They also suggest a possible price tag.

A two-year seat on the Security Council, for instance, can generate a 59 percent spike in U.S. assistance, according to a study by two Harvard University scholars that tracked U.S. economic and military assistance from 1946 to 2001. In times of crisis, U.S. aid to some member countries has increased by as much as 170 percent. Those aid levels tend to recede after the country leaves the 15-nation council.

United Nations aid agencies such as the Children's Fund, which has always been headed by a U.S. national, have also directed extra money toward disadvantaged children from countries that serve on the U.N. council, the study shows. In an important year, defined as a period that has attracted intensive news coverage, council members experienced a 63 percent increase in overseas development assistance, the study found.

"On average the typical developing country serving on the council can anticipate an additional $16 million from the United States and $1 million from the U.N.," wrote Harvard economics graduate student Ilyana Kuziemko and Eric Werker, an assistant professor at the Harvard Business School. "During important years, these numbers rise to $45 million from the U.S. and $8 million from the U.N."

Kuziemko said the study did not uncover "smoking gun" proof that the United States has used aid to buy influence. But she said the investigation uncovered a statistical pattern "that is very consistent with vote buying."

A UNICEF spokesman, Geoffrey Keele, challenged the report's conclusions. He said the U.N. agency's "funding is always based on very basic indicators of children's health."

Keele presented a chart showing that funding for some countries on the council increased while that for others declined. He said assistance to Congo -- which received more than a doubling of U.S. contributions through UNICEF -- increased because a 2003 peace accord provided greater international access to a country already desperately needing help.

A review by The Washington Post of the U.S. Agency for International Development's "greenbook," which compiles figures on U.S. economic and military assistance, showed a more nuanced picture in the year leading up to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003, a period of intense diplomatic activity in the Security Council.

U.S. economic aid to Angola nearly doubled from $81.6 million in 2001 to $160.5 million in 2003, before dropping by more than $40 million in 2004. Assistance to Cameroon more than tripled, from $5 million in 2001 to $16 million in 2003, before falling by about $3.5 million in 2004.

But U.S. aid to Guinea dropped by $10 million during the same period. Bulgaria, a close U.S. ally in Eastern Europe, got less U.S. economic assistance but registered a doubling of U.S. military aid in 2003.

The U.S. mission to the United Nations and USAID declined requests to comment on the findings. Former U.S. officials insist, though, that the U.S. delegation has sought to steer clear of vote buying.

"I'm not aware of the United States actively molding its aid relationship based on upcoming votes," said Peter Burleigh, the acting U.S. ambassador to the United Nations in 1998 and 1999.

Burleigh said countries seeking membership on the council will often increase their own aid contributions "as a kind of sweetener" for potential supporters. During the 1990s, Iraq and Kuwait frequently stepped up aid or trade pledges on the eve of critical votes in the Security Council.

"Usually we give aid because there is need rather than because in fact we want to try to buy somebody," said Thomas R. Pickering, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations during the Persian Gulf War. But he said that politics can sometimes creep into U.S. calculations on aid and that membership on the council may tip the balance in favor of a country under consideration for aid.

Pickering recalled then-Secretary of State James A. Baker III telling Yemen, after it voted against a U.S.-backed resolution authorizing the 1991 war, that "it was the most expensive vote they'd ever cast, when in fact their assistance disappeared."

The largesse has extended to U.N. financial institutions, primarily the International Monetary Fund, where the United States holds sway. Romania, Zimbabwe, Ecuador and other countries that frequently backed resolutions sanctioning Iraq for its 1990 invasion of Kuwait received sizable IMF loans, according to a study by a political scientist and two scholars at a Swiss university.

Tanzania and Gabon, meanwhile, did not receive an IMF loan in the first 15 and 18 years, respectively, after their independence. That changed after they announced their bid to join the Security Council in the 1970s, a Chicago University study shows.

Tanzania, which launched its campaign for a council seat in 1974, received more than $10 million in loans in 1974 and 1975. The East African government voted alongside the IMF's most influential members -- the United States, Japan, Britain and France -- on every resolution in 1975.

The relationship grew rockier after Tanzania showed a streak of independence in its voting record in 1976, when it supported resolutions condemning aggression against Angola by U.S. Cold War ally South Africa and calling for Indonesia to withdraw from East Timor. The IMF subsequently declined to disburse more than $10 million in additional funds for Tanzania.

IMF spokesman William Murry said that "the evidence is anecdotal and circumstantial," and that the authors did not adequately consider other possible explanations for the loans.

For instance, he said, Tanzanian loans were driven in large part by the oil crisis after the Arab oil embargo. He said the IMF's support of Romania owed more to the fact the former East Bloc country was looking to the West for help after the Soviet Union's collapse.

China Acts To Reduce High Rate Of Executions (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 31 — Responding to domestic and international criticism of its extensive use of capital punishment, China adopted new rules on Tuesday requiring review of all death sentences by the Supreme People's Court, state news media reported.

The move, which goes into effect on Jan. 1, restores a power that was stripped from the Supreme Court in 1983 and given to provincial courts as part of a major crackdown on crime. The authorities are facing mounting criticism from human rights groups and Chinese legal scholars for what they say is the widespread and arbitrary use of the death penalty.

China executes more people every year than all other nations combined, by some Chinese estimates, up to 10,000 a year. Chinese courts have been embarrassed in recent years by a number of executions of people who were later proved innocent.

China's legislature, the National People's Congress, approved the amendment to the law, which "is believed to be the most important reform of capital punishment in China in more than two decades," the official New China News Agency said in a brief report.

The state news media have estimated that the number of executions could drop by as much as 30 percent under the new system, though they have not said how they arrived at that figure.

Human rights groups welcomed the change, saying it was likely to lead to fewer executions, but they urged the authorities to take further action. "I think this is a positive step, but it falls well short of what is needed," said Nicholas Bequelin, a researcher for Human Rights Watch who is based in Hong Kong.

Chinese political leaders strongly defend capital punishment as an essential tool to fight crime and preserve social order in a country of 1.3 billion that is undergoing wrenching economic and social changes. The authorities also argue that the death penalty is an important deterrent to official corruption, which has emerged as a major threat to the reputation of the governing Communist Party.

However, legal experts say that as living standards rise and China becomes an important international power, the country's senior leadership is uncomfortable that the death penalty is so readily applied.

They say the reform can also be seen as part of President Hu Jintao's commitment to "build a harmonious society," which covers a range of social concerns, including pollution, growing inequality and access to education and health care. The public has long chafed under a legal system that is widely perceived as favoring the wealthy and politically connected.

China does not disclose the number of executions it carries out under the criminal code, where almost 70 offenses carry the death penalty.

Citing publicly available reports, Amnesty International estimates that at least 1,770 people were executed in 2005 — more than 80 percent of the world's total — and 3,900 were sentenced to death. In 2004, Amnesty said, 3,400 were executed in China out of 3,797 it documented in the world that year.

Local courts had been given the power to impose the death penalty by Deng Xiaoping, who was angry about a wave of crime and corruption that threatened his economic reform program, which was still in its infancy. From the early 1980s until now, they have operated with virtually no oversight, a situation that has led to the widespread and, legal experts say, indiscriminate use of capital punishment.

In a report on Sept. 21, Amnesty said shortcomings in the legal system for people sentenced to death included a lack of prompt access to lawyers, the absence of the presumption of innocence, political interference in the courts and the use of evidence obtained by torture.

"No one who is sentenced to death in China receives a fair trial in line with international human rights standards," Amnesty said in the report.

The Chinese authorities have already recruited 200 judges for the top court and opened new courtrooms to handle the extra work arising from the change, according to the Chinese news reports.

Some Chinese legal scholars say lower courts will now have to be more careful in imposing the death penalty, handing down more long prison terms instead to avoid the scrutiny of the high court.

Human rights groups and supporters of legal change in China are now urging the government to introduce more sweeping changes, including the establishment of an independent judiciary.

"So far, the leadership is not willing to take on real reform," Mr. Bequelin said.

P. W. Botha, Defender Of Apartheid, Is Dead (NYT)

By Joseph R. Gregory

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

P. W. Botha, the South African leader who struggled vainly to preserve apartheid rule in a tide of domestic racial violence and global condemnation, died yesterday at his home in South Africa. He was 90.

His death was reported by The South African Press Association in Cape Town, quoting the security staff at Mr. Botha's home on the southern Cape coast.

Mr. Botha was a combative, irascible son of a well-to-do Afrikaner farm family who dropped out of college to work for the right-wing National Party, then rose through the ranks of South Africa's political establishment, gaining a reputation as the "Old Crocodile" for his ability to charm, outwit and crush his opponents.

In 1978, Mr. Botha became prime minister and proceeded to engineer the creation of a new Constitution, one that held out the promise of limited reform of apartheid policies. When the Constitution came into effect in 1984, Mr. Botha became president. "We must adapt or die," Mr. Botha told his constituents after becoming prime minister.

But the Constitution only roiled the battle over race. Though it allowed Asians and people of mixed race to be represented in a white-controlled Parliament, it continued to exclude the nation's black majority. Some apartheid laws, like a prohibition on mixed marriages and a requirement that blacks carry special passes, were relaxed. But the measures only fueled the anger of apartheid's opponents. One opposition leader, Frederik van Zyl Slabbert, said Mr. Botha's reforms were the political equivalent of rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic.

Holding out the promise that apartheid would eventually be dismantled, he opened negotiations with Nelson Mandela, the imprisoned leader of the African National Congress. The talks went nowhere, and Mr. Mandela remained confined.

At the same time, Mr. Botha, who first achieved national prominence as secretary of defense, gave the police and military unprecedented power. His government repressed dissent, encouraged rivalries among Zulu, Xhosa and other tribes and ethnic groups, and tried to destabilize neighboring countries opposed to the system of white rule.

Mr. Botha used the climate of the cold war to justify his actions. He portrayed a growing Marxist threat in southern Africa and warned that Communists had infiltrated the anti-apartheid movement at home. South Africa, he said, was engaged in a "total war" and must develop a "total strategy" to fight the battle.

As opposition to apartheid spread, Mr. Botha's room to maneuver shrank. "He was caught in a bind between wanting to show the international community that he was not inflexible, and not wishing to appear weak within his own country," the journalist Allister Sparks wrote in his 1995 account of the end of apartheid, "Tomorrow Is Another Country: The Inside Story of South Africa's Road to Change."

Yet for a while Mr. Botha's methods seemed to belie Alexis de Toqueville's dictum that "the most perilous moment for bad government is when it seeks to mend its ways." Mr. Botha was re-elected in 1987. Two years later, as opposition to his intransigent style grew within his own party, the president suffered a stroke and resigned. He was succeeded by F. W. de Klerk, who legalized opposition parties, freed Mr. Mandela and other political prisoners, and made the agreements that eventually brought apartheid down.

Pieter Willem Botha was born on Jan. 12, 1916, in the Orange Free State to a Afrikaner farm family with deep roots in southern Africa's "White Tribe" — descendants of mainly Dutch settlers who had been living on the continent's southern tip for more than three centuries.

Beleaguered, stubborn and insular, they saw themselves as heirs to a promised land watered with the blood of their ancestors in wars against Zulu, Ndebele and other tribes.

The Afrikaners and the British, with their imperial aims, were also old enemies, rivals for land, diamonds and gold. Their enmity culminated in the Boer War of 1899-1901, which ended in a British victory and the eventual consolidation of the country under the empire. Mr. Botha's father fought the British, who burned his mother's family farm. She and her family fled but were eventually captured and interned. Their experiences forged their son's attitudes. Raised in the traditions of the Bible and the gun, he learned to ride and shoot and to embrace the embattled but beneficent self-image of the Afrikaner.

"I grew up on a farm where I came to know black people very well," Mr. Botha told Joseph Lelyveld of The New York Times in an interview in Mr. Lelyveld's 1985 book "Move Your Shadow: South Africa, Black and White." "I played with them, I worked with them. I was taught by my father to be strict with them, but just."

As World War II approached, tensions mounted among those who believed that South Africa should side with Britain, those who advocated neutrality and those who sympathized with the Nazis. Mr. Botha sided with the last, joining the right-wing Afrikaner nationalists in the Ossewabrandwag, or Ox Wagon Fire Guard, which was closely related to Daniel F. Malan's Reunited National Party. A paramilitary group within the Guard, modeled after the Nazi Brownshirts, agitated against the pro-Allied government of Jan Christian Smuts.

But Mr. Botha, who in 1935 had left the University of the Orange Free State to become an organizer for the Nationalists, did not like the Guard's "emphasis on national socialism instead of Christian nationalism," a South African biographer, Brian Pottinger, wrote in 1988 in "The Imperial Presidency: P. W. Botha, the First 10 Years." "With some courage and a fine nose for the prevailing wind," Mr. Pottinger wrote, Mr. Botha publicly condemned the Ossewabrandwag, charging it with "interference" in national politics.

By 1944, with Allied victory looming in Europe, the Guard had become an embarrassment to Mr. Malan, and he banned National Party members from associating with it.

A year earlier, Mr. Botha married Anna Elizabeth Rossouw, who went by the name Elise and who died in 1977. They had two sons, Rossouw and Pieter Willem, and three daughters, Elanza, Amelia and Rozanne. He married Barbara Robertson in 1998.

In the postwar years, economic and social uncertainty eroded the popular base of the Smuts government, which had advocated a comparatively liberal approach toward race relations. In the 1948 general election, Mr. Malan's Nationalists, campaigning on a platform of white supremacy and racial segregation, were swept to power. Mr. Botha, who had become secretary of the party's National Youth League in 1946, won a seat in Parliament.

Over the next six years under Mr. Malan's leadership, the foundations of the apartheid state were laid. The Nationalists enforced segregation on almost all aspects of South African life. They passed laws prohibiting mixed marriages and extramarital sex between races and regulated almost all other social relations. Freedom of movement was limited: most blacks were required to carry passbooks. And "independent" homelands, or tribe-based states, were created to make the various African ethnic groups easier to control.

Throughout the 1950s there were protests and other forms of passive resistance. In 1960, about 70 protesters were killed and nearly 200 wounded when the police opened fire on a demonstration in Sharpeville, near Johannesburg. The climate changed after that.

Within the African National Congress, founded in 1912 to advance the cause of blacks, the leadership diverged, with men like Nelson Mandela advocating violent opposition to the racist state. By 1970, many anti-apartheid leaders, including Mr. Mandela, were either in jail or living in exile.

Meanwhile, Mr. Botha rose through the government ranks. In 1961, he became the minister of colored affairs; in 1966, minister of defense. His rise coincided with the country's deepening political isolation. In 1961, South Africa left the Commonwealth of Nations, as other members strongly criticized apartheid policies. As the country's neighbors achieved independence from colonial rule in the 1960s and '70s, many cut off diplomatic, cultural and commercial ties with South Africa.

In 1974, the United Nations took away South Africa's seat in the General Assembly. Three years later, it imposed a weapons embargo. In the West, particularly in the United States, debate over imposing trade sanctions on South Africa reached a fever pitch.

But the disciples of apartheid hung tough. Huge reserves of gold and diamonds fueled the Afrikaners' ability to circumvent economic embargoes and political sanctions. As defense minister, Mr. Botha increased military spending to 20 percent of the budget, conducted a clandestine weapons trade with Israel and other states and pushed for the development of nuclear weapons.

In the early 1980s, Mr. Botha's government carried out military strikes on forces of the African National Congress and other insurgent groups in neighboring countries where they had taken sanctuary. Air and ground forces struck at targets in Angola, and South African commandos conducted raids in Botswana, Lesotho, Mozambique, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

South African forces also equipped and trained rebel movements against the left-leaning governments that had taken power in the former Portuguese colonies of Angola and Mozambique. Moreover, under the direction of the State Security Council, created in 1972, Mr. Botha's government carried out a program to murder anti-apartheid activists.

Racial violence and political protests continued to rise. Increasing numbers of white South Africans joined anti-apartheid demonstrations. Although Mr. Botha had come to power with the pledge to uphold apartheid as well as improve race relations, the two goals were mutually exclusive. Despite a seeming willingness to relax some apartheid laws, he remained adamant in his refusal to grant blacks political power.

The situation deteriorated. Police stations and other government installations were attacked. In 1985, the government announced an indefinite state of emergency. In 1986, the Anglican anti-apartheid campaigner Archbishop Desmond Tutu addressed the United Nations and urged further sanctions against South Africa.

Mr. Botha grew defiant. "We are not a nation of jellyfish," he declared in a party speech in 1986. An aide, Hendrik Jacobus Coetsee, recalled: "The Old Crocodile was obsessed with looking tough and in control. He never wanted to show any sign of weakness."

DOJ_NMG_0089513

But even within the Botha government, pressure was growing for negotiations with the African National Congress. Clandestine overtures were made to Mr. Mandela, who had been in prison since 1963. The Botha government, hoping to appear reasonable to the world, was looking for a way to free Mr. Mandela without appearing weak to its own Afrikaner constituency.

In March 1989, Mr. Mandela offered to negotiate a political settlement, reversing the Congress's commitment to overthrowing the white government by force. Mr. Botha, who had had a stroke that January, replied that the two men should meet. They did so on July 5, 1989. In the end, the encounter turned out to be little more than a courtesy call. "Yet, in some subtle way a line had been crossed," Mr. Sparks wrote. "After that there was no stopping the process. It was just a matter of time and the man."

Mr. Botha's days in office were numbered. Increasingly ill-tempered and authoritarian, he remained reluctant to move on with reform. In February 1989, a month after his stroke, for reasons that are unclear, he had renounced his position as National Party leader while keeping the presidency. The move left him open to younger rivals. That August, at a cabinet meeting, his successor as party leader, Mr. de Klerk, followed by other ministers, suggested that he step down. That night, in an angry, rambling broadcast, the president announced that he would resign.

Under the new government, led by Mr. de Klerk, apartheid unraveled. In 1990, Mr. Mandela was freed after 27 years in prison and the African National Congress became a legal political party. In April 1994, the republic's first multiracial election was held, the Congress won an overwhelming victory and Mr. Mandela became president. In May 1996, a new national Constitution was adopted.

Apartheid was finished. In the late 1990's, the brutal methods that had been used to prolong its existence were exposed during hearings of South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Actions by the country's security forces and police during Mr. Botha's years in power had killed 4,000 people; as many as 50,000 others were held without trial.

The aging Mr. Botha derided the commission as a witch hunt. After failing to attend a hearing in Cape Town on Dec. 19, 1997, he was found guilty of contempt of the law, fined and sentenced to a suspended 12-month prison term. The conviction was overturned on appeal, and the Old Crocodile remained as intransigent as ever.

"I have nothing to apologize for," he said. ''I will never ask for amnesty. Not now, not tomorrow, not after tomorrow."

P.W. Botha; President Of Apartheid-Era South Africa (WP)

By Adam Bernstein

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

P.W. Botha, 90, the unapologetic leader of apartheid-era South Africa who led his country into deepening political crisis and racial violence as head of state from 1978 to 1989, died Oct. 31 at his home in Wilderness, a southern coastal town. No cause of death was reported.

"Peevee" Botha was the bald, bespectacled mandarin of the ultra-right Nationalist Party. His trademark was a finger-wagging belligerence that earned him the nickname the "Groot Krokodil," or great crocodile, in Afrikaans, the Dutch language that was his native tongue.

He held a variety of portfolios before becoming defense minister in 1966. During the next decade, he engineered massive increases in the military budget to minimize the effects of the international arms embargo against the apartheid government.

He also saw the militarization of his country as a way to safeguard South Africa from foreign invasion and internal subversion. To international derision, he undertook incursions into Angola and South West Africa (later renamed Namibia) to end leftist guerrilla uprisings and what he called the "forces of chaos, communism and socialism."

As prime minister and then state president, he veered wildly between upholding and reforming apartheid, the system of racial segregation that his party initiated after coming to power in 1948. He understood its inevitable decline amid uncontrollable protests but was unwilling to appear weak to his followers.

Years after he left office and a new, black-led leadership emerged, Mr. Botha remained defiant during investigations into his regime's hard-line racial policies that led to killings, tortures and disappearances. On a technicality, he successfully evaded testifying before South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission, formed to probe apartheid-era crimes.

"I did not authorize murders," he said to reporters at the time. "I will not ask forgiveness for fighting the Marxist revolutionary onslaught."

DOJ_NMG_0089514

Pieter Willem Botha was born Jan. 12, 1916, at his family's farm in the Paul Roux district of the Orange Free State. The area was deeply conservative and populated largely by Afrikaners, the white descendants of 17th-century settlers who were mostly Dutch.

In his teens, Mr. Botha became a member of the National Party, then a minority political group. During the Depression, he abandoned his law school studies at the University of the Orange Free State and began his mentorship under the Nationalist leader D.F. Malan. Mr. Botha was a political organizer, a job that sometimes required thuggery and other forms of intimidation.

During World War II, he helped form the Cape branch of the Ossewabrandwag, or Ox-Wagon Fire Guard, a pro-Nazi paramilitary group that opposed his country's support for the British and other Allied powers. His involvement ended when he was threatened with internment.

In 1948, his party won the general election in a surge of Afrikaner nationalism, and Mr. Botha was elected to the lower house of Parliament.

During his first decade in office, he became his party's chief secretary. Under prime minister H.F. Verwoerd, he was minister of colored affairs; minister of community development and housing; and minister of public works.

In this period, he sometimes fought against the most outrageously racist voices in his party on social and land issues. As defense minister, he championed a liberalization of the military that brought women and those of mixed race into fighting units.

Elected prime minister in 1978, he advocated a program of "adapt or die" that surprised many white South Africans for its reformist ring. This approach was partly because of the moderating influences of a strong political challenger during the election. However, to many blacks, Mr. Botha's efforts appeared cosmetic, and many in his white base charged him with surrendering needlessly.

Radical elements within his party abandoned him in 1982 to form another political party. Soon after, Mr. Botha helped craft a new national constitution that bestowed greater authority to himself by changing his title to state president. During the next few years, he repealed some restrictive laws, including a ban on interracial marriage and a passport system that prevented blacks from living freely away from their designated townships.

He allowed participation by Asians and those of mixed race in Parliament and the national cabinet, but blacks were still excluded from government. A goodwill tour of Europe in 1984 had little effect of changing the country's pariah status, although some Western governments and businesses maintained economic ties. He also eased his diplomatic relations with neighboring countries, nearly all of which were under black rule after having gained independence years earlier.

As rioting continued, he declared a state of emergency in 1986, curbing press freedoms and arresting black political leaders.

After a stroke in 1989, Mr. Botha resisted calls within his own party to resign. "I am not a sulking old man," he said.

In a matter of months, he arranged a meeting at his official Cape Town home with Nelson Mandela, a leader with the banned African National Congress who was serving a long prison sentence.

Mandela later wrote in a memoir that Mr. Botha broke all expectations of the "old-fashioned, stiff-necked, stubborn Afrikaner who did not so much discuss matters with black leaders as dictate to them." He said the president was amicable and smiling and "completely disarmed me," although he declined to agree to the unconditional release of Mandela and other political prisoners.

Within months, Mr. Botha resigned from the presidency and his party. Mandela was released from prison in 1990 and worked with Mr. Botha's successor, F.W. de Klerk, to hold fair elections. In 1994, Mandela became the first black president of South Africa.

During the new era, Mr. Botha was not allowed to retire quietly. Anglican Archbishop and Nobel laureate Desmond Tutu, who headed the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, personally asked Mr. Botha to testify about allegations of bombing campaigns against black rights groups during his presidency.

Mr. Botha declined to recognize the commission's authority to compel him to testify. Instead, he gave the commission 1,700 pages of answers to their questions.

This led to a court's finding him guilty of contempt and sentencing him to either a year in jail or a fine of $1,600. He avoided the penalty when a higher court said the commission's legal mandate to exist was due to expire before he was called to testify.

DOJ_NMG_0089515

At the time, Mr. Botha told reporters he was more worried about the lawlessness he saw around him under the new government. "I'm still concerned about the onslaught," he said. "What I prophesied came true."

He wrote an autobiography, "Voice in the Wilderness."

His first wife, Elize Rossouw, whom he married in 1943, died in 1997. The next year, he married Barbara Robertson, a legal secretary 25 years his junior. She survives him, along with five children from his first marriage.

Former S African President PW Botha Dies (FT)

By Victor Mallet

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

Pieter Willem Botha, the former South African president who died at the age of 90, was a godfearing Afrikaner nationalist who saw the failings of apartheid and reformed the system but could not bring himself to abolish it completely. That task fell to his successor F.W. de Klerk, who earned Botha's scorn by negotiating the transfer of power from the white minority to the African National Congress.

Universally known as "PW" from his initials, Botha was a career politician in the National party which ran South Africa from 1948 until the first, all-race election in 1994. Although he was a hardliner by instinct, he dimly sensed that he was presiding over the final phase of white rule and famously told whites after he became prime minister in 1978 to "adapt or die".

Yet the curmudgeonly Botha, who earned the nickname "Die Groot Krokodil" (the great crocodile) and had a habit of wagging his finger menacingly at his critics, could never reconcile himself to the inevitable. He resented the liberals and left-wingers in South Africa and abroad who had helped destroy apartheid. He never apologised for the torture, the killings and the poverty inflicted on South Africans and on the inhabitants of neighbouring states by his regime.

"We are a small country, but I am not going to be buggered about," he told Herman Nickel, the US ambassador, in 1986. "I'd rather fight." Even in retirement in 1998, Botha refused to testify before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which was investigating the crimes committed by both sides during the apartheid era. He called it a "circus" and a "witch-hunt" against Afrikaners.

He was born on January 12, 1916 on a farm in what was then the Afrikaner stronghold of the Orange Free State, but spent most of his political life in the Cape. In the years before the National party's 1948 election victory (when he began his 36-year stint as MP for the George constituency), he was a successful party organiser with a reputation for breaking up meetings of Jan Smuts's United party with thuggery and heckling.

Nothing in his early years suggested he would become a reformer. He briefly joined the right-wing Ossewabrandwag, which rejected support for Britain in the fight against Nazi Germany in the second world war.

As defence minister for 14 years from 1966, as prime minister from 1978 to 1984 (for a while he held both posts), and then in the newly created post of executive state president from 1984 until he was removed after suffering a stroke in 1989, he favoured military solutions to South Africa's foreign and domestic political problems.

During the cold war, Botha subscribed to the view that his government faced a "total onslaught" from Communist guerrillas and their allies, and must fight them with a "total strategy". He presided over a 20-fold increase in the country's defence budget, nurtured Armscor, a home-grown military equipment group which had some success in bypassing economic sanctions, and oversaw an invasion of Angola in 1975. He turned the State Security Council, which had been an advisory body, into a powerful and secretive inner cabinet.

But it would wrong to portray him, as his enemies often did, as no more than a tyrannical right-winger. For Botha undermined the very foundations of apartheid. He legalised the black trade unions that were to become a motor of political change; he abolished the Mixed Marriages Act outlawing inter-racial weddings; he negotiated South Africa's withdrawal from southern Angola and Namibia, paving the way for Namibian independence; he repealed the "pass laws" preventing blacks from entering "white" urban areas; he opened secret talks with the jailed ANC leader Nelson Mandela; and he gave coloureds (people of mixed race) and Indians the vote.

It was this half-hearted concession to the rights of other races in the mid-1980s that accelerated the end of white rule. Although Botha survived a split in his National party over the new constitution and its tricameral parliament (the breakaway right-wing Conservative party was formed in 1982), the still unenfranchised black majority took to the streets in a violent uprising that ultimately destroyed apartheid.

Botha never understood the forces that he had unleashed. Thousands of South Africans were subsequently killed in riots by troops and police, or in clashes between rival political groups. Some victims accused of being traitors or informers were burnt alive in motor-tyre "necklaces" by the young revolutionary "comrades" who paid allegiance to the United Democratic Front, a sort of internal wing of the ANC created out of a common hatred of the new constitution.

The government imposed a partial state of emergency in 1985 and a full one the following year, thinking it could crush the uprising. Even when he accepted the idea of political negotiations, Botha deluded himself that he could strike a deal with "moderate" blacks who would demand something less than full political rights. Likewise, he thought he could divide the nationalists from the Communists in the ANC (many ANC members were both) and assumed that he could eventually release Mandela to prevent him dying in jail a martyr without seeing him become president.

He was wrong on all counts. The defining moment of Botha's presidency was when he made the famous "Rubicon" speech in August 1985. Pik Botha, his foreign minister (and no relation), raised international expectations to a fever pitch that P.W. Botha would "cross the Rubicon" by outlining fundamental reforms and promising to free Mandela.

P.W. Botha did make significant concessions, but, obstinate as ever, he refused to deliver the speech prepared for him and spoke to the waiting world in a hectoring tone and in coded political phrases that only South Africans could understand. Foreign opinion was horrified. The rand plunged and South Africa was obliged to declare a moratorium on repayments of its foreign debt. From that day on, it was clear that Botha would not be the man to lead South Africa into the post-apartheid era.

He was twice married, first, in 1943, to Anna Elizabeth Rossouw, with whom he had two sons and three daughters. She died in 1997. The following year at the age of 82 he married Barbara Robertson, a secretary 25 years his junior.

Former South Africa President Dies At 90 (AP)

By Clare Nullis

AP, November 1, 2006

P.W. Botha, the apartheid-era president who led South Africa through its worst racial violence and deepest international isolation, died Tuesday. He was 90.

Botha died at his home on the southern Cape coast at 8 p.m., according to the South African Press Association. "Botha died at home, peacefully," Capt. Frikkie Lucas was quoted as saying.

The African National Congress issued a statement expressing condolences and wishing his family "strength and comfort at this difficult time."

Nicknamed the "Old Crocodile" for his feared temper and sometimes ruthless manner, Botha served as head of the white racist government from 1978 to 1989.

Throughout his leadership he resisted mounting pressure to free South Africa's most famous political prisoner, Nelson Mandela. Mandela was released by Botha's successor, F.W. de Klerk in 1990.

Botha liked to depict himself as the first South African leader to pursue race reform, but he tenaciously defended the framework of apartheid, sharply restricting the activities of black political organizations and detaining more than 30,000 people.

Through a series of liberalizing moves, Botha sought support among the Asian and mixed-race communities by creating separate parliamentary chambers. He lifted restrictions on interracial sex and marriage. He met with Mandela during his last year as president.

But after each step forward, there was a backlash, resulting in the 1986 state of emergency declaration and the worst reprisals of more than four decades of apartheid.

Botha's intransigence on releasing Mandela led the anti-apartheid Johannesburg Daily, Business Day, to write: "The government is now the prisoner of its prisoner; it cannot escape his embrace."

Within a year after Botha stepped down, de Klerk released Mandela after 27 years in prison and put South Africa on the road to its first all-race elections in 1994, when Mandela became president.

DOJ_NMG_0089517

In December 1997, Botha stubbornly resisted appearing before a panel investigating apartheid-era crimes. He risked criminal penalties by repeatedly defying subpoenas from the Truth and Reconciliation Commission to testify about the State Security Council that he headed.

The council was believed to have sanctioned the killing and torture of anti-apartheid activists, and the panel wanted to know what Botha's involvement was.

Born Jan. 12, 1916, the son of a farmer in the rural Orange Free State province, Botha never served in the military or graduated from college. He quit university in 1935 to become a National Party organizer.

During World War II, Botha joined the Ossewabrandwag (Ox Wagon Fire Guard), a group that was sympathetic to the Nazis and opposed South Africa's participation on the Allied side.

Botha won election to Parliament in 1948, the year the National Party came to power and began codifying apartheid legislation. He joined the Cabinet in 1961 and became defense minister in 1966.

As head of the white-minority government in 1978, Botha repeatedly stressed the paramount importance of national security. He charged that the anti-apartheid struggle was a "total onslaught" on South Africa instigated by communist forces.

During a series of gradual race reforms, he told white South Africans they must "adapt or die." A new constitution in 1983 gave Asians and mixed-race people a limited voice in government, but continued to exclude blacks.

The new law also drastically increased Botha's powers, changing his title from prime minister to president. He declared a national emergency in 1986 after widespread violence erupted in black areas, where anger focused on the new constitution.

State security forces brutally quelled the opposition, and one of his former lieutenants — police minister Adriaan Vlok — told the Truth Commission that Botha had personally congratulated Vlok for successfully bombing a building thought to harbor anti-apartheid activists and weapons.

But in documents submitted to the panel, Botha denied knowledge of the killings, torture and bombings.

Botha's reprisals against the black majority drew international economic sanctions against South Africa during the 1980s that contributed to apartheid's fall.

In July 1989, Mandela went from prison to Botha's official residence for a conversation, which increased speculation that Botha would free Mandela.

Mandela recalled going into the meeting thinking he was seeing "the very model of the old-fashioned, stiff-necked, stubborn Afrikaner who did not so much discuss matters with black leaders as dictate to them."

He found Botha holding out his hand and smiling broadly "and in fact, from that very first moment, he completely disarmed me," Mandela wrote in his autobiography.

Mandela said the only tense moment was when he asked Botha to release all political prisoners — including himself — unconditionally.

"Mr. Botha said that he was afraid he could not do that," Mandela wrote.

The meeting was one of Botha's last acts before he was ousted as National Party leader by de Klerk in September 1989.

Botha refused to attend a farewell banquet held in his honor by the party he had served for 54 years. After 1990, he quit the National Party.

Botha's foremost loyalties were to his fellow Afrikaners, yet his moves to extend limited political power to nonwhites prompted a mass defection of hard-line segregationists from the National Party in 1982.

Beeld, an Afrikaans-language daily that supported Botha for many years, said, "The last image that will linger ... is that of a blind Samson who with his last strength tried to overturn the pillars of his party on himself and his own companions."

Migrants' Money Is Imperfect Cure For Poor Nations (WSJ)

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

CIUDAD BARRIOS, El Salvador -- This lively mountain town survives on money sent from its sons and daughters living in the U.S. On days payments arrive, lines at the local credit union can reach 150 deep. The crowds then hail motorcycle taxis and head for the town's open-air market to stock up on food and clothing, or browse tiny appliance stores stuffed with blaring televisions and stereos.

It's the sort of scene that many development economists believe could transform some of the world's most impoverished regions, by putting cash directly in the pockets of the poor. With tens of millions of migrants around the globe sending remittances home, the flood of money has grown immense -- $167 billion last year, according to the World Bank.

But Ciudad Barrios also demonstrates why reliance on remittances may turn out to be the latest development fad that fails to live up to its hype. The downside: a cycle of continued poverty, as dependence on remittances turns the town into a kind of ward of the U.S. Those with entrepreneurial ambition head north, emptying out the town of its talent. Only a tiny fraction of the money they send home is invested in industry or agriculture that could produce jobs. And with the breadwinners away, organized thugs pounce on a place where money pours in from outside. All of that leaves little opportunity for the next generation except to follow their predecessors north, if they can.

"As soon as people go home and see what their salaries are [there], they come back to the U.S. again," says Israel Hernández, 38 years old, who left Ciudad Barrios in 1998 and has been cleaning houses in Washington, D.C. He has sent enough cash home to his grandmother for her to buy a house. She misses him, she says, but urges him to stay up north.

For countries to reduce poverty on a sustained basis and to create a middle class, they need to grow rapidly over years. Though remittances fuel some spending, there isn't much evidence they have added to sustained growth. Instead, the infusions of outside cash often distort the local economy and may diminish the long-term prospects for gains.

The flood of money from abroad can raise the value of local currencies, making it harder for exporters to compete because the effective price of their goods goes up. Meanwhile, about 85% of the money goes to pay the daily bills of the people left behind, with little left over for savings and investment. Migrants eventually return to retire in their home nations, not to help build their economies.

"Remittances are a band-aid on fundamental development problems," says Dean Yang, a public-policy professor at the University of Michigan. "Labor export and remittances won't turn El Salvador, the Philippines and other poor countries into the next development tigers." Even the World Bank, which has pushed the development potential of remittances, is having second thoughts. In a report on Latin America released yesterday, the bank says that remittances are "neither 'manna from heaven,' nor a substitute for sound development policies."

Remittances have received increasingly widespread attention in recent years as a way to boost aid without spending government money, as other formulas for growth have failed to produce widespread gains. In the 1970s and early 1980s, many nations tried closing their borders to protect their local industries from competition, which boosted growth for a while but led to high prices and monopoly control. Then they tried the opposite approach, free trade and market liberalization, with limited effect so far except in Asia. Meanwhile, foreign aid has been too small and inefficient to make much of a difference, while private investment has been targeted at a limited number of countries and industries.

Remittances do directly help many poor families feed themselves and educate their children. Money sent home from abroad accounts for about 60% of the income of the poorest households in Guatemala, and has helped reduce the number of people living in poverty by 11 percentage points in Uganda and six percentage points in Bangladesh, according to World Bank studies.

Nevertheless, a look at El Salvador shows the ways in which the cash also can hinder impoverished nations. The nation of seven million has revamped its economy since the civil war ended in 1992 in a so-far elusive effort to spur rapid growth. El Salvador abolished price controls, privatized industries, slashed tariffs that were as high as 290% and adopted the dollar as its currency in 2001 to limit inflation. Earlier this year, it joined a regional free-trade bloc with the U.S.

Salvadorans started to flee the country in great numbers in the 1980s as the civil war there intensified. Now one in six Salvadorans -- 1.5 million people -- live abroad, many of them illegally in the U.S. They send home nearly $3 billion annually, equal to about 16% of the country's gross domestic product.

Ciudad Barrios, a remote town 100 miles east of San Salvador, ping-ponged between guerrilla and government control during the civil war. José Edgardo Díaz Cordero worked in the town's hospital pharmacy in 1990 when guerrillas demanded that he give them medicines to treat their wounded. Then, he says, he received an anonymous message from a right-wing death squad accusing him of being a guerrilla ally and warning him to leave the country.

Mr. Díaz made his way to the Washington, D.C., area where many others from his town had settled, attracted by a booming construction industry. He started sending home several hundred dollars a month to his wife to care for their five children. He has been home just once, for about a year in 1995, but wages were too low to make a go of it, says Mr. Díaz, who is now 54. He returned to the U.S. and was later joined by two sons who became his partners in a flooring business. Another burst of Ciudad Barrios natives, who worked in the region's coffee fields, headed for the U.S. starting in 2000 when coffee prices plummeted.

Francisco Membreño, once a Ciudad Barrios coffee farmer, left his pregnant wife in 2000, worried that he wouldn't be able to support his newborn. He hasn't ever been back to meet their son, Ronald, who's now 6 years old. Mr. Membreño works two jobs cleaning offices in Washington, D.C., making $575 on a good week, and sharing an apartment with another Salvadoran.

Each month he sends home about $300 to his wife, Ernestina Argueta, who moved with Ronald to her parents' sweltering concrete house lit by a single light bulb. The money goes for food and medicine mostly, says Ms. Argueta, with a little left over to save to expand a tiny plot of land her husband purchased and hopes someday to cultivate. Though her elderly mother dreams of a new sewing machine, Ms. Argueta says, "For now, we're not buying anything, until he comes back."

About one-third of the 40,000 residents of Ciudad Barrios and surrounding hamlets receive remittances, estimates Claudia Rodríguez-Alas, an American University researcher who has studied the town. Salvadorans abroad typically share apartments, keep each other current on job openings and lend relatives at home the $5,000 or so necessary to pay "coyotes" to guide them illicitly across Mexico to the U.S.

In Ciudad Barrios, monthly remittances average about $157 a household, according to Ms. Rodríguez-Alas. That's slightly more than the government calculates is enough to feed a family of four. But it often doesn't pull families above the official poverty line of $275 a month. Essentially, remittances are sufficient to push families out of extreme poverty, but not much higher.

The extra cash does have beneficial effects. It gives even the most destitute families the means to pay for food at the town's markets, and is extra disposable income for those who work. Salvadoran families that receive remittances are more likely to keep their children in school than other families, according to a study by two economists, Alejandra Cox of California State University, Long Beach, and Manuelita Ureta of Texas A&M.

Better-off Salvadorans abroad often send two checks a month -- one for their family's daily expenses, and another to save up to buy small homes with luxuries such as glass windows, electricity in every room, steel gratings on the doors and windows, and tile floors.

A small consumption boom fed by the checks has doubled the number of businesses registered with the Ciudad Barrios City Hall to 220 since 2000, and even helped prompt the opening of a "cyber cafe." Around the town's central square are five financial institutions that handle remittances, including Western Union, which also advertises on highway overpasses on the way to town.

One hardware store, Agro Ferreteria Rivera, has carved out an unusual niche: The couple that owns the store travels monthly to Maryland to take orders for homes sketched out by migrants, who wire payments to their families. A separate appliance store takes orders by cellphone from abroad, while a city council member sells solar panels for homes built in fields that lack electricity hook-ups. Some of the new homeowners also get their fences electrified for extra security.

The gains in consumption financed from abroad could fuel the economy. But paradoxically, the easy money from remittances leads to a fall, rather than a rise, in domestic savings as a percentage of gross domestic product. The investment rate as a percentage of GDP stagnates as well.

The result: The country makes little progress. Between 1999 and 2005, remittances doubled to $2.8 billion, but the country limped along at an annual growth rate of just 2.4% -- far too low for a poor country to advance much. The tide of money from abroad boosted the value of its currency compared with that of its neighbors by nearly 50% between 1992 and 2001, which damaged exports. El Salvador has since adopted the dollar as its currency, but competition from China has intensified and other Central American nations have kept their currencies undervalued, so Salvadoran exporters haven't recovered.

Soaring remittances have boosted real-estate prices to levels that locals without outside help can't afford, while reducing the incentive of remittance recipients to work at home -- since wages are a pittance compared with what their relatives make in the U.S. In Ciudad Barrios, the coffee-growing cooperative recruits Nicaraguans and Hondurans to work the fields, because they can't find enough Salvadorans to fill jobs that pay between $5.50 and $8 a day.

Elsewhere, the same pattern occurs. Examining Mexican labor data, economists Catalina Amuedo-Dorantes of San Diego State University and Susan Pozo of Western Michigan University say that a boost in remittances prompts men to cut back their hours at salaried jobs and fill in with informal work.

Groups of Salvadorans abroad do form associations to help finance municipal improvements back home. In Chinameca, a town near Ciudad Barrios, for instance, migrants have helped to pay for the town's water tower and for the roof on a local church. But the efforts have fallen well far short of the need.

Economists say that El Salvador and other remittance-receiving nations must figure out ways to route money from abroad into domestic investments. The Salvadoran government, for instance, wants to create investment vehicles for Salvadorans abroad to bankroll domestic projects or industries.

In that vein, Salvadoran developers are holding fairs around the U.S. to try to make it easier for migrants to buy real estate. A Washington, D.C., financial company, Microfinance International Corp., is starting to offer Salvadorans transnational loans, which they can use to make investments in El Salvador and make payments in the U.S. -- and avoid having to pay fees on money wired home. Since many Salvadorans don't use banks or credit cards, the company's customers can use their remittance history to prove their creditworthiness.

In Ciudad Barrios, Lorena Romero, the acting manager of a local credit union, says only a tiny percentage of remittance receivers take out business loans. Even those often use the proceeds to pay coyotes to take them to the U.S. instead of opening businesses locally. Another credit union called AMC, which does business throughout eastern El Salvador in conjunction with Microfinance International, says just 1% of its remittance customers take out loans for businesses.

Wilson Salmerón, AMC's general manager, says many migrants don't invest in El Salvador because they're afraid their families will become targets of gang violence. One of the reasons that many nations have come to depend so heavily on remittances -- Haiti, Bosnia, Serbia, Honduras, Nicaragua -- is because people were frightened away by war, and their nations are still torn by violence.

In Ciudad Barrios, many remittance recipients try to avoid calling attention to themselves. Some pick up their cash in neighboring towns where they aren't known. Others pace their purchases of appliances, so their neighbors don't notice. The latest gang tactic is to call remittance receivers on their cellphones and extort cash instead of doing it in person. Some in Ciudad Barrios won't answer calls from numbers they don't know.

The fear damps local investment, too. Mr. Salmerón says his credit managers are afraid to travel into the countryside where gang influence is strong. A number of migrants say they wouldn't start a business in Ciudad Barrios for fear they'll draw unwanted attention. "You'll be robbed," says Dora Ruiz, a cook at a Washington, D.C., McDonald's restaurant, who wires $200 a month to care for her four children who live with her sister-in-law. "People will come in through the windows if need be."

At Ciudad Barrios' sole high school, students recognize one important benefit of remittances: They aren't forced to drop out of school to work, as their parents were. The senior class this year is triple the size of a decade ago, says the school's assistant principal, Lex Marvin. But some now leave early to join parents abroad, and few see much opportunity in El Salvador after graduation. José Ines Aguilar Osorio is a shy, slender senior whose father works as a mason in the U.S. "If I don't find work here," he says, "I'm leaving."

Germany's Army (NYT)

Germany has made it official: it is prepared to move out of its postwar pacifist mode and undertake a greater role in global security. Good. There has been no good reason for some time why Germany should not do its share of global peacekeeping and peacemaking. Defending Germany's borders, to which its army was restricted after World War II, is hardly a consuming mission in today's Europe.

Berlin's new position paper on international security, issued last week, points to a welcome expansion of Germany's role in conflict prevention, peacekeeping and antiterrorist actions. That is especially important now, when the wars in Iraq and

Afghanistan and multiple peacekeeping missions in Africa have strained the military resources of America and its leading NATO allies.

Military ties to the United States will remain at the heart of Berlin's defense policy. But larger and more robust troop contributions from the most populous European NATO country can help restore a measure of political balance to an alliance increasingly distorted by Washington's military role.

The taboos against deploying German troops overseas have been steadily falling away at least since 1992, when a few German medics were dispatched to Cambodia. Today, Germany has about 10,000 soldiers serving on missions in Afghanistan, the Balkans and Congo, and German warships are patrolling the Lebanese coast. But the Germans have usually avoided roles that could involve combat. Those in Afghanistan, for example, are involved in reconstruction. Under the new policy, Germany would presumably engage in all aspects of peacekeeping operations.

The specter of German militarism, once terrifying, is a thing of the past. Contemporary Germans are, if anything, more sensitive than their neighbors to episodes of military wrongdoing. Last week's publication of photographs of German soldiers in Afghanistan toying with a skull prompted a suitably anguished public reaction. But it should not raise questions about transforming the Bundeswehr into a global intervention force. There's a lot of work to be done, and it's time the Germans joined in.

TERRORISM NEWS:

An Administration Ally Goes Off-Message (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Sensing GOP vulnerability, the Democrats' campaign ads focus on voter unhappiness with the Iraq war. The Republicans, in turn, prefer to talk about keeping us safe from terrorism.

So eyebrows popped up last week when none other than Richard Perle , former Reagan assistant secretary of defense, former Bush brain-truster on the Defense Policy Board, and a key promoter of the war to find Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, blistered the administration as "dysfunctional" when it comes to stopping someone from bringing "a nuclear weapon or even nuclear material into the United States."

Richard Perle called the Bush administration "dysfunctional." (Roger L . Wollenberg - Upi)

"Knowing that there are people who wish to do that," Perle said, "knowing they are seeking weapons of mass destruction, you would think that we would have put in place a system or at least be working assiduously in the development of a system that would allow us to detect nuclear material entering the New York Harbor or Boston Harbor or what have you.

"But we haven't done that," he said at a Center for Strategic and International Studies gathering. "And the reason we haven't done that is hopeless bureaucratic obstruction. Somebody needs to shake that loose." Perle added that while some have tried to overcome the bureaucracy, no one has succeeded.

"I think we have an administration today that is dysfunctional," Perle said. "And if it can't get itself together to organize a serious program for finding nuclear material on its way to the United States, then it ought to be replaced by an administration that can."

But President Bush , Perle emphasized, is not to blame for this sorry state of affairs. "I haven't the slightest doubt that if one could . . . put this proposition to the president, he would first be shocked to learn that we don't have the capability. Secondly, [he] would immediately order that we develop it."

Shocked? Well, let's see. Bush . . . Bush . . . Ah, yes, 202-456-1414.

Top-Shelf Tickets for a Cabinet Secretary

A coach-flying-government-employee Loop Fan reports that United Flight 915 from Paris on Saturday was delayed briefly during the boarding process to allow a small group of VIPs to get on.

So who might these folks have been? Secretary of Veterans Affairs Jim Nicholson , returning home from important conferences in Paris. Our caller was surprised to see Nicholson and his wife, Suzanne, not just in business class but in first class. Two agency aides were seated in business class. Nicholson's security detail was appropriately placed for security.

"The airline gave away their seats," a VA spokeswoman explained yesterday, "and couldn't get them back. So they bumped them up from business." Nicholson paid for his wife's ticket.

Nicholson was overheard chatting with an airline employee in what sounded like very good French. We were told he picked that up when he was an Army Ranger in Vietnam so he could work with his Vietnamese counterpart.

72 Muslim Workers Barred From Paris Airport (NYT)

By Katrin Bennhold

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 31 — The French authorities charged with assessing security risks at Charles de Gaulle airport have stripped 72 Muslim workers of their access badges because they had traveled to Pakistan or Afghanistan, or were suspected of having links to extremists, according to a government official who oversees the airport.

DOJ_NMG_0089526

Several are suspected of having trained in terrorist camps in Pakistan and Afghanistan, though a mere trip to one of those countries would be enough for a revocation, said the official, Jacques Lebrot. One of the suspended workers, he added, was a friend of Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber.

About a dozen other workers have been notified that they are considered security risks, but remain on their jobs pending questioning, Mr. Lebrot said. The unions representing them said some were still cleaning planes and handling baggage.

Mr. Lebrot did not present any evidence against the workers, saying that would compromise French intelligence sources. But France's largest union filed a discrimination lawsuit in mid-October over the revocations, and at least 10 airport workers who lost their jobs have sued separately to regain their security clearance.

Among those still working is Hassane Tariqui, 37, a French citizen who was born in Morocco and supervises cleaners inside passenger planes, most of them bound for the United States. On Sept. 21, he received a letter from the authorities saying that his "attitude" and "personal behavior" posed a risk to airport security, but it did not specify how.

"If they really think I am a security risk, why am I still allowed to work here?" said Mr. Tariqui, who has been employed at the airport for 16 years. He said he was not a radical, nor even an especially devout Muslim, although he has made a pilgrimage to Mecca.

Mr. Lebrot said that some of the employees who received the letter were still working because they had not yet been interviewed. Those who lose their security clearance at the airport are at risk of dismissal by the private companies that employ them, like Air France and FedEx.

All who received the letter came to the attention of intelligence services in an antiterrorist investigation at French airports ordered by the Interior Ministry in May 2005, Mr. Lebrot said, and 72 had their security clearance revoked after questioning. Sixty-eight more people were investigated and cleared, Mr. Lebrot said.

The United States Homeland Security Department declined to comment on the development. "It's the government of France's jurisdiction," said a spokeswoman, Joanna Gonzalez.

The airport, north of Paris, is near suburbs with Muslim populations where rioting erupted last year. Unions estimate that at least a fifth of the airport's 83,000 employees are Muslim.

Mr. Lebrot, the deputy prefect in the Seine-St.-Denis district, where the airport is located, said the letters singled out employees suspected of links with movements or people who rejected "France and our values," or who were suspected of traveling to Pakistan and Afghanistan. Some are believed to have spent time in terrorist training camps and extremist Koranic schools in the two countries, Mr. Lebrot said.

One employee, he said, was discovered to have been a friend of Mr. Reid, a London-born convert to Islam who tried to blow up a flight from Paris to Miami in 2001 using explosives hidden in his shoe. Mr. Reid is now serving a life sentence in Colorado.

Another man is believed to have been close to a senior figure in the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, an Algerian terrorist group with links to Al Qaeda, Mr. Lebrot said.

Muslim organizations and human rights groups have accused the authorities of waging an anti-Muslim campaign in a presidential election year, while some terrorism experts say the government risks being too slow in removing security threats. "We need an emergency procedure to revoke badges, provided that the intelligence that calls the security of an employee into question is serious," said Alain Marsaud, a lawmaker and former antiterrorism chief.

But Eric Moutet, a lawyer for some of suspended workers, said "We have not seen any objective evidence against our clients. The only common denominator we see today is that they are all Muslim."

Mr. Lebrot insists that the decision to bar some airport employees has nothing to do with their religion.

"Monsieur or Madame X who goes to pray in the mosque and travels to Mecca for the pilgrimage is not a problem for us," he said.

Plotter Worked in London Tube

LONDON, Oct. 31 (AFP) — Critics accused London transportation authorities of a security gaffe Tuesday after learning that the son of a notorious radical imam had worked on the underground train network.

Mohammed Kamel Mostafa, 25, was jailed for three years in Yemen starting in 1999 for plotting a bombing campaign, but worked for a subcontractor of the subway's maintenance company. Mr. Mostafa is the son of Abu Hamza, the former imam of the Finsbury Park mosque in north London who was sentenced to a seven-year jail term in February.

A series of attacks by four suicide bombers on three underground trains and a bus in London on July 7 last year killed 52 commuters.

Would-be Bomber Planned DSHS Building Strike (KXLY)

KXLY-TV, November 1, 2006

SPOKANE -- A man who threatened to blow up a Spokane DSHS facility earlier this summer will face federal charges, an FBI sgent confirmed Tuesday afternoon.

Anthony Garver will face federal charges for possession or receipt of firearms or ammunition by a person adjudicated as mentally defective, according to FBI Special Agent Norm Brown.

The charges stem from the relevation earlier this summer after Garver told a fellow inmate at the Spokane County Jail about his plan to blow up the DSHS office located at 1313 Maple Street. The plan included setting off a primary device and then a secondary once officials arrived after the first one detonated.

Tony Dawson, the inmate who Garver talked about his plans with, tipped off authorities who later found during their investigation that Garver had a variety of items including ammunition, knives, a GPS unit, police scanner and bomb-making recipes saved on a computer, which was enough for the FBI to launch an investigation into Garver.

Garver was placed under a 90-day evaluation at Eastern State Hospital in late August.

Bombing Suspect May Have Written Letter To Police (KTVX)

KTVX-TV, November 1, 2006

The man accused of bombing the Salt Lake City Library in September may have also written a letter to police claiming responsibility for the crime.

The author also promises more attacks in the future according to the FBI. The letter was addressed to Chief of Police Chris Burbank one week ago.

Thomas James Zajac, 53, is behind bars in Illinois awaiting extradition to Salt Lake City to face bombing charges here, police are trying to find out if he was the one who wrote the letter.

In the letter, the author gives details about the materials used to construct the bomb. The letter writer also tells police someone close to him was a victim of police brutality in Salt Lake City, he or she goes on to say if they see more cases of police brutality they will return and bomb again.

Right now Zajac, who lives in Illinois, is a person of interest in two separate bombings in the western suburbs outside of Chicago, including a bombing in Downers Grove in 2004 and Hinsdale just two weeks before the Salt Lake City bombing.

The Chief of Police in Hinsdale is quoted in the Chicago Tribune as saying that his department received a letter after the explosion there, and he tells reporters it is very similar in content and style to the letter received by Salt Lake City Police.

Zajac is accused of setting off a pipe bomb at Salt Lake City's main library on September 15th. The library was evacuated but no one was hurt and the bomb caused only minimal damage.

Zajac is being held in an Illinois jail and will be extradited back to Utah, possibly in 5 days.

ATF Investigates Whether SLC Library Bomb Suspect Linked To Illinois Blast (SLT)

By Nate Carlisle

Salt Lake Tribune, November 1, 2006

Investigators are probing whether the suspect in a Salt Lake City library bombing is linked to an explosion at a train station in suburban Chicago, a federal agent said Tuesday.

Lori Dyer, the resident agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Salt Lake City, said Thomas Zajac's fingerprints are being tested against evidence connected to a bomb that detonated in Hinsdale, Ill.

That bomb exploded Sept. 1 - the same month as the library bomb - in a trash can at a commuter train station, according to the Daily Herald in suburban Chicago. No one was injured.

Federal authorities on Friday in Utah filed a criminal charge against Zajac that accuses him of planting a bomb Sept. 15 at the main branch of the Salt Lake City Public Library. The explosion destroyed a window but hurt no one.

The FBI arrested Zajac Friday at his home in Oakbrook Terrace, Ill. He is awaiting extradition to Utah.

Dyer said Zajac might have allegedly planted the Salt Lake City bomb in retaliation for his son apparently having been arrested, but added that's just one theory.

"I think we're still sorting through some things to figure out what the [alleged] motive is," Dyer said.

Salt Lake City police spokesman Joe Cyr said Tuesday the department cannot find Lawyer: Woman In Nuclear Probe Not A Spy (FWST)

By Deborah Baker

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, November 1, 2006

SANTA FE, N.M. - The woman who lived in a home where classified material from Los Alamos National Laboratory was seized by authorities wasn't a spy - she was just trying to do her job for the lab, her lawyer said Tuesday.

The FBI began investigating a security breach at the nuclear weapons laboratory after police seized three portable computer storage drives during a drug bust at Jessica Quintana's home on Oct. 17.

Her attorney, Stephen Aarons, said Quintana formerly worked in a secure area called a vault at the lab, scanning hard copies of documents into an electronic format and then indexing them so they could be searched by title or author.

"It's not espionage. It's a 22-year-old ... that mishandled documents, and it doesn't appear that third parties got hold of them," Aarons said.

"Her only intent was to work with these documents herself, and to get them indexed in a timely fashion. ... She was working with these documents and she shouldn't have left the facility with them, but apparently she did."

Lab Director Michael Anastasio confirmed last week that classified information was seized from the home, but he didn't provide any details. Lab officials aren't discussing the investigation.

Quintana had worked for a lab subcontractor until she was laid off recently. She was working for a child care program at the YMCA when the flash drives were taken by authorities, but was fired from that job.

Authorities searched the home and arrested a man who was renting a room there on drug and probation violation charges. Quintana, who was not at home at the time, has not been charged.

Stone said that one of the USB flash drives was his, and that he had traded it for methamphetamine. He said the FBI told him it contained pornography. He has denied any knowledge of lab documents.

Aarons said that Quintana knows enough to be able to index the documents, but that she did not necessarily understand their significance. He also said that although the documents were classified, he did not believe they fell into the category of "top secret."

"It's our belief that she did not handle - and therefore mishandle - any top secret documents," he said.

Intelligence Agencies Launch 'Intellipedia' (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies have created a new computer system that uses software from a popular Internet encyclopedia site to gather input on sensitive topics from analysts across the spy community, part of an effort to fix problems that plagued prewar estimates on Iraq.

The new system, dubbed "Intellipedia" because it is built on open-source software from the Wikipedia Web site, was launched earlier this year. It is already being used to assemble intelligence reports on Nigeria and other subjects, according to U.S. intelligence officials who on Tuesday discussed the initiative in detail for the first time.

After being criticized for downplaying dissenting views on Iraq's alleged weapons programs, "we're trying to transform the way we do business," said Michele Weslander, a senior official overseeing the initiative for the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte.

The system allows analysts from all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies to weigh in on debates on North Korea's nuclear program and other sensitive topics, creating internal Web sites that are constantly updated with new information and analysis, officials said.

The system, which is not accessible to the public, is divided into three classification categories ranging from "sensitive but unclassified" to "top secret." Officials said that the program is still under development and has not replaced existing procedures used to create intelligence reports delivered to President Bush and other policymakers. But it is being used to assemble preliminary judgments for a forthcoming National Intelligence Estimate on Nigeria and could someday supplant the more cumbersome mechanisms used to create such reports.

"I think in the future you'll press a button and this will be the NIE," said Michael Wertheimer, assistant deputy director of national intelligence for analysis.

The system is based on the software used by millions of Internet users to create encyclopedia entries at www.wikipedia.org. But unlike that largely anonymous environment, the individuals who add material to pages on the intelligence system have to attach their names to their contributions.

More than 3,600 analysts and other intelligence officials have registered to use the service since it was launched in April, officials said.

In a meeting with reporters at the Office of the Director for National Intelligence, officials showed how analysts from multiple agencies had used the network to post frequent updates on recent events, including the crash of a small plane into a New York City apartment building last month and North Korea's test of a missile in July.

Officials said they were not making the network available to members of Congress or other policymakers, largely because of a reluctance to disseminate material that analysts view as a work in progress.

The officials acknowledged some concerns, including the possibility that making sensitive information available to a much larger group of intelligence officials could increase the risk that secrets might be leaked to the press. They said that partly for that reason, detailed information obtained from satellites or from human sources is being kept off the system.

But they stressed that disseminating material to the widest possible audience of analysts is key to avoiding mistakes like those that contributed to erroneous assessments that Iraq possessed stockpiles of banned weapons and was pursuing a nuclear arsenal.

One official said that dissenting views that were treated as footnotes in prewar estimates on Iraq will be much more prominent on the new system, and that doubts about sources are likely to surface earlier and be more difficult to ignore.

"It moves us away from homogenized intelligence," said Sean Dennehy, a CIA official involved in creating the new system.

Student Unleashes Uproar With Bogus Airline Boarding Passes (WP)

By Brian Krebs

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Christopher Soghoian said he was simply trying to highlight a flaw in the nation's airline security procedures when he put a tool on his Web site letting anyone create fake boarding passes, but federal authorities didn't see it that way.

FBI agents visited the 24-year-old doctoral candidate's home in Bloomington, Ind., Friday and returned on Saturday to cart off his computers and other equipment. While Soghoian has not been charged with a crime, the incident has stirred a national tempest and renewed concerns about passenger screening procedures.

Soghoian, a Virginia native and student at Indiana University's School of Informatics, declined to comment yesterday on the advice of his attorney. But he has been writing about the incident on his Web site.

"I came back today, to find the glass on the front door smashed," Soghoian wrote on Saturday. "Inside, is a rather ransacked home, a search warrant taped to my kitchen table, a total absence of computers -- and various other important things."

Wendy Osborne, a special agent with the FBI's Indianapolis field office, confirmed that a search warrant was executed at Soghoian's home but declined to discuss the case further because she said it had been sealed.

Osborne said that the FBI would investigate jointly with the Transportation Security Administration and then decide whether charges would be filed.

Reached at his home in Charlottesville, Stephen Soghoian, Christopher's father, defended his son's actions. "Chris was only pointing out that the government is not using its resources in a good way to provide real public safety at airports," the elder Soghoian said. "Instead, what they're doing is probably best described as security theatre."

The feature Christopher Soghoian created, which was removed from his Web site Friday night, allowed anyone to type in their name and flight information and print a boarding pass for Northwest Airlines. The bogus passes might help a terrorist get past the initial security checkpoints, Soghoian wrote, but probably would not let a terrorist board a plane. That's because at the departure gates, boarding passes are screened electronically and compared against the airline's passenger list.

Amy Kudwa, a spokeswoman for the TSA, declined to say whether the agency was considering changing check-in procedures because of the incident. She said that while the fake boarding pass generator "had the potential to promote illegal activity, it will not aid anyone in circumventing airport security."

She added: "The TSA assures that every person is thoroughly screened at the checkpoint for dangerous weapons or explosives. There are many layers of security at the nation's airports, including many methods that are not obvious to the casual observer."

Last week, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) publicly called for the arrest of Soghoian and the shuttering of his site. But on Sunday, Markey praised Soghoian's actions as a public service that called attention to a security weakness.

"He picked a lousy way of doing it, but he should not go to jail for his bad judgment," Markey said. "Better yet, the Department of Homeland Security should put him to work showing public officials how easily our security can be compromised."

Markey said yesterday that the TSA was contradicting itself by saying fake boarding passes were not a problem but the pass-generator was. "TSA has to make up its mind, but it can't have it both ways," he said. "Either the public is in jeopardy or it is not. If the public is not in jeopardy, then this young man should not be in jeopardy."

Markey indicated Congress might have to act if the TSA doesn't. "I think TSA should close the loophole," he said. "We shouldn't have to wait until a new Congress reconvenes to protect the public if a loophole jeopardizes public safety."

Critics of airline security restrictions say Soghoian's site automated a loophole that others have written and spoken about for more than three years. The loophole is that boarding passes are compared to a person's ID only at initial security checkpoints, not at the gates where passengers board planes. Also, the passes are scanned and verified only at departure gates, not security checkpoints.

Bruce Schneier, a security expert and chief technical officer for Mountain View, Calif.-based Counterpane Internet Security, wrote about the loophole in 2003. To close it, he said, airports should scan boarding passes and compare passes with photo IDs at both checkpoints.

Schneier said yesterday that it would be easy for someone to use a fake boarding pass to bypass the TSA's "no-fly list," which contains the names of thousands of people whom the U.S. government has flagged as potential security or terror risks. A terrorist on the list could make a reservation in someone else's name and print a legitimate pass, along with a fake one in his real name. He'd present the fake pass and real ID at the security gate, then use the legitimate pass to board.

"I think we really need to ask why the government is shooting the messenger here when it should be spending its time fixing this obvious loophole," Schneier said.

After The Storm, Students Left Alone And Angry (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 31 — John McDonogh High School has at least 25 security guards, at the entrance, up the stairs and outside classes. The school has a metal detector, four police officers and four police cruisers on the sidewalk.

In the last six weeks, students at McDonogh, the largest functioning high school here, have assaulted guards, a teacher and a police officer. A guard and a teacher were beaten so badly that they were hospitalized.

The surge hints at a far-reaching phenomenon after Hurricane Katrina, educators here say. Teenagers in the city are living alone or with older siblings or relatives, separated by hundreds of miles from their displaced parents. Dozens of McDonogh students fend largely for themselves, school officials say.

“They are here on their own,” Wanda Daliet, a science teacher, said. “They are raising themselves. And they are angry.”

The principal, Donald Jackson, estimated that up to a fifth of the 775 students live without parents.

“Basically, they are raising themselves, because there is no authority figure in the home,” Mr. Jackson said. “If I call for a parent because I’m having an issue, I may be getting an aunt, who may be at the oldest 20, 21. What type of governance, what type of structure is in the home, if this is the living conditions?”

In a second-floor cosmetology class, two of the six girls said their parents were elsewhere.

“I don’t get to talk to her as much as I want,” one girl, Tiffany Mansion, 16, said as she looked down.

Her mother is in Little Rock, Ark.

In the lunchroom, a shy 18-year-old who was asked whom he went home to in the evenings, said: “Nobody. Myself.”

His parents are in Baton Rouge.

Mr. Jackson said many parents whom he had spoken to were in Baton Rouge, Houston or elsewhere. “That’s the question that’s buzzing in everybody’s heads,” the McDonogh curriculum coordinator, Toyia Washington Kendrick, said. “How could you leave your kids here, that are school-age kids, unattended?”

The answer is as various as the fragmented social structure, which the hurricane a year ago made even more complicated. Some students describe families barely functional even before the storm. Others say pressing economic necessity has kept parents away.

Rachelle Harrell was living in Houston, working as a medical assistant and trying to pay off a $1,300 electricity bill in New Orleans. But she yielded to her son Justin and his cousin Kiante, both 16, and sent them back to New Orleans on a Greyhound bus while she stayed in Texas.

The decision anguished Ms. Harrell, 36, even though Justin was being picked on in Houston and yearned to return to McDonogh. Justin; his sister, Eboni Gay, 18; and Kiante set up housekeeping in Ms. Harrell’s old house in the Algiers neighborhood. A monthly check from his mother and a job at a fast-food restaurant helped make ends meet.

Ms. Harrell anticipated the inevitable question.

DOJ_NMG_0089531

" 'Why are your children at home, and you're in Texas?' " she asked. "Well, I'm trying to get home. It's just crazy. But my kids know my situation. When school started, I had to work a couple of more weeks, because I had that light bill.

"It's like, 'Oh my God, is everything O.K.?' I couldn't even sleep at night. O.K. Lord, if anything happens, I'm going to be seen as such a bad mama, and I'm a hundred miles from home."

Last week, she left her job in Houston and returned to New Orleans — for good.

If the causes are complicated, the consequences seem evident to school officials: a large cadre of belligerent students, hostile to authority and with no worry about parental punishment at home.

Since McDonogh reopened nearly two months ago with enrollees from 5 of the city's 15 high schools, the students have committed six "very serious" assaults, Mr. Jackson said.

A young man suddenly bent over in the milling crowd waiting for a bus after school. The police were handcuffing him, for smoking marijuana, a school official said.

In the halls, students jostle one another and laugh on the way to class. In some classes, students strain attentively toward the blackboard.

But there is tension. The storm overturned their world, teachers and administrators say, destroying houses and scattering families.

"They're rebelling against authority," Ms. Daliet, the science teacher, said. "You ask them to do something, they have an attitude."

In the lunchroom and in the corridors, students are ordered to tuck in their shirts. Many just grin in response.

"When you have guidelines at home that reflect guidelines at the school, it's a seamless transition," Mr. Jackson said. "But when it's not there, you deal with a student who's genuinely, 'I don't care, I'm going to do what I want to do.' "

Fights break out daily. About 50 students have been suspended; 20 have been recommended for expulsion.

Of the 128 schools in the city, fewer half have reopened. The state took over many of them after the storm. That change, hailed at first as a bright beginning, has proven to be partly stillborn, as teachers, textbooks and supplies came up drastically short in the state-run schools.

The McDonogh library has no books. State officials, fearing mold, threw out all of them.

Rundown before the storm, the school buildings are now even more battered. The stalls in a girls' restroom have no doors.

Recrimination and finger pointing have been ample, and state officials are on the defensive.

"The same way other residents are calling it quits, teachers are no different," Leslie Jacobs, a member of the state school board, said. "The teacher shortage is real. The book shortage is real. We have a labor shortage. There is a shortage of bus drivers. The whole food-service industry is short of workers."

Mr. Jackson is a smiling, purposeful presence, friendly but firm, upbraiding youths for slovenly dress and pursuing others along for slacking in the halls. At every turn, it can seem, an omnipresent security guard or police officer speaks to teenagers, searching for weapons or admonishing for back talk.

As a group milled on the street corner of the three-story 1911 brick building, a guard called out from the steps: "He's taken his shirt off! They're getting ready to fight!"

Three burly police officers quickly went up Esplanade Avenue to break up the clash.

Mr. Jackson conceded that the scale of the unrest had taken him aback.

"I knew it would happen," he said. "I had some forewarning. But I didn't know it would be of this magnitude. We've seen things that really shouldn't occur in a school."

Several weeks ago, a teacher was "beaten unmercifully" by a ninth grader enraged at being barred from class because he was late, Mr. Jackson said. The teacher, hospitalized, has not returned to work. The student was arrested.

An 18-year-old knocked a guard unconscious. The police charged him.

The reputation for violence, first acquired through a shooting in the gymnasium in 2003 in which a young man with a rifle killed a student in front of 200 others, has grown.

Three weeks ago, a group of students summoned reporters to the school to complain about the many officers.

"We have a lot of security guards, and not enough teachers," Maya Dawson, 17, said.

Jerinise Walker, 15, added: "It's like you're in jail. You have people watching you all the time."

Mr. Jackson said the time had not come to reduce security.

"When we get our students to respond in a different way," he said, "then I can back off. We're trying to train our students to resolve conflict, and that's something they haven't been able to do."

Rumsfeld OKs Increase In Iraqi Forces (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns

AP, November 1, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Tuesday endorsed a proposal to spend at least $1 billion to expand the size and accelerate the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces.

While the plan still must get final approval from the White House and the money would have to be approved by Congress, Rumsfeld's support underscores the Bush administration's effort to shift more of the burden of Iraq's security to that country's forces.

"I'm very comfortable with the increases they've proposed and the accelerations in achievement of some of their targets," Rumsfeld told reporters at the Pentagon, noting that the Iraqi government and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, both recommended expanding Iraqi forces.

"Now it's simply a matter of our pressing forward and getting our portion of the funding from the Congress and working to see that it's executed," Rumsfeld said. He did not say how much extra U.S. money would be required.

So far, the U.S. government has spent roughly $10 billion on developing the Iraqi security forces, according to the latest report released by the Pentagon special inspector general who audits U.S. work in Iraq. One official, speaking on condition of anonymity, described the proposed extra money as more than $1 billion, but would not offer specifics.

Rumsfeld "approved going forward" with the proposal, which is intended to be part of an add-on to the 2007 budget, according to Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff. It will next be submitted to the White House and other government agencies for their review, Ruff said.

The defense secretary's move comes at a time when the Bush administration has been pressing Iraqi officials to agree to benchmarks with which progress in the war-torn country can be measured. The effort has produced strains with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has resisted being portrayed as beholden to Washington.

Rumsfeld did not cite a dollar figure or reveal how many extra Iraqi forces would be developed, beyond the 325,000 target that U.S. officials say they expect to reach before year's end.

Two defense officials said Tuesday that the expected increase was far fewer than 100,000, and one official suggested it might be about 30,000. Those officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the matter publicly.

CBS News reported on Monday that Casey had recommended expanding the Iraqi security forces by as much as 100,000.

Rumsfeld said the final decision on expanding the Iraqi security forces would be announced in Baghdad.

Asked whether such an increase would mean that U.S. troops would have to stay in Iraq longer to train the extra forces, Rumsfeld said he doubted it. Nor would it necessarily require a higher number of U.S. trainers, he said.

U.S. government approval is required for any plan to expand the size of the Iraqi forces because it could not be accomplished without additional U.S. funds and the provision of U.S. trainers and U.S.-acquired equipment.

Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, said expanding the Iraqi security forces likely means it will take more than the 12 to 18 months Casey has estimated it will take to get the Iraqis fully in control of their own security.

"Congress must have a clear explanation of why these additional forces are needed, what additional American training resources will be put in place, and how this new training plan will allow for a decreased commitment from American forces," Skelton said.

The current plan is to develop 325,000 Iraqi security forces, including the army, police and border control forces. The number trained and equipped thus far is about 310,000, and the final target is expected to be reached by year's end.

However, there are actually fewer than 310,000 Iraqi security forces who are available for duty, since about one-quarter of them are on leave or otherwise not available at any given time, U.S. officials say. Also, their effectiveness has been limited by a lack of heavy weapons and armor, by a high rate of absenteeism, and by an unwillingness of some locally recruited units to fight outside their home areas.

The Pentagon said Tuesday that there are now 150,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, up from 147,000 last week.

Rumsfeld Faces Poll Uncertainty (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089533

The midterm elections next week could help decide the fate of two of the most controversial Bush administration officials, Donald Rumsfeld, the defence secretary, and John Bolton, the ambassador to the United Nations.

Mr Bolton, the hardline official known for his abrasive approach who was given a "recess" appointment last year after the Senate failed to approve his nomination, might only have three weeks or so left in office if, as is generally expected, the elections result in a swing to the Democrats. Mr Rumsfeld, on the other hand, is coming under increased fire from Republicans for his handling of the Iraq war.

When a recess appointment expires is not precisely defined, and it has been reported that Mr Bolton will stay until January before the next session of Congress begins. But two officials told the FT that, unless the Senate confirmed him, Mr Bolton's term would end when Congress recessed after the elections, which is likely to happen before Thanksgiving on November 23.

Mr Bolton could leave at a crucial moment in negotiations over a Security Council sanctions resolution to be imposed on Iran, which the Bush administration hopes to settle before Thanksgiving.

Mr Rumsfeld faces a different problem. The two-time defence secretary will next month overtake Robert McNamara, the Vietnam-era Pentagon chief, as the longest-serving holder of the office. But Mr Rumsfeld is facing increased criticism over the violence in Iraq.

A group of retired generals earlier this year took the rare step of publicly calling for his resignation.

In his latest book, Washington Post journalist Bob Woodward reported that Andrew Card, former chief of staff to Mr Bush, and Laura Bush, the president's wife, had both urged Mr Bush to replace his defence secretary. A recent CNN poll found that 52 per cent of Americans believed Mr Bush should fire Mr Rumsfeld, compared with only 39 per cent six months ago.

A former senior administration official said Mr Rumsfeld might leave if the Iraq Study Group – a bipartisan commission led by James Baker, former secretary of state and close friend of Mr Bush's father – comes up with radical policy suggestions for Iraq.

Another influential Republican with close ties to the White House said the consensus among Republican insiders was that Mr Rumsfeld would remain only until next summer. That would provide enough time after the elections to avoid the impression he was going because of the war, and also allow time for the situation on the ground to improve.

But Peter Brookes, a former senior Pentagon official under Mr Rumsfeld, said that while a Democrat victory in the elections would prompt Republicans into wielding "long knives", Mr Bush was unlikely to waver in his support for Mr Rumsfeld, partly out of loyalty, and partly because it would be counter-productive to change horses mid-stream.

U.S. Central Command Charts Sharp Movement Of The Civil Conflict In Iraq Toward Chaos (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 30 — A classified briefing prepared two weeks ago by the United States Central Command portrays Iraq as edging toward chaos, in a chart that the military is using as a barometer of civil conflict.

A one-page slide shown at the Oct. 18 briefing provides a rare glimpse into how the military command that oversees the war is trying to track its trajectory, particularly in terms of sectarian fighting.

The slide includes a color-coded bar chart that is used to illustrate an "Index of Civil Conflict." It shows a sharp escalation in sectarian violence since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, and tracks a further worsening this month despite a concerted American push to tamp down the violence in Baghdad.

In fashioning the index, the military is weighing factors like the ineffectual Iraqi police and the dwindling influence of moderate religious and political figures, rather than more traditional military measures such as the enemy's fighting strength and the control of territory.

The conclusions the Central Command has drawn from these trends are not encouraging, according to a copy of the slide that was obtained by The New York Times. The slide shows Iraq as moving sharply away from "peace," an ideal on the far left side of the chart, to a point much closer to the right side of the spectrum, a red zone marked "chaos." As depicted in the command's chart, the needle has been moving steadily toward the far right of the chart.

An intelligence summary at the bottom of the slide reads "urban areas experiencing 'ethnic cleansing' campaigns to consolidate control" and "violence at all-time high, spreading geographically." According to a Central Command official, the index on civil strife has been a staple of internal command briefings for most of this year. The analysis was prepared by the command's intelligence directorate, which is overseen by Brig. Gen. John M. Custer.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, who heads the command, warned publicly in August about the risk of civil war in Iraq, but he said then that he thought it could be averted. In evaluating the prospects for all-out civil strife, the command concentrates on "key reads," or several principal variables.

According to the slide from the Oct. 18 briefing, the variables include "hostile rhetoric" by political and religious leaders, which can be measured by listening to sermons at mosques and to important Shiite and Sunni leaders, and the amount of influence that moderate political and religious figures have over the population. The other main variables are assassinations and other especially provocative sectarian attacks, as well as "spontaneous mass civil conflict."

A number of secondary indicators are also taken into account, including activity by militias, problems with ineffective police, the ability of Iraqi officials to govern effectively, the number of civilians who have been forced to move by sectarian violence, the willingness of Iraqi security forces to follow orders, and the degree to which the Iraqi Kurds are pressing for independence from the central government.

These factors are evaluated to create the index of civil strife, which has registered a steady worsening for months. "Ever since the February attack on the Shiite mosque in Samarra, it has been closer to the chaos side than the peace side," said a Central Command official who asked not to be identified because he was talking about classified information.

In the Oct. 18 brief, the index moved still another notch toward "chaos." That briefing was prepared three days before General Abizaid met in Washington with President Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to take stock of the situation in Iraq.

A spokesman for the Central Command declined to comment on the index or other information in the slide. "We don't comment on secret material," the spokesman said.

One significant factor in the military's decision to move the scale toward "chaos" was the expanding activity by militias.

Another reason was the limitations of Iraqi government security forces, which despite years of training and equipping by the United States, are either ineffective or, in some cases, infiltrated by the very militias they are supposed to be combating. The slide notes that "ineffectual" Iraqi police forces have been a significant problem, and cites as a concern sectarian conflicts between Iraqi security forces.

Other significant factors are in the political realm. The slide notes that Iraq's political and religious leaders have lost some of their moderating influence over their constituents or adherents.

Notably, the slide also cites difficulties that the new Iraqi administration has experienced in "governance." That appears to be shorthand for the frustration felt by American military officers about the Iraqi government's delays in bringing about a genuine political reconciliation between Shiites and Sunnis. It also appears to apply to the lack of reconstruction programs to restore essential services and the dearth of job creation efforts to give young Iraqis an alternative to joining militias, as well as the absence of firm action against militias.

The slide lists other factors that are described as important but less significant. They include efforts by Iran and Syria to enable violence by militias and insurgent groups and the interest by many Kurds in achieving independence. The slide describes violence motivated by sectarian differences as having moved into a "critical" phase.

The chart does note some positive developments. Specifically, it notes that "hostile rhetoric" by political and religious leaders has not increased. It also notes that Iraqi security forces are refusing less often than in the past to take orders from the central government and that there has been a drop-off in mass desertions.

Still, for a military culture that thrives on PowerPoint briefings, the shifting index was seen by some officials as a stark warning about the difficult course of events in Iraq, and mirrored growing concern by some military officers.

U.S. Military Deaths In Iraq Still Mostly Outside Capital (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 31 — About two-thirds of the deaths among American troops in Iraq in October occurred outside Baghdad, even with a sharp increase in combat deaths in the capital that made it the fourth deadliest month of the war for the United States, Defense Department figures show.

The October death toll, which stood at 103 by late Tuesday, was the highest since January 2005, when 107 American troops were killed.

Forty American soldiers were killed in and around Baghdad in October, double the number there just two months ago, a review of casualty reports shows.

Military officers and civilian analysts said the rise in October resulted in part from more aggressive American security operations in Baghdad, which exposed larger numbers of troops to danger. The security operation in the capital put American troops on the streets not only in greater numbers, but more often on foot patrols outside their armored vehicles, where they were more vulnerable to improvised bombs and a growing threat of snipers.

The spike in violence in the capital was accompanied by higher tolls in other parts of the country, notably in Anbar Province, where 37 Americans died and deaths have climbed steadily since this summer.

The jump in combat deaths in October mirrored the annual rise in violence that coincides with the Islamic holy month of Ramadan. Military officers and civilian analysts rejected assertions by some Bush administration officials that the insurgents had planned offensives to influence the elections in the United States next Tuesday.

Hidden bombs remained the single biggest killer, and more deaths occurred throughout Iraq from such devices in October than in any previous month but one. Beyond that, more soldiers were also killed by small-arms fire and snipers than in the past, according to officials and the casualty reports.

Throughout Iraq, more American soldiers were killed by snipers in the first 10 days of October than were killed by sniper fire in all of September, according to an Army spokesman, Paul Boyce. He declined to release precise numbers.

"When you put people into urban warfare, they have to come out of their vehicles," said Anthony H. Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "No matter how you run it, if your orders are to be more active on the ground, you are more vulnerable."

Lt. Col. Jonathan B. Withington, an Army spokesman for the multinational division responsible for Baghdad and central Iraq, said casualties were high in October because there were "twice as many forces on the ground conducting operations in Baghdad." He also cited Ramadan, and said the enemy was "attempting to push back on us" in response to the new security operation.

There are now about 150,000 American troops in Iraq, and troop numbers are likely to remain at that level until the end of the year, as units rotating into the country overlap with others due to leave, according to Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman.

The Department of Defense posts cumulative statistics on those killed and wounded in Iraq at its Web site www.defenselink.mil/news/, where statistics on Tuesday showed 2,258 American military personnel had been killed in Iraq in combat and 556 in nonhostile incidents. The number of troops wounded in Iraq who have returned to duty stood at 11,682, and the number of those wounded so severely that they could not return to duty was 9,737.

Statistics provided by Michael S. White and Glenn Kutler of ICasualties.org, a privately operated database that uses the Defense Department's official casualty announcements, indicated the geographical distribution of October fatalities: roughly one-third in Baghdad; one-third in Anbar Province, the restive western area that is a haven for Sunni insurgents and associates of Al Qaeda; and one-third in volatile cities to the north, including Taji, Tikrit, Samarra, Kirkuk and Mosul.

All are areas that have proven persistently difficult to pacify since the American-led invasion of March 2003.

"This was a significant month for casualties," said Lt. Col. Bryan F. Salas of the Marine Corps, the spokesman for multinational forces in Anbar. "We are in more towns, and we are clearing and holding parts of Ramadi and other cities where we haven't been before."

Mr. White also wrote, "The current spike, which is indeed the highest in a year, occurred during Ramadan, as did the last spike of comparable magnitude a year ago." He added: "This Ramadan spike is not a one-time phenomenon. It is the fourth that we have experienced since the war began."

Senior administration officials, including Vice President Dick Cheney, have acknowledged the trend of increased violence during Ramadan, but also have sought to portray this October's increase in violence as timed to the midterm election, with insurgents hoping to influence the American political process.

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled, and they can get on the Web sites like anybody else," Mr. Cheney said Monday in an interview with Fox News. "And I do believe that that's a part of it. I think we've also seen, of course, a higher level of violence because of Ramadan."

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a policy research center, said the casualty statistics not only showed the overall strength of the insurgency, but also reflected the increase in sectarian violence and the decision over the summer by the Americans and the Iraqi government to confront killings by both organized militias and renegade insurgents.

"Now we have to juxtapose the insurgency with the strength of militias," Mr. O'Hanlon said.

More Than Ever, Insurgents Are Targeting U.S. Forces (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

Baghdad — For U.S. troops, October was a month of gritty skirmishes against fighters religiously motivated to risk their lives during the holy Muslim month of Ramadan.

October's death toll, the highest for American forces in nearly two years, came during a period without conventional battles or catastrophic helicopter crashes.

Rather, the 103 troops killed in Baghdad and across Iraq were victims of a steady onslaught of assaults, primarily by their longtime nemeses, Sunni Arab insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0089536

The number of attacks on American forces increased in October to unprecedented levels, U.S. military officials said.

"There has been a much more considered effort to specifically target coalition and Iraqi security forces," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the spokesman for U.S.-led forces in Iraq, told reporters in Baghdad as the month wore on. "There has been a steady increase in the number of attacks specifically against security forces."

There were 224 Iraqi security forces and 1,315 civilians killed in October.

It was a month in which U.S. forces were shot by snipers, struck by rocket-propelled grenades or lured into ambushes where they were sprayed with automatic-weapon fire from the AK-47s found in so many Iraqi homes.

But improvised explosive devices left along roads remained the weapon of choice for Iraq's anti-American insurgency.

Despite jamming devices, tactical adjustments and the increased armoring of military vehicles, at least 51 of the U.S. deaths resulted from makeshift bombs detonated by remote control from a comfortable distance.

At least 43 deaths occurred in Baghdad, indicating a shifting focus away from the Sunni heartland toward Iraq's capital "due to our more deliberate presence, more active involvement out there," Caldwell said last week.

U.S. forces were more exposed than usual in Baghdad because of an ongoing offensive aimed at taking back the streets from the forces of sectarian warfare — Sunni insurgents and Shiite Muslim militiamen, some allied with officials of the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government.

Though U.S. officials say the Shiite militias dominating Iraq's south pose the biggest long-term threat to the country's stability, the vast majority of the Americans were killed in Sunni-dominated areas.

The deaths in Baghdad occurred largely in Sunni-dominated neighborhoods on the west side. Thirty-seven American troops died west of Baghdad, in largely Sunni Al Anbar province. Sunni insurgents in the Euphrates River towns and cities of Iraq's desert hinterlands deem U.S. troops an occupation force and the Baghdad government, run by the nation's long-subjugated Shiite majority, little more than an American puppet.

The Marine Corps, unlike the Army, does not release information about the exact location or cause of deaths. Senior Marine officers think such information could help the enemy. The Marines, in public announcements, described at least 18 of the October deaths as "hostile" incidents in Al Anbar.

Most officials acknowledge that many of the Marine casualties in October occurred in Ramadi, the rundown provincial capital where insurgents have intimidated most Iraqi government workers into fleeing. Marines face daily threats from roadside bombs, snipers and assaults on their fortified bases.

"It's combat nearly every day," one Marine officer said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Ramadi is where the terrorists want to establish their capital. They're armed and they're relentless."

Another 17 Americans were killed in Sunni Arab areas north of Baghdad, in and around the provincial capitals of Tikrit, Baqubah, Mosul and Kirkuk, where Kurds and Sunni Arabs are fighting for dominance.

October's death toll was the highest since the month preceding Iraq's Jan. 31, 2005, elections.

On average, the American troops who died last month were men in their mid-20s, many on patrols or combat missions in and around a jittery Baghdad full of trash fires, dust storms and morning explosions.

Typical of the fatalities was Staff Sgt. Kevin M. Witte, 27, of Beardsley, a farming town in western Minnesota, along the South Dakota line.

He died Oct. 20 in Baghdad when an improvised explosive device detonated near his vehicle during a combat patrol.

Such roadside bomb explosions in densely populated areas smash windows and cause panic among Iraqi pedestrians, drivers and residents. Wild gunfire erupts. Alarmed and confused, their eardrums shattered, U.S. troops start shooting or receive small-arms fire from hidden insurgents.

Helicopters arrive to scour the terrain for culprits and attend to the wounded and dying. Bradley fighting vehicles block off the area as the injured are ferried to medical facilities.

A dead soldier's comrades gather at outdoor ceremonies. The silence lingers after his name is read in a commemorative roll call. And a trumpeter plays taps.

Iraqi PM Ends Some Joint Checkpoints (AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

AP, November 1, 2006

Exploiting GOP vulnerability in the Nov. 7 elections, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki flexed his political muscle Tuesday and won U.S. agreement to lift military blockades on Sadr City and another Shiite enclave where an American soldier was abducted.

U.S. forces, who had set up the checkpoints in Baghdad last week as part of an unsuccessful search for the soldier, drove away in Humvees and armored personnel carriers at the 5 p.m. deadline set by al-Maliki. Iraqi troops, who had manned the checkpoints with the Americans, loaded coils of razor wire and red traffic cones onto pickup trucks.

Their departure set off celebrations among civilians and armed men in Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite district controlled by the Mahdi Army militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Small groups of men and children danced in circles chanting slogans praising and declaring victory for al-Sadr, whose political support is crucial to the prime minister's governing coalition.

The prime minister's challenge to U.S. conduct of the war was the latest in a series of acts designed to force the American hand and test Washington's readiness to give him a greater say in securing the world's most violent capital.

Al-Maliki finds himself in a maze of conflicting political pressures. After the Bush administration unveiled a plan last week for Iraq's government to adopt timelines for progress, especially in curbing violence, al-Maliki accused Washington of infringing on national sovereignty. There was no doubt he was talking tough to show both the Americans and his political base that he would not be pushed around.

The prime minister has further said that he feels stanching bloodshed might be better handled by Iraqi forces, although his argument does not wash given the present state of his military. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld endorsed a proposal Tuesday to spend at least $1 billion to expand the size and accelerate the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces, underscoring the Bush administration's effort to shift more of the burden away from U.S. troops.

Sen. Jack Reed, a member of the Armed Services Committee, said al-Maliki was yielding to sectarian pressure and undermining U.S. efforts to curb attacks. "Today, the critical issue in Iraq is whether the Maliki government can muster the political will to confront those who use violence to destabilize Iraq," Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat, said in a statement.

Al-Maliki's move Tuesday came three days after his closest aide, Hassan al-Suneid, said unabashedly that the prime minister was trying to capitalize on American voter discontent with the war and White House reluctance to open a public fight with the Iraqi leader just before the midterm election. Much of the discontent is fueled by soaring death tolls among U.S. troops and their inability to contain raging sectarian violence 3 1/2 years after the ouster of Saddam Hussein.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two soldiers in fighting in the Baghdad area Monday, one from small arms fire, the other from a roadside bomb. The October death toll stood at 103, the fourth highest monthly figure of the war.

More than 40 Iraqis were killed or found dead across the country Tuesday, including 11 Shiites who perished in a suicide car bombing at a wedding on the north side of the capital. Four of those killed at the bride's home were children, and among the 21 wounded were several youngsters with burns over much of their bodies.

There were conflicting reports on whether al-Maliki ordered the blockades lifted with or without prior consultation with American military officials in Baghdad.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said the decision was reached jointly at a meeting Tuesday among al-Maliki, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

They agreed to make adjustments in the checkpoints because of problems with traffic and pedestrian flows in the area, the spokesman said. He said Casey ordered the actions after the meeting.

A senior American diplomat said al-Maliki issued the order after the meeting "to address the problems that resulted with the flow of traffic and the disruption of essential daily activity for the average citizens of Baghdad. This was a joint decision." The diplomat spoke on condition of anonymity.

Defense Ministry spokesman Brig. Qassim al-Moussawi said the U.S. military was consulted, but only after al-Maliki made the decision at a meeting Tuesday with his ministers of defense and interior and the national security adviser.

Al-Suneid said the prime minister acted without checking first with the Americans because the blockades had "backfired and made the security situation in Baghdad worse. It is not important that such decisions always be made jointly."

U.S. troops have increased their presence on Baghdad streets as part of a 3-month-old security crackdown, but they had rarely set up checkpoints in the city until the U.S. soldier was abducted a week ago in the Karradah district in central Baghdad. American forces sealed the neighborhood Oct. 23 and closed Sadr City two days later, apparently believing the missing man was being held there. U.S. forces lifted the blockades in both areas Tuesday.

Al-Maliki's order came just hours after al-Sadr announced a campaign of civil disobedience in Sadr City, a district of 2.5 million people in the northeast corner of Baghdad. Armed men forced shops to close, hustled children out of schools and blocked residents from going to jobs in other parts of the capital.

As soon as news broke that the security cordon was lifted, al-Sadr supporters declared it a victory for their leader.

"If they had not lifted the siege, our strike would have spread to the rest of Baghdad tomorrow and the whole of Iraq the next day," said Jalil Nouri, a senior al-Sadr aide.

In issuing the order to lift the blockade, the prime minister said U.S.-manned checkpoints should not be established in Baghdad except during curfew hours from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m. He also said U.S. and Iraq forces would not give up on trying to calm the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0089538

"Joint efforts continue to pursue terrorists and outlaws who expose the lives of citizens to killings, abductions and explosions," said the statement, issued in al-Maliki's name in his capacity both as prime minister and commander of the Iraqi armed forces.

Iraqi Demands Pullback; US Lifts Baghdad Cordon (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 31 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki demanded the removal of American checkpoints from the streets of Baghdad on Tuesday, in what appeared to be his latest and boldest gambit in an increasingly tense struggle for more independence from his American protectors.

Mr. Maliki's public declaration seemed at first to catch American commanders off guard. But by nightfall, American troops had abandoned all the positions in eastern and central Baghdad that they had set up last week with Iraqi forces as part of a search for a missing American soldier. The checkpoints had snarled traffic and disrupted daily life and commerce throughout the eastern part of the city.

The language of the declaration, which implied that Mr. Maliki had the power to command American forces, seemed to overstep his authority and to be aimed at placating his Shiite constituency.

The withdrawal was greeted with jubilation in the streets of Sadr City, the densely populated Shiite enclave where the Americans have focused their manhunt and where anti-American sentiment runs high. The initial American reaction to the order, which was released by Mr. Maliki's press office, strongly suggested that the statement had not been issued in concert with the American authorities.

"Our commanders have his press release and are reviewing how best to address these concerns," Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman in Baghdad, said early Tuesday afternoon, about an hour after the order was issued.

Late Tuesday night, after hours of silence, a senior American Embassy official who had been delegated to return reporters' phone calls said the prime minister's order was "the result of a meeting" between Mr. Maliki, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq. "It was essentially something that Maliki wanted to do and Casey agreed to it," the official said.

But Mr. Maliki's announcement may have been a foregone conclusion: the meeting was at 1 p.m., officials said, and the prime minister's office issued his press release at about 1:20 p.m.

Tensions between Mr. Maliki and President Bush have been building for months. American officials have grown impatient with the Iraqi government's inability to curb Shiite militias accused of sectarian killings and to reduce the insurgent violence. For their part, Mr. Maliki and other leading Shiites have begun to chafe at American control of the military and what they view as American favoritism toward Sunnis.

Those tensions erupted publicly last week, to be followed by shows of reconciliation.

On Wednesday, Mr. Maliki challenged an American assertion that the two governments had agreed on a timetable for stabilizing Iraq. On Thursday and Friday, he issued angry comments pointedly voicing his independence from the Americans, including an account circulated by his aide of an acrimonious meeting with Mr. Khalilzad, during which Mr. Maliki was said to have told the ambassador that he was "a friend of the United States, but not America's man in Iraq." On Saturday, the White House convened a videoconference at which Mr. Maliki publicly praised President Bush.

The abrupt declaration by Mr. Maliki on Tuesday followed a visit to Baghdad on Monday by President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, who was here to discuss how to reverse the country's slide toward all-out civil war.

Violence continued to torment the country on Tuesday, including the mass kidnapping of at least 50 civilians by gunmen on a road north of Baghdad, and the announcement that 2 more American troops had been killed, raising the toll of American deaths this month to at least 103.

Mr. Maliki had been under pressure from his Shiite backers to push the Americans to lift an eight-day-old cordon around Sadr City, where American authorities believe the kidnapped American soldier is being held.

The soldier was abducted in the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karada on Oct. 23 after leaving the fortified Green Zone without authorization. Three people were detained early Tuesday in the latest raid in Sadr City as part of the manhunt, the American military said. Although the military has not released the name of the soldier, members of an Iraqi family who said they were the missing soldier's in-laws identified him as Ahmed Qusai al-Taei, 41.

Moktada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite cleric who counts Sadr City as his greatest bastion of support and who wields considerable influence in Mr. Maliki's ruling Shiite coalition, called for a general strike in the neighborhood on Tuesday to protest the cordon. In its search for the soldier, the American military has singled out the Mahdi Army militia, which has grown increasingly fractured but still answers in part to Mr. Sadr.

Joint American-Iraqi roadblocks and checkpoints at the entrances to the neighborhood, and others erected in Karada, have caused major traffic jams, impeded commerce, turned short commutes into ordeals lasting hours and provoked the ire of Iraqis. On Monday, Mr. Sadr, who led two uprisings against American troops in 2004, threatened unspecified action if the American "siege" continued.

The wording of Mr. Maliki's statement on Tuesday seemed intended to curry political favor with the residents and power brokers of Sadr City. "Mr. Nuri al-Maliki, the general commander of the armed forces, has issued an order to remove all barriers and checkpoints and open all entrances in Sadr City and all other areas in Baghdad and ease traffic jams in these areas no later than 5 p.m. today," it said.

Under United Nations resolutions that remain in effect, the American military exercises control over American troops in Iraq, but consults closely with the Iraqi government as a partner. For that reason, the declaration appeared to be as much about Mr. Maliki's stagecraft as about practical effects on the ground.

Within an hour of the statement, American troops had already begun pulling away from the checkpoints on the edge of Sadr City, according to witnesses, though Iraqi security forces remained behind. Lt. Col. Jonathan B. Withington, a military spokesman in Baghdad, said the order would affect only the checkpoints established in the last week, not all the checkpoints manned by Iraqi security forces.

When asked whether the American withdrawal was a response to the prime minister's statement, Colonel Withington chose his words carefully: "We were ordered by our military chain of command not to impede traffic" in Karada and on the eastern access roads to Sadr City, he said.

The country's Sunni leadership condemned Mr. Maliki's decision, saying it would upend the Baghdad security plan and expose the population to greater violence. General Casey said last week that Iraqi security forces still needed at least a year before they would be ready to take over full control of the country's security.

Tariq al-Hashemi, one of Iraq's two vice-presidents and the leader of the largest Sunni Arab bloc, said the prime minister's decision "will allow the terrorists and the insurgents to move freely." He said that civilians' lives should be more important than saving a few hours during a commute.

A National Police officer posted at a checkpoint near the Habibiya Bridge entrance to Sadr City said the departure of the Americans, who had left 15 minutes earlier, would make his job more difficult. "They helped us to stop everyone," said the officer, who gave only his first name, Salam. "If we are alone, we can't say a word against certain people."

Mr. Maliki's order said that special security measures, such as the latest roadblocks, "will be carried out only during the curfew period and in emergencies." It added: "Joint efforts to track down the terrorists and outlaws who jeopardize the lives of people by killing and kidnapping will continue."

According to senior Shiite politicians close to Mr. Maliki, the Americans had been extremely reluctant, if not opposed, to withdrawing from their roadblocks and checkpoints in Karada and Sadr City.

Ali al-Adeeb, a Shiite member of Parliament and a senior member of Mr. Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party, said the prime minister had discussed the matter of the roadblocks with American officials during the past several days. In a meeting on Monday, Mr. Adeeb said, American officials had asked Mr. Maliki to give them 72 hours before issuing his order.

Hassan al-Sined, an adviser to the prime minister and a senior Dawa Party member, said he doubted that the order was coordinated with the Americans. "I don't think he got the Americans' opinion," Mr. Sined said, though he said he was not privy to details of Tuesday's meeting.

If the declaration was intended to show Mr. Maliki as a forceful and decisive leader, as far Mr. Sined was concerned, it had that effect. The order demonstrated that Mr. Maliki was "a strong and brave prime minister," he said. "He behaved like a successful prime minister."

The senior American Embassy official said that the embassy applauded the boldness of Mr. Maliki's declaration. "We're actually encouraging the prime minister to take responsibility," he said. "So trying to sound like he's a leader here in Iraq is a good thing."

Mr. Maliki was not available for comment and his spokesman, who is the only administration official authorized to speak on the prime minister's behalf, was in Kuwait on Thursday. When contacted by telephone late Tuesday, the spokesman said he had only just heard about Mr. Maliki's order and could offer no details.

The victims of the mass kidnapping north of Baghdad on Tuesday were mostly Shiites and were ambushed by gunmen as they traveled in cars along a road from the capital to Balad, according to an official in the news media office of Salahuddin Province, north of Baghdad. The gunmen stopped the cars and scrutinized the occupants' identification before abducting the victims, the official said.

The American military announced that two soldiers died in Baghdad on Monday, one when a bomb exploded next to his vehicle and the other by small arms fire. With at least 103 announced deaths, October has been the fourth-deadliest month for

American troops since the beginning of the war. The other highest monthly tolls were 107 in January 2005, 135 in April 2004, and 137 in November 2004.

U.S., Iraqi Forces Lift Baghdad Slum Blockades (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, November 1, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops dismantled checkpoints around the capital's Sadr City slum, a Shiite militia stronghold, after an order Tuesday by Iraq's prime minister to pull back.

The directive from Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was his latest attempt to assert authority over the 4-month-old joint U.S. and Iraqi campaign to stabilize Baghdad.

U.S. and Iraqi troops cordoned off Sadr City after the Oct. 23 disappearance and apparent kidnapping of a U.S. soldier of Iraqi descent. On Tuesday, U.S. troops were searching the neighborhood and checking vehicles entering and leaving the district when they got the order to remove the checkpoints.

Sadr City is home to 2.5 million Shiites and is the political base of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army.

Al-Maliki's government, nominally a coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, is dominated by a Shiite majority bloc. Al-Sadr's political organization is among the most powerful groups within that bloc.

The Sadr City security cordon had caused hours-long traffic backups. Residents celebrated after the blockade was lifted.

Al-Sadr had warned on Monday that his forces might retaliate in response to the security ring around Sadr City.

"If this siege continues for long, we will resort to action," he said.

Al-Maliki's office said Tuesday that he had ordered the pullback.

In a statement, the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad said U.S. and Iraqi forces opened "selected" checkpoints and crossing points after a meeting between al-Maliki, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the U.S. commander in Iraq.

The changes were made "to address problems with the flow of traffic and the disruptions to essential daily activity for the citizens of Baghdad," the embassy said.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said checkpoints were pulled away in time to meet a 5 p.m. deadline set by al-Maliki.

Al-Maliki has chafed at pressure from the U.S. military and the Bush administration to force militias to disarm immediately. In recent days, he has sharply differed with U.S. statements that his government had agreed to specific goals and dates for reaching political and security aims, including disbanding sectarian militias. He also criticized a U.S.-led raid in Sadr City and vowed it would not be repeated.

"It shouldn't be surprising to see al-Maliki pushing back," said Stephen Biddle, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "It means we're leaning on him and it's having an effect."

Al-Maliki said in a recent interview with USA TODAY that he has targeted rogue militia cells. He said he plans to disband militias later this year or early next year.

Col. Talib Abdul Razzaq, a commander with the 2nd Brigade of the Iraqi army's 6th Division, said al-Maliki's government has interfered in military operations.

The joint U.S.-Iraqi security operation underway in the capital since June has not eased violence, in part because sectarian militias remain active. Many are affiliated with political parties that are blocking efforts by security forces to confront the militias, Razzaq said.

"Every area in Baghdad is supported by a specific militia, and this militia is supported by a specific political party that's in government," he said. When security forces target militias, political groups "call the government quickly and they stop our operation."

Some U.S. military officials in Baghdad said tension between al-Maliki and U.S. officials has not interfered in their day-to-day operations. "Does the prime minister's decision appear to be influenced by al-Sadr and (the Mahdi Army)? Sure, on the surface it may look like that," said Maj. Mark Cheadle, a spokesman for U.S. troops in central and southern Baghdad. "But from our perspective, we don't feel a conflict of interest.

"At our level, there's no question of our objective: We want to get the bad guys and we want security for these neighborhoods."

Some Sadr City Barriers Removed (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089541

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki today ordered U.S. and Iraqi forces to remove roadblocks enclosing a vast Shiite Muslim neighborhood in the capital that is part of his power base.

Soon after, U.S. forces removed some of the concrete barriers that have restricted movement in and out of Sadr City since last week, when troops began searching for a missing U.S. soldier and hunting for a death squad leader in the mainly Shiite community.

Maliki, who has engaged in tense exchanges with the Bush administration during the past week over the extent of the U.S. involvement in security matters, said in a statement that such checkpoints would only be set up at night or in emergencies.

The move came as Iraqi authorities said they were investigating reports that a busload of people had been kidnapped on a main highway between Baghdad and northern Iraq.

Witnesses said gunmen stopped three minibuses and seized more than 30 people. During the wave of sectarian violence that has gripped the country for months, kidnapping victims have often turned up dead.

Meanwhile, a car bomb outside a pre-wedding gathering in northeastern Baghdad killed at least 15 people, including four children, and injured more than 20 others. A separate bomb attack earlier killed three people at the edge of Sadr City.

Maliki's order to take down the roadblocks could help boost his political standing among Iraqis who have grown disappointed in his leadership and irritated over what they view as American meddling. Shiite militants in Sadr City earlier in the day had called a general strike to protest the checkpoints, where long queues had formed as U.S. troops stopped and searched cars.

Maliki, a Shiite, has chafed at the American role, urging President Bush last week to give Iraqi forces more leeway in dealing with armed militias after months of sectarian killing.

The prime minister criticized a raid in Sadr City last week as a sign of inadequate coordination between the two governments and asserted to Bush that he was not "America's man in Iraq."

U.S. forces had failed to locate the missing soldier and were under increasing public pressure to loosen the closures on the vast Sadr City neighborhood, with 2.5 million residents.

While some observers said the restrictions had curbed violence by impeding the movement of armed groups, many residents of Sadr City held U.S. forces at least partly responsible for a fatal bomb blast in the neighborhood Monday that killed 31 people at a crowded gathering spot for day laborers.

Residents said that U.S. and Iraqi forces had left them without effective defense by removing members of the Al Mahdi army, the militia tied to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

The cleric's followers ordered businesses in the community to close in protest. Sadr warned a day earlier that his supporters would take unspecified actions unless the restrictions were eased soon.

Al-Maliki Wins Pact With U.S. To Lift Blockades (WT/AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki flexed his political muscle yesterday by winning U.S. agreement to lift military blockades on Sadr City and another Shi'iite enclave where an American soldier was abducted.

U.S. forces, who had set up the checkpoints in Baghdad last week as part of an unsuccessful search for the soldier, drove away in Humvees and armored personnel carriers at the 5 p.m. deadline set by Mr. al-Maliki.

Iraqi troops, who had manned the checkpoints with the Americans, loaded coils of razor wire and red traffic cones onto pickup trucks.

Their departure prompted celebrations among civilians and armed men in Sadr City, the sprawling Shi'ite district controlled by the Mahdi Army militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The prime minister's challenge to U.S. conduct of the war was the latest in a series of acts designed to force the American hand and test Washington's readiness to give him a greater say in securing the world's most violent capital.

Mr. al-Maliki's move yesterday came three days after his closest aide, Hassan al-Suneid, said unabashedly that the prime minister was trying to capitalize on American voter discontent with the war and White House reluctance to start a public fight with the Iraqi leader just before the midterm election.

More than 40 Iraqis were killed or found dead across the country Tuesday, including 11 Shi'ites who perished in a suicide car bombing at a wedding on the north side of the capital. Four of those killed at the bride's home were children, and among the 21 wounded were several youngsters with burns over much of their bodies.

There were conflicting reports about whether Mr. al-Maliki ordered the blockades lifted with or without consultation with American military officials in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0089542

State Department spokesman Tom Casey said the decision was reached jointly at a meeting attended by Mr. al-Maliki, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

They agreed to make adjustments in the checkpoints because of problems with traffic and pedestrian flows in the area, the spokesman said. He said Gen. Casey ordered the actions after the meeting.

A senior American diplomat said Mr. al-Maliki issued the order after the meeting "to address the problems that resulted with the flow of traffic and the disruption of essential daily activity for the average citizens of Baghdad. This was a joint decision."

Defense Ministry spokesman Brig. Qassim al-Moussawi said the U.S. military was consulted, but only after Mr. al-Maliki made the decision at a meeting with his ministers of defense and interior and the national security adviser.

Mr. al-Suneid said the prime minister acted without checking first with the Americans, because the blockades had "backfired and made the security situation in Baghdad worse. It is not important that such decisions always be made jointly."

U.S. Officers Detail Problems With Iraqi Soldiers (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

U.S. military advisers are confronting difficult behavior from Iraqi soldiers, who tend to fire all their ammunition in response to a single sniper shot or go on rampages even against civilians upon witnessing the death of a colleague, according to Lt. Col. Carl D. Grunow, a former adviser to an Iraqi army armored brigade.

"The 'burst reaction' may be attributed to Iraqis experiencing denial, anger and grief all at the same time," Grunow wrote in a recent article published in Military Review, the bimonthly publication of the U.S. Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

He attributes that reaction to the Iraqi army's experience in the "high-intensity Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, a war with clear battle lines fought with mass military formations." At that time, Grunow writes, "Iranian human-wave assaults presented Iraqi soldiers with a target rich environment" and "battlefields covered with bodies following huge expenditures of ammunition."

His article, based on his year in Iraq, which ended in June, is in the July-August Military Review and is one of several in recent issues that have dealt forthrightly with concerns of military participants with the U.S. effort to rebuild Iraq's army during the ongoing war.

For example, Grunow writes that Iraqi units drop in strength as much as 20 percent after paydays because soldiers take leave and go home. Lt. Gen. John R. Vines, who commanded the Multi-National Corps-Iraq in Baghdad from January 2005 to January 2006, picks up that theme in an article in the most recent Military Review. "The lack of a central banking system detracted from forces available. . . . Soldiers once a month must journey back to their homes to pay debts and pass the money on to their families . . . [and] are normally gone for up to a week, with the resultant loss to the unit of ready combat power," Vines writes.

Grunow also notes that some Iraqi soldiers do not show up for training that is difficult, and he says that up to 40 percent of some Iraqi units run away in the face of dangerous situations -- without punishment. Their officers, Grunow writes, value relationships rather than results and frequently fail to notice misconduct or failure.

He argues that U.S. advisers must deal honestly with the local culture because Iraqi soldiers "are under no effective contract and they always have the option to leave the service. The only power holding them is the promise of a paycheck (not always delivered) and a sense of duty."

Not all the critiques in recent Military Affairs issues center on lessons learned abroad. Some are aimed at officials in Washington.

"The trust senior officers repose in senior civilian officials has eroded," writes F.J. Bing West, who was an assistant secretary of defense in the Reagan administration and is a frequent traveler to Iraq and a consultant to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's office. "Inside the senior levels of the military and among those who follow foreign policy, anger is directed at elected and appointed civilian officials seen as too blithe in initiating the war and too obtuse in leading once the going got tough," West writes in his article on the U.S. military performance in Iraq in the new Military Review.

"While there is no unity of military judgment about the civilian management of the war, the Bush administration has been injudicious in its consultations with the military," West writes. Both he and Grunow say a key event was the May 2003 decision to disband the Iraqi army, which was made by former Coalition Provisional Authority chief L. Paul Bremer III at the direction of the Defense Department. Grunow notes that only the Iraqi army can prevent anarchy, and West describes the disbanding as having "changed the mission of the American soldiers from liberators to occupiers."

They agree that the Iraqi army must continue to grow and that the Iraqi police must be reformed. West writes that "training alone was not the answer" for the Iraqi police. "Too many police were corrupt and controlled by Shiite militias, and senior Iraqi leaders were doing little to punish disloyalty." Sectarian issues continue to disrupt police performance, he says: "How Sunni police can be effective and not be assassinated in their own cities has yet to be shown. Conversely, the Shiite police in Baghdad have lost all trust among the Sunnis."

Vines says that even keeping track of friendly forces has been a problem. "Battle-tracking the Iraqi Army, Police, Special Police, Border Enforcement Forces and armed contractors moving around Iraq was difficult, but essential to preventing armed engagements between coalition forces," he writes.

In the Iraq theater of operations, he writes, "we had more than 300 different databases tracking friendly and enemy event data across all the warfighter functions." About 82,000 radio frequencies were used by U.S. military units, government agencies, coalition organizations and Iraqi security forces.

Syrian Official Considering Baghad Visit (AP)

By Albert Aji

AP, November 1, 2006

Syria's foreign minister is considering a visit to Baghdad in November — the first by a top Syrian official since the fall of Saddam Hussein and a major step toward restoring diplomatic relations, Iraqi and Syrian officials said Tuesday.

President Bush has called on Syria to help quell sectarian violence in Iraq, and some in the U.S., including former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, have urged the White House to make overtures to Syria to enlist its help. Syrian analysts said the visit could signal Syrian willingess to address the sectarian killings in neighboring Iraq.

Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem is considering traveling to Iraq, said a Syrian Foreign Ministry official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to give statements to the press.

In Baghdad, an Iraqi Foreign Ministry official, who spoke on condition of anonymity for the same reason, said the ministries agreed "in principal" that al-Moallem would visit Iraq in November. Both the Syrian and the Iraqi official said no date had been set.

Imad Fawzi Shueibi, a Syrian political analyst, said the visit sends a "clear Syrian message that what is happening in Iraq — the sectarian killing and violence — is a red line for Arab national security and Syrian national security that can't be accepted by Damascus."

Damascus broke relations with Baghdad in 1982, accusing Iraq of inciting riots by the banned Muslim Brotherhood in Syria. Damascus also sided with Iran in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war.

Commercial ties improved during the last few years of Saddam's rule before he was overthrown in 2003, but no Syrian ministers have gone to Baghdad for more than six years.

Syrian Deputy Foreign Minister Fayssal Mekdad said in October that al-Moallem would visit Baghdad after the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, which ended Oct. 23-24, and that he would discuss the restoration of diplomatic ties with senior Iraqi officials.

Syrian officials had said in February that Syria would exchange ambassadors with Iraq once a new Iraqi government was formed, marking the first time Damascus set a time frame for restoring full diplomatic ties.

The new Iraqi government took office in May, but there has been no exchange of ambassadors.

George Jabbour, a Syrian legislator and political analyst, said the "circumstances may be more suitable now" for the neighboring states to re-establish ties.

"This visit is expected as Syria and Iraq need each other, and Syria, no doubt, can play a calming role in Iraq and it has always announced its keenness to help Iraq's security and stability," Jabbour said.

Syria has been increasingly isolated and pressured over, among other things, allegations from the U.S. and Iraq that it does not take steps to stop foreign fighters from infiltrating across its border into Iraq.

Syria has denied the charge, countering that the U.S. military and its Iraqi allies are not doing enough to police the border.

Blair Dodges Defeat In Vote On Iraq War Inquiry (AFP-Y)

By Robin Millard

AFP, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089544

British Prime Minister Tony Blair's government survived a potentially damaging vote in parliament on whether he should order an inquiry into how Britain joined the war in Iraq.

Opposition parties had demanded an immediate investigation by a committee of senior members of parliament into the government's handling of the build-up to the US-led March 2003 invasion.

However, the motion, proposed by the small Scottish and Welsh nationalist parties in the lower House of Commons, was defeated by 298 votes to 273, with Blair's 62-seat working majority cut to 25. The government later promised an inquiry once the situation permitted.

A dozen rebels from Blair's ruling Labour Party, largely drawn from a group known as "the usual suspects", voted against the government although other lawmakers who have previously shown dissent over Iraq fell into line.

Blair is seen by some as a lame duck after pledging to step down by September 2007 and a parliamentary defeat would have further weakened his authority and could even have hastened his departure.

In a stormy debate before the vote, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said a defeat would signal uncertainty and endanger Britain's 7,000 troops in war-ravaged Iraq.

"We are at what could potentially be a turning point in Iraq," she told MPs, adding it was not the time "to rehash all the debates and all the arguments that have been had over and over again".

But Beckett hinted that the government may hold an inquiry at some point in the future.

"It is perfectly sensible and legitimate to say that there will come a time when these issues will be explored in the round and in full so that we can learn whatever lessons we can from them."

The Defence Secretary Des Browne went one further, saying the government would hold a "retrospective inquiry" into the Iraq war, telling the BBC: "When the time is right, of course there will be such an inquiry."

The main opposition Conservatives, who voted for military action in Iraq, backed the opposition motion Tuesday having seen their demands for an inquiry once troops come home go unheard.

"I think they came near enough to losing it that they will have taken the message that they can't ignore these concerns in the future," Conservative foreign affairs spokesman William Hague told Sky News television.

But Foreign Office minister Kim Howells accused the Conservatives of "undermining our troops".

"We don't need this self-righteousness to put us back on track," he told Sky News.

In a second Commons vote, the government's amendment to the opposition motion was carried by 294 votes to 264, a majority of 30.

It said that there had already been four independent committees of inquiry and rejected the idea of holding another one which would "divert" resources away from efforts to improve conditions in Iraq.

Tuesday's debate -- the first on Iraq for more than two years -- came after it was disclosed that the total cost of Britain's military involvement in Iraq has passed four billion pounds (six billion euros, 7.6 billion dollars).

The ministry of defence said that operations in the country cost 958 million pounds in the last financial year, a rise from 910 million in 2004-05.

Sir Menzies Campbell, the leader of the Liberal Democrats, the second-biggest opposition party, conceded that Blair had won the battle, but not the political war.

"Although the government may have won the day this evening, there is no doubt that it did so on the basis of many of its own supporters really making their support conditional," he told Sky News.

"They want to hear some change of strategy," he said, adding that he would keep pushing for an inquiry.

Welsh nationalist Adam Price, who opened the debate, told MPs: "The issue at its heart is far bigger than party politics -- it's about accountability, it's about the monumental catastrophe of the Iraq war -- the worst foreign policy disaster certainly since Suez, possibly since Munich and it's about the morass in which we regrettably still find ourselves."

Outside parliament, a group of about 200 demonstrators protested as the vote took place, carrying placards calling for British troops to leave Iraq and shouting slogans criticising Blair.

A total of 120 British troops have been killed in Iraq since the invasion.

Blair Survives Attack On War (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

London — British Prime Minister Tony Blair survived a blistering attack Tuesday on his government's handling of the war in Iraq, narrowly defeating moves to open a parliamentary inquiry into a conflict one former ally called "a huge blunder."

DOJ_NMG_0089545

In a gauge of how far British public opinion has swung toward opposition to the war, Blair's majority Labor Party could muster only a 25-vote margin to defeat the measure. The inquiry would have explored suspicions over evidence used to justify the war and growing suspicions that the conflict has swirled dangerously out of control.

"We were wrong to go to war in Iraq, and we cannot wash our hands of the harm that we've done in doing so," said Labor lawmaker Gavin Strang, a former Blair ally.

"Because of his tragic misjudgment, our prime minister is more steeped in blood than any Scottish politician since Macbeth," said Peter Tapsell, the longest-serving Conservative in the House of Commons. "We need an inquiry to tell us how he led us into this disaster, and to make sure that no vainglorious and ignorant prime minister can ever do so again."

But government ministers warned that launching an inquiry now would send a message of weakness to Britain's adversaries, threaten the morale of the troops and undermine support for Iraqi attempts to build a unified and democratic nation.

"Our words in the House today will be heard a very long way away. They can be heard by our troops who are already in great danger … and by the Iraqi people, whose bravery and fortitude is humbling, and who need our support," Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett told the House of Commons.

"I have no doubt that there will come a time when we will want to look at the lessons learned from our experience in Iraq…. But now, I repeat, is not that time," she said.

Britain has 7,200 soldiers deployed in Iraq, mainly in the south near Basra, and has seen 120 soldiers die in the conflict. Another 5,600 British troops are posted in Afghanistan and facing increasingly fierce resistance from Taliban fighters there.

Tuesday's vote in the House of Commons came amid eroding British support for the war, with even a senior British military commander recently expressing doubts about the wisdom of keeping large numbers of troops deployed in Iraq much longer.

The new head of the British army, Gen. Richard Dannatt, told the Daily Mail last month that troops should leave Iraq "soon" because "our presence exacerbates the security problems" in some parts of the country.

In a Guardian/ICM poll published Thursday, 61% of respondents said they wanted British forces to leave Iraq this year, even if they have not completed their mission, and even if the U.S. wants them to stay.

A day earlier, Beckett was asked on BBC Radio 4 whether historians may judge that Iraq had been a foreign policy disaster for Britain. Opposition lawmakers hauled out her answer during Tuesday's debate: "Yes, they may," she said. "Then again, they may not."

The debate was launched by nationalist parties from Scotland and Wales, where elections scheduled next spring threaten Labor deputies and were probably a factor in the defection of a number of Labor lawmakers in the final vote of 298 to 273. The margin was substantially short of Labor's 67-vote majority.

Blair's support for the Bush administration's policy in Iraq has been the biggest factor in a political nose-dive that prompted a recent move within the Labor ranks to force him to pledge his resignation by the end of next summer.

"On the political tombstone of the prime minister will be one word," Charles Kennedy, former leader of the Liberal Democratic Party, told the House of Commons. "Iraq."

Baby Boom Echoes In Iraq (WT)

By James Palmer

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

BAGHDAD -- In the face of relentless violence, political chaos, economic uncertainty and nightly curfews, Iraq's maternity wards are experiencing an unlikely baby boom.

Despite the obstacles, the birthrate in Iraq actually has increased since the U.S.-led invasion 43 months ago, according to the country's Health Ministry. The rate of births in the country has jumped from 29 births per 1,000 people in 2003 to 37 per 1,000 last year, according to government figures.

In neighboring Iran, the birthrate is half that -- 21 per 1,000 population, while the average birthrate in the Middle East is 25, according to the World Bank. The birthrate in the United States is about 14 births per 1,000 people, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Thanaa Alladin Mohammed, a doctor who helped compile the statistics, said the Iraqi tradition of large families is primarily responsible for the birthrate.

"People want to have children, regardless of the violence," she said.

Haithem Ramdam, a 34-year-old engineer and first-time parent, agreed.

"I'm more concerned about the money needed to take care of my family than I am about the security situation," said Mr. Ramdam, whose child, a girl named Jamani, was born Oct. 2. "This is part of the cycle of life, and you can't stop it."

That cycle, Iraqis say, also drives many parents whose children have been killed by war-related violence to produce more.

DOJ_NMG_0089546

Fourat Hameed, 29, watched his 3-year-old son, Youseff, die after the taxi they were riding in struck a roadside bomb near Baqouba, 40 miles north of Baghdad, in September 2003. The following year, Mr. Hameed's wife, Dunai, gave birth to a girl, and in April, they had another son, also named Youseff.

"That boy is a gift from God," said Mr. Hameed, who noted the importance many Iraqis place on bearing a son to lead the family and carry on its name. "Of course, we can never replace the child we lost, but we wanted a son."

The Iraqi Health Ministry numbers differ from those in the CIA World Factbook, which notes a slight decline in the birthrate in the years since 2000. Both sources agree, however, that Iraq's birthrate is far above the regional average, and has remained so despite the war.

As a result of the swelling birthrate in Baghdad's volatile environment, many physicians here also say they are performing more scheduled Caesarean deliveries than ever.

"Patients cannot always see their doctor or reach a health facility when they need to because of poor security," said Simone Kurchin, 38, an obstetrician at the Dominican Sisters of St. Catherine of Siena Hospital, a private facility in south Baghdad. "This is always a problem now."

According to the hospital's records, Caesarean births have more than doubled since 2003, from 1,107 to 2,447 last year, when they outnumbered natural births.

Iraqi women seeking to give birth in a hospital but unable to afford the $200 fee charged by most private facilities in Baghdad must turn to government-run hospitals. These hospitals, Iraqis say, often lack staff, equipment and medicine.

Sabrya Fahed, whose daughter Kamel delivered her first child at the Al-Wiyah Hospital in east Baghdad on Oct. 4, said giving birth in a Baghdad hospital is more arduous now.

"I gave birth for the last time in this same hospital 11 years ago, and everything was much better then," said the 43-year-old Mrs. Fahed, who has five children. "Now everything is worse, from the treatment of the staff to the condition of the building."

And the exodus of doctors -- 10,000 since 2003, according to an estimate from the Iraqi Medical Association -- has been a serious blow to the quality of the health care system, medical officials said.

Even private hospitals, where doctors' salaries are up to three times higher than those of their counterparts at government-run facilities, are encountering problems retaining physicians.

The Dominican Sisters of St. Catherine of Siena, the private facility in south Baghdad, has lost six of its 10 obstetricians in the past three years, including Dr. Hana Al-Baea, who had been practicing for 26 months in Iraq before moving to Syria last month.

'My Country Needs Me' (WSJ)

With the midterm elections fast approaching, the panic over Iraq seems more intense than ever. That country, the thinking goes, is a hopeless mess, and there could be a precipitous American withdrawal, especially if the Democrats win.

But doing so would leave the silent majority of Iraqis hostage to the most vicious extremists, abandoning those Iraqi leaders who have championed liberal democratic values. One of them is Mithal al-Alusi, a 53-year-old Sunni Arab who won a seat in parliament last December after having served as director general of the National Commission on de-Baathification. Mr. al-Alusi ran on a platform of religious pluralism, human rights, free markets and a free press. He calls for an alliance among democracies -- including the U.S., Iraq, Israel and Turkey -- to fight terrorism.

Not only does Mr. al-Alusi champion values many in the West hope will define the new Iraq, he has risked his life -- and lost more than his life -- for the cause. In September 2004 he attended a counterterrorism conference in Herzliya, Israel; after which insurgents threatened his family. The following February assassins opened fire on Mr. al-Alusi's car as it approached his Baghdad home. He wasn't in the vehicle, but his sons, 30-year-old Ayman and 22-year-old Gamal, were. Both were killed as their father watched. Still, Mr. al-Alusi was unbowed. "Even if these terrorists try to kill me again, peace is the only solution," he told reporters minutes after the attack. "Peace with Israel is the only solution for Iraq. Peace with everybody, but no peace for the terrorists." He continued to build his Iraqi Nation Party, which his fallen sons had helped establish, and which now has 15,000 members.

He describes his views less in ideological terms than in human ones. "An Iraqi mother, she has the right to have normal feelings for her baby. It's the same for an Israeli mother," he told me in a phone interview from Baghdad. "This is the best way to drive the world's politics. Not to make it complicated."

Mr. al-Alusi is not the only Iraqi political leader to reject ethnic and sectarian separatism. Hajim al-Hasani, a former parliament speaker, testified at a September congressional hearing. When Rep. Christopher Shays referred to him as a Sunni, Mr. al-Hasani politely corrected the congressman: "I am Iraqi." Afterwards, Mr. al-Hasani told me it is a misconception to view the violence in Iraq as the expression of popular will: "The few bad apples can rotten the rest of the apples if nobody stops them." Many of those "bad apples" aren't even grown in Iraq. Following Saddam Hussein's fall, foreign jihadists such as the Jordanian Abu Musab al-Zarqawi rushed to join former Baathists in an effort to undermine the fledgling democracy. And Mr. al-Alusi told me that "Iran is fully involved in terrorist activity in Iraq." He believes Tehran is playing both sides, backing Sunni terrorists as well as Shiite ones.

Polls suggest a majority of Americans think it was a mistake to enter Iraq. Mr. al-Alusi respectfully disagrees. "We didn't have any kind of hope, and now, even with all our difficulty, we have hope." Iraq today is a central front in a war against extremists who view the murder of civilians as political expression. "I will be killed -- if not today, tomorrow," Mr. al-Alusi says. "The point is not me, but children -- for a child to be a child, not a killer; for a teenager to be a teenager, not an extremist."

Mithal al-Alusi could have left Iraq for a comfortable life in exile; Mr. Shays, a friend, offered to help him relocate to the U.S. But he said no: "My country needs me."

He has not given up the fight. How can we?

NATO Forces Fight Taliban In 5 Provinces Of Afghanistan (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 31 — Clashes erupted in five provinces in eastern and southern Afghanistan on Monday and Tuesday, with roadside bombs, suicide bombings and gun battles killing four NATO soldiers and an estimated 67 Taliban fighters, NATO officials said.

The violence came as NATO forces continued a military operation started last week intended to put pressure on Taliban forces through the fall and winter, and to allow reconstruction and development to reach the country's restive south and east, NATO officials said. Taliban forces, meanwhile, continued to demonstrate their ability to carry out multiple roadside bombings and suicide attacks.

In the eastern province of Nuristan on Tuesday, a roadside bomb killed three NATO soldiers and wounded one as they patrolled in Weygal district, NATO officials said. In separate attack on Tuesday, one Afghan policeman died and two NATO soldiers were wounded in a suicide bombing in Ghazni Province, just south of Kabul.

On Monday, NATO soldiers involved in the new operation, named "Oqab," or eagle, battled Taliban fighters in a six-hour firefight in the Daychopan district of the southern province of Zabul, NATO officials said. The clash killed one NATO soldier and an estimated 55 Taliban insurgents, they said.

In a second attack on Monday, three NATO soldiers were wounded by a roadside bomb in the eastern province of Kunar. In a third clash on Monday, NATO forces in the Zhera district of the southern province of Kandahar called in an airstrike on a group of suspected insurgents on the roof of a compound. The bombing killed as many as 12 insurgents, according to NATO officials.

Maj. Luke Knittig, a NATO spokesman, cautioned that the Taliban toll from Monday and Tuesday was an estimate. He said the figures had been based on sightings by pilotless aerial vehicles, aircraft and NATO soldiers directly involved in gun battles with insurgents.

"It is not a precise endeavor," he said. "But we had eyes on these targets."

Last week, Afghan villagers reported that dozens of civilians were killed in an errant NATO airstrike in the Panjwai district of Kandahar Province. An investigation ordered by the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, is still under way.

The clashes on Monday and Tuesday came after dozens of suspected Taliban were reportedly killed by NATO-led forces in fighting on Saturday in southern Oruzgan Province.

Since NATO took over responsibility for the region from American troops at the beginning of August, 56 of its soldiers have been killed in fighting. The nationalities of the four NATO soldiers killed Monday and Tuesday were not released.

Pakistan's Leader Defends Airstrike On School (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Oct. 31 — Faced with protests across the country, President Pervez Musharraf on Tuesday defended a military strike that killed 80 people at a religious school, and insisted that the dead were militants undergoing terrorist training.

General Musharraf's claim came amid protests across the political spectrum, but especially by an alliance of Islamic parties and thousands of people in the semi-autonomous tribal areas straddling the Afghan border where the strike took place.

Angry speakers at rallies across the country condemned General Musharraf's alliance with the United States and the airstrike on Monday, when helicopter gunships fired missiles into the Islamic school, or madrasa, in the village of Chingai, near the town of Khar in the Bajur region.

General Musharraf said the dead were militants, and Pakistani military officials maintained that the madrasa was being used as a staging post for Al Qaeda and that it was frequently visited by Qaeda leaders.

Some local residents and opposition politicians have said that there were children in the school, and alleged that American warplanes had taken part in the attack. But the president dismissed the suggestion that the dead were innocent.

"Anyone who is saying that these were innocent Taliban is telling lies," General Musharraf said while addressing a seminar in Islamabad, the capital.

"We were watching them since the last six, seven days," he said. "We knew exactly who they are, what they were doing. They were all militants, using weapons, doing military training within the compound."

Local news outlets on Tuesday quoted unidentified intelligence officials as saying that Ayman al-Zawahri, the top deputy to Osama bin Laden, and Abu Faraj al-Libbi, a senior Qaeda operative, used to visit the madrasa.

The local television station AAJ reported that satellite images showed militant activity going on within the madrasa and that it was used as a staging point for attacks in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

"Militants were given training to prepare explosives, and the madrasa was used to provide ideological motivation," the report said.

Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, the chief military spokesman, refused to confirm or deny the news report. "I cannot comment on that," General Sultan said in a telephone interview on Tuesday evening.

When asked the reason for the attack, he said, "We had confirmed information about militant training going on in the madrasa."

He denied that the military had any information about the presence of any high-level Qaeda leader at the madrasa at the time of the strike.

He also denied comments attributed to him by The Associated Press in which he appeared to acknowledge sharing intelligence with the United States to carry out the operation, an extremely delicate issue in Pakistan.

"That was wrong," General Sultan said. "I was grossly misinterpreted. If there was any intelligence sharing, we cannot open it to media."

In Washington, however, officials said Tuesday that American officials had provided intelligence to the Pakistani government that in part led to the strike on the madrasa. Before the attack on Monday, American and Pakistani officials discussed the intelligence and signed off on the target.

"There was a body of evidence that both sides agreed on," said an American official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was discussing classified information.

The official said American and Pakistani officials had agreed on the target in part because the madrasa was training militants to carry out attacks in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Liaquat Hussein, an associate of Mr. Zawahri's who ran the madrasa, was killed in Monday's airstrike.

The strike is expected to further polarize the political environment in the country. General Musharraf's alliance with the United States has incensed hard-line Islamists who accuse him of being subservient to the United States.

But apart from Islamic opposition parties, liberal opposition parties also condemned the airstrike.

"This was a very ill-planned operation," said Enver Baig, a senator from the opposition Pakistan Peoples Party. "They knew that there were students inside the madrasa and in case of an aerial operation, the casualties would be on a large scale.

"It has not gone well with the common man on the street."

Are You Sure You Were Really in Philadelphia When You Wrote That?

In her Oct. 20 essay "A Tale of Several Cities," Julia Vitullo-Martin is so anxious to recycle Digby Baltzell's 25-year-old thesis about "Puritan Boston and Quaker Philadelphia" that she trashes Philadelphia in a way that bears no resemblance to reality (Taste page, Weekend Journal). She writes that "Downtown Philadelphia seems to be a bleak postindustrial landscape" with "the few good buildings that are still standing routinely visited by street people begging at their entrances." I'll give her the benefit of the doubt and assume that her zeal for literary license, combined with her ignorance of Philadelphia, made that colorful language too good to pass up, true or not.

Here's an offer, Ms. Vitullo-Martin. Take the train to Philadelphia -- from your cocoon in New York it's less than an hour and a half trip, even without spending the extra money for the Acela -- and I'll give you a walking tour of Center City. We'll start off with some new office buildings and public spaces, and some existing "good buildings still standing." But mostly we'll concentrate on all the burgeoning neighborhoods with both gorgeous old homes and new apartment and condominium buildings, going for prices that would not have been dreamed about in Baltzell's time. These neighborhoods are bustling at all hours with both visiting suburbanites and a resident population that has grown remarkably in recent years. (Sort of like the Boston neighborhoods that you said "look like Hollywood's idea of a hip, fabulous place to live.") That's the real downtown Philadelphia, and I look forward to showing it to you.

Darryl May

Wynnewood, Pa.

What an absurd description. Yes, there are street people begging here and there in Center City Philadelphia, as there are in all large cities. But Ms. Vitullo-Martin must not have been in Philadelphia for many years. As a resident of a nearby suburb, I go to Center City once or twice a week because it's a great place -- restaurants, coffee shops, book- and music-stores, cinemas, public squares and other green spaces, wonderful fountains, churches, historic sites, etc. The place is booming! It's full of people day and night and, for better or worse, with much new construction going on. I cannot imagine what Ms. Vitullo-Martin was thinking.

I suggest that a hurried walk to just one neighborhood cannot possibly give anyone a clear view of what is happening in this great city. Anyone who has been to our city, which National Geographic Traveler magazine recently called "America's Next Great City," knows this city is hot. That's why so many people are moving here, from the young professionals coming down from New York and elsewhere, to empty nesters moving into our hot downtown condo market. Come see for yourself. We believe you'll love what Philadelphia has to offer.

Ms. Vitullo-Martin's article gives praise to the "sheer excellence" of the harbor in Upper Sandusky, Ohio. Ohioans are justifiably proud of the acclaim but hope that Wall Street Journal readers don't all flock at once to our 38-acre, man-made reservoir. If you find our single- launch ramp too busy, you might consider the other Sandusky, downstream (and hence lower) at the mouth of the Sandusky River. The Sandusky River, like the Nile, flows south to north. That puts the Upper Nile south of the Lower Nile and Upper Sandusky south of the Lower Sandusky. The other Sandusky's little harbor (miles across), minor facilities (many marinas and dockage for Great Lakes boats), and dregged channels (for the freighters) may accommodate the overflow. However, if you do choose Upper Sandusky for your boating pleasure, please respect the "electric motors only" regulation.

Once Again, Musharraf Is Routinely Maligned

Tunku Varadarajan, in his review of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's autobiography "In the Line of Fire," describes Gen. Musharraf as "self-congratulatory, narcissistic and mendacious" ("An 'Ally' With His Own Agenda," Bookshelf, Leisure & Arts, Oct. 19). Such words are unfair, reflecting the mindset of those determined to malign the president come what may. For instance, Mr. Varadarajan does not give credit to Gen. Musharraf for Pakistan's economic turnaround, attributing it instead to the U.S. Treasury secretary.

To answer other criticisms in the review: Omar Shaikh Saeed, the master of Daniel Pearl's murder, was kept in secret for a week after his arrest because authorities wanted to arrest his dangerous accomplices, who otherwise would have fled if they were aware of their leader's arrest. A number of terrorists were arrested on the basis of information divulged during the interrogation. Was that a blunder or the right decision?

In regard to Mukhtaran Mai, the woman Mr. Varadarajan says was subjected to a travel ban when an NGO wished to fly her to the U.S. to publicize her plight of having been subjected to a sexual assault decreed by a village tribunal: Ms. Mukhtaran has visited a number of foreign countries, including the U.S., with the permission of the Pakistan government. Mr. Varadarajan did not mention that President Musharraf sent Mukhtaran Mai a check for $10,000 as a token of support. The government also facilitated the establishment of a school, a police post and a women's crisis center in her village at the cost of $300,000.

Empowerment of women in Pakistan has been ensured by reserving almost 30% seats at the district, provincial and federal levels in the respective representative bodies. People at the grassroots level have been empowered through a local government system that has entrusted political, administrative and financial powers to their directly elected representatives.

War Deaths Methodology: Greater Rigor Is Needed

In their Oct. 24 Letter to the Editor, Johns Hopkins researchers defend the cluster survey methodology used to estimate "excess" deaths in Iraq since the war began in 2003. They mention that 12,800 Iraqis were surveyed. But large numbers don't make a sample representative. They claim "the effective sample size is roughly 3,700 independent people." (Apparently they arrived at 3,700 by simply doubling the 1,849 households in the survey.) But participants who live together and answer survey questions together aren't independent. While acknowledging that only 47 clusters were sampled, they omit the fact that only adjacent households within a cluster were surveyed.

To put this in perspective, imagine a door-to-door survey in California to gauge the impact of an earthquake. Like war, earthquake destruction is widespread, but more intense in some areas than in others. Surveyors randomly choose 47 neighborhoods and interview 40 adjacent households in each (i.e., fewer households than in a city block). Would this "snapshot" provide a fair assessment of earthquake damage from a true cross-section of California's population?

If neighborhoods near the earthquake epicenter were over-sampled, the survey results would be skewed significantly. Likewise, if clusters near the most violent war zones in Iraq were sampled disproportionately, estimates of war deaths could be wildly exaggerated. In fact, Johns Hopkins reported an "extreme statistical outlier" when it sampled 33 clusters in Iraq in 2004: "More than a third of reported post-attack deaths, and two-thirds of violent deaths happened in the Falluja cluster" (see http://www.thelancet.com/journals/lancet/article/PIIS0140673604174412/fulltext).

An issue as important and complicated as counting war deaths demands more rigor than Johns Hopkins used in its two surveys.

Antitrust Amnesty Grants: A Constitutional Problem

Holman W. Jenkins Jr. correctly identifies the problems with the Stolt-Nielsen case and the Justice Department's larger campaign against "price fixing" ("If Sergio Leone Made a Movie About Antitrust . . . ," Business World, Oct. 25). I would add that the Stolt-Nielsen case has shed valuable light on the secrecy that surrounds the department's amnesty program. Unlike plea bargains, which are disclosed to the court and the public, amnesty grants are secret and not subject to outside scrutiny. The department says amnesty is an internal matter of "prosecutorial discretion"; but from a constitutional standpoint, the amnesty grants the equivalent of a full pardon.

Pardons are supposed to be the exclusive province of the president, not mid-level lawyers at the Antitrust Division. The framers were careful in concentrating the pardon power in the chief executive, who is subject to congressional and public oversight. The department's amnesty program eliminates these checks, however, in order to keep cartel prosecutions in-house. Once a company receives its amnesty, the evidence provided to prosecutors forces other cartel members to plead guilty without going to trial. In this manner, the government can extract millions in fines from defendants without ever having to publicly address the types of economic arguments raised in Mr. Jenkins's column.

With Corruption Rampant, 'Snitches' Are Necessary

Kudos to Karen Richardson for her excellent, insightful article "The Secret Life of an Informant" (page one, Oct. 21). Public corruption cases, particularly those involving elected officials, are notoriously difficult to prove in court. Most Americans don't necessarily like government "snitches" gathering evidence, but they should realize that public malfeasance is a much worse alternative.

At the time when spending for public infrastructure has skyrocketed nationwide, the temptation to bribe elected officials is now greater than ever. The exceedingly small number of those who betray the public trust should realize that the watchdog of their public conduct isn't only found in the results of their election, but within the judicial system as well.

The Dark, Hidden World of Auto Repair Pricing

While the transparency of pricing data on the Internet has been a big boon for consumers ("Savvy Car Buyers Drive Bargains With Pricing Data From the Web," Personal Journal, Oct. 24), I wonder if car dealers are offsetting the lost profits on new-car sales with premium pricing for service and repair?

Auto makers know exactly what they pay dealers for every conceivable warranty repair. If they made these repair and replacement costs known to the consumer, they would begin to reduce one of the most stressful aspects of car ownership: the dreaded mechanic's bill. Of course, dealers would strongly resist the publication of this data, but perhaps some enterprising Web site could penetrate this veil of secrecy. After all, in the pre-Web days, the price a dealer paid for any car was also a closely guarded secret.

Anti-Growth Tax Rule Was Defended by Spitzer

In his Oct. 25 editorial-page commentary "Spitzer Is Good for Business," Donald G. Kempf Jr. argues that Eliot Spitzer, as governor, will make New York's regulatory environment more business-friendly. Perhaps. However, Mr. Spitzer, as attorney general, fought to preserve one of New York's most antigrowth tax rules—taxing nonresident telecommuters on days they work at their out-of-state homes. Most recently, New York taxed an Arizona resident for days he worked at home there.

Many nonresidents and businesses respond to this foolishness by cutting their ties to New York. If one is looking for a prime example of New York's self-destructive tax policies, this is it. As attorney general, Mr. Spitzer aggressively and successfully defended this policy in the courts up to and including the U.S. Supreme Court. It is hoped that Gov. Spitzer will undo the handiwork of Attorney General Spitzer.

For science-fiction buffs, it's probably a common-sense solution. Two months after arriving in Iraq, a second lieutenant with the 16th Military Police Brigade was handed the Phraselator, a hand-held device that promised to digest his English phrases and produce a prerecorded Arabic translation with an Iraqi accent.

But after a brief test last year, the soldier gave up the gadget, deciding that, while helpful in some instances, it wasn't useful to his unit, which conducted raids and provided convoy security. He had even tried to teach himself Arabic using the device but decided that it was no match for the complex language. Even such simple phrases as "What is your name?" are spoken differently in Fallujah than in Baghdad, he found. "This may have been the reason why many of the Iraqis . . . did not appear to understand the Arabic phrases & words" stored in the device, according to a report prepared for the Army.

An Annapolis firm, VoxTec International Inc., developed the device and said it has steadily made improvements. But the goal of having a machine replace a human interpreter remains elusive, and the military is mounting a multimillion-dollar campaign to find a more capable successor, one that can translate both sides of a conversation, from English to Arabic and vice versa.

"What people would really like is that 'Star Trek' universal communicator, but it doesn't exist yet," said Lynne McCann, former chief of the Army Foreign Language Proponency Office. "That would solve everything."

The stakes are high for the military, which suffers from such a shortage of interpreters that it has had to rely increasingly on contractors -- 6,500 in Iraq and 1,500 in Afghanistan. It can be a dangerous job. Of the 648 contractors killed in Iraq since the war began in March 2003, 153 worked for the division of L-3 Communications Corp. that currently holds the linguist contract, according to Labor Department figures.

Battlefields often turn into impromptu laboratories for new technologies -- with mixed results. During the Persian Gulf War in 1991, the Patriot anti-missile system was rushed into combat to intercept Iraqi scuds, but afterward, investigators questioned its effectiveness. The Predator, an unmanned drone, dropped Hellfire missiles after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, after a quick development process.

In the same way, VoxTec, which was a unit within Marine Acoustics Inc., was asked to rush production of its Phraselator, then a single prototype, shortly after the attacks on New York's World Trade Center and the Pentagon, said Ace Sarich, the company's vice president of development. The device is about the size of a large personal digital assistant and is programmed with about 700 Arabic phrases that can be recalled after it "hears" the equivalent English phrase or a soldier chooses a sentence from a text list on the device.

The company shipped 20 to Afghanistan within a few months, but the prototypes had bugs, including buttons that were hard to push and faulty batteries. "It was supposed to be a weatherproof design, and it leaked like a sieve," Sarich said. Those issues have all been addressed, he added.

While VoxTec continued to improve the device, the military began testing a device made by a California company, Integrated Wave Technologies Inc. It had developed a similar hands-free version of a translation machine that fit into an ammunition pouch, allowing soldiers to say key phrases that are then turned into full Arabic sentences.

"You say 'house search' and then it will say in Arabic: 'We're here to search your house. Please stay in this room. Do you have any weapons?'" said Tim McCune, the company's president.

Over the past few years, Integrated Wave Technologies has produced 1,300 of its machines and VoxTec has made 5,000 devices. They cost about $2,500 to $3,000 apiece, a mini-boom for two companies that have fewer than 20 employees each.

Neither product, however, proved robust enough to replace human interpreters. What soldiers really needed, the military decided, was to have a conversation with the people they encounter, not just give orders.

"In years past, there wasn't a great need for the individual soldier to speak a foreign language to do his mission," said Wayne Richards, branch chief for technology implementation at U.S. Joint Forces Command. But in Iraq and Afghanistan, soldiers are increasingly interacting with Iraqi civilians, giving advice at checkpoints or guidance during home searches, he said.

"During those door-to-door searches, the soldiers need to be able to calm them down and reassure them," Richards said. "We're fighting for hearts and minds. But if I can't tell her, 'Ma'am, please calm down,' . . . that wouldn't be assuring."

So the Pentagon turned to the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA), which helped develop the Internet, to enlist some technology powerhouses, setting aside $20.8 million this year for translation technologies. Military officials said they do not expect the automated devices to completely replace human interpreters but to augment them. DARPA was a natural fit to lead the project because it has spent the past two years creating a database of thousands of hours of Iraqi conversations to study the voices, speech patterns and commonly used phrases to help with speech-recognition software.

The agency selected SRI International, a nonprofit research group, International Business Machines Corp., and Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh to help put that database to work.

Each of the three has developed systems that use mathematical algorithms to interpret speech, even if it is slurred, accented or muffled, into Arabic and the Arabic response into English. After a second or two, a synthesized male voice produces a response. The systems usually require speakers to limit their conversations to one sentence at a time to avoid confusion.

IBM announced this month that 35 units of its system had been shipped to Iraq, saying it would "facilitate quick" communication. The military is not quite as optimistic.

The systems are being tested only in offices or benign situations with limited background noise, military officials said.

The technology is "just not ready for wide deployment," said Mari Maeda, program manager in DARPA's Information Processing Technology Office. "The translation system is not good enough; the recognition software is not strong enough."

The systems are also not accurate enough, she said. IBM estimates that its system has an accuracy rate of 85 to 90 percent, and that out of 30 phrases, a person may need to repeat four or five. SRI and Carnegie Mellon officials said they couldn't provide comparable figures. But "soldiers are looking for things that work 95 percent of the time," Maeda said.

In the meantime, companies are also experimenting with lower-tech solutions. VoxTec, for instance, is testing a call-a-translator system in Baghdad that allows soldiers to call in from the field so they can put an Iraqi on the phone with one of two Arabic translators on duty who can act as an intermediary.

Integrated Wave Technologies says it may have another interim solution. It is developing a system, which DARPA says it may send to Iraq next year, that will enable limited two-way conversations by "listening" for key words, said McCunne, the company's president. But even that, he acknowledges, has problems.

"If you ask, 'What color was the car?' it will be looking for something like blue or red," he said. But if the person responds by asking which car or says he didn't see a car, the system will not be able to translate, McCunne said. "It's a fairly limited type of communication," he added.

Soldiers Train In Languages (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The Army has invested $4.2 million in a Web-based software program to improve the foreign-language skills of overseas personnel.

The program was created by Rosetta Stone, which provides training software in 30 languages. The contract, entering its second year, allows software access to any member of the active-duty Army, National Guard or Reserve, and civilian personnel in the Department of the Army.

"You can't send everyone to language training school," said Stan Davis, project manager for the Army's E-Learning program. "But this is a capability the Army needs in today's operational environment."

More than 64,000 soldiers are using the software, Mr. Davis said, and that number is expected to double next year. "We're getting about 2,000 to 3,000 people signing up a month," he said.

The military has been criticized for a lack of foreign-language speakers during the conflicts in Afghanistan and Iraq. Rosetta Stone provides courses in Pashto, spoken in Afghanistan and parts of Pakistan; Farsi, widely spoken in Iran; and Arabic, which is used throughout the Middle East.

Mr. Davis said Arabic and Farsi are among the top courses for soldiers, but Spanish is studied most.

Linda Trude, Rosetta Stone's senior director for institutional marketing, said the "dynamic immersion" process provides more success than traditional language courses.

"It's done in the same way we learn our first languages," she said. "When your mom or dad were teaching you, they didn't give you in-depth grammar and language tests. They pointed to an object and said, 'Ball.' "

The software gives instant feedback without using memorization or translation exercises.

Ms. Trude said the U.S. Military Academy at West Point and other segments of the Army have been using the Rosetta Stone software for several years.

"We've heard from people in the Army who don't necessarily need it in their day-to-day jobs, but have said they can use the basic communication skills when they are interacting with Iraqis at the local market," she said.

Ms. Trude said soldiers in the field have given positive feedback.

"Our goal is not to make them linguists, but to help provide them with basic communication skills," she said.

Mark Foley on Film,

Before He Got Famous

Here you probably thought you knew everything about Mark Foley . But a month after the Florida rep resigned in disgrace for cyber-stalking teenage pages, a young journalist has uncovered perhaps the one juicy angle yet unplumbed in the scores of profiles and investigative reports -- Foley's brief movie career.

The movie was a low-budget, straight-to-DVD vigilante flick called "Strike Force" (original title, "The Librarians"), filmed in 2000 in Foley's Palm Beach County district. It starred veteran tough guy William Forsythe , "Baywatch" babe Erika Eleniak , Burt Reynolds (as high-roller "Irish," who lounges by a pool surrounded by his bikini-clad "grandnieces") -- and Foley, in a tiny but pivotal role as, well, a congressman.

Kenneth P. Vogel , an investigative reporter for the soon-to-launch Capitol Leader newspaper, found this cinematic gem buried deep in Foley's 2001 financial disclosure records, recording the $400 payment he got for the role. Vogel tracked down a copy of the movie on Amazon ($12.99) and -- we're just so glad he did! The opening scene is a cartoonish shootout between

"There were a lot of bad men," the child says.

"I know, baby, but it's all over now," Foley says, sighing deeply. "God, I love you."

Foley was cast at the suggestion of associate producer Greg Hauptner , a Palm Beach resident who had known him for years. "He was crazy about the movies," Hauptner told Vogel. (Foley was also an extra on the Florida set of "Body Heat," Vogel learned, but was lost on the cutting room floor.)

"In a short period of time, he had to go through a gamut of emotions," Hauptner said. "It wasn't as easy as you think it would be. He had to be sad and be stoic at the same time -- to be a strong-willed congressman who was willing to go outside the law." All in all, "he wasn't bad."

UPDATE . . .

Since last we checked in with the lurid Washingtonienne saga, sex blogger Jessica C utler snagged a new team of attorneys (she's lost three over the past year) to defend her against an ex-boyfriend's claim that she defamed him by airing details of their love life. And she has traded snippy filings with Robert Steinbuch in federal court -- he claiming that her much-circulated blog postings in 2004 (in which he was ID'd by initials) caused him to lose out on a law professor job, she doubting his reputation was even worth the damages he's seeking (oh, snap !).

Legal sources say it likely will be well into the new year before these crazy kids work things out. The drama continues with a judge this week okaying Steinbuch's request to add as a defendant Ana Marie Cox -- founding editor of Wonkette.com, which made Cutler's blog famous. Cox, now with Time.com, declined to comment, and her former bosses did not return calls.

THIS JUST IN . . .

Â· Alberto Gonzales dropped by GWU Law School yesterday, surprising 40 students in the criminal procedure class. The attorney general talked about military commissions, terrorist surveillance and the Patriot Act and took questions for 40 minutes -- before vanishing as mysteriously as he arrived. Turns out this was all his idea: Gonzales just got a hankering for legal chat with some students, and his staff tracked down a willing prof, former DOJ lawyer Renee Lerner . "I guess he really likes teaching," she said. "The students, of course, were delighted to have him." Is the AG mulling a move to academia? "He is not ruling any options out in terms of future careers," said Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos . Any more stealth visits to law schools planned? "I wouldn't rule it out."

Â· Daytime TV icon Bob Barker will come on down! from "The Price Is Right" in June after 35 years hosting the show and 50 years in TV. "I will be 83 years old," he said yesterday, "and I've decided to retire while I'm still young." Barker plans to devote more time to his animal rights causes.

Fresno Prosecutor Heads For Iraq Duty (SACBEE)

By John Ellis

Sacramento Bee, November 1, 2006

An assistant U.S. attorney hopes to help bring law and order.

Marlon Cobar so believes in the virtue of the rule of law that he has volunteered to go to Iraq and promote it.

Cobar, an assistant U.S. attorney in Fresno, next month will start a one-year stint — with the option for a second — advising Iraqis as they work to put together a functioning legal system.

Many areas where Cobar will help already are second nature in the American legal system, such as how to make effective opening and closing arguments, how to pursue a line of questioning, how to preserve evidence and how to develop a chain of custody for prisoners.

Cobar also will give advice about human rights and ethical issues that lawyers, prosecutors and judges in Iraq might face.

"We're not going over there to take over," Cobar said. "We'll be assisting the Iraqis in taking the reins of their justice system any way they can."

He will be stationed in an undisclosed province far from Baghdad and will be one of only eight such "Resident Legal Advisers" in the war-torn country. These legal advisers advise the U.S. Embassy and Iraq's central and provincial courts.

DOJ_NMG_0089555

In total, the Justice Department has more than 200 employees and contract personnel working on law enforcement, security and justice issues in Iraq.

To date, according to the Justice Department, nearly 500 Iraqi jurists and prosecutors have been trained on topics such as human rights, criminal process and the challenges presented prosecuting insurgency and terrorist cases.

Cobar knows there will be risks — and his family is concerned, but supportive — but for an unmarried 34-year-old with a thirst to help and a taste for adventure, the chance was too good to pass up.

Getting to this point, however, was at least half the challenge.

"My colleagues there are veterans," Cobar said. "I'll be the youngest person with the least amount of time as a [federal prosecutor]."

The program dates to 2003, when an initial assessment team looked at criminal justice reform, judicial training and court policy in Iraq. In late 2004, the Justice Department sought volunteers for a second wave as it increased the program.

Cobar, a Bay Area native who has been a federal prosecutor for less than four years — including 21/2 years in Fresno — applied, but was told, basically, that he was too young.

He was skeptical.

Around that time, Cobar, who is fluent in Spanish, began doing temporary stints in Colombia, where he trained prosecutors and agents in basic criminal trial advocacy. He has been there four times, including time in Medellin and Cali, which were at one time the power centers in the Latin American drug trade.

With that training in hand, this past January it was the Department of Justice that sought out Cobar.

The interview process was intense, and included a panel that spent half a day grilling him.

McGregor W. Scott, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of California — which includes Fresno — had to sign off on the deal. Scott said he never gave it a second thought.

However big or small the role, he said, the Eastern District must do its part to help the Justice Department "re-establish the rule of law" in Iraq.

"The bottom line is we in the Department of Justice have a very significant role to play over there," Scott said.

And, he said, Cobar is the right choice for the job. "Marlon has a profound work ethic," he said. "He has a sense of what it is to serve" as a federal prosecutor.

With that blessing, Cobar began several months of preparation. Among them: becoming a special deputy U.S. marshal, which allows him to carry a firearm in Iraq — which he will do.

He traveled to Washington, D.C., where he went through diplomatic training, a monthlong crash course in Iraqi language, history, culture, religion and politics. He learned to recognize explosives and how to react to biological and chemical agents.

In Iraq, Cobar will trade his U.S. attorney credentials for a diplomatic passport, and he will give up ties and dark suits in favor of dress-down khaki. He will live on a secure military base and travel via convoy. He will receive hazard pay, along with his normal salary, definitely not a factor in his decision to go.

"I didn't even know I was getting hazard pay until I got into the program," Cobar said.

It won't be luxurious, and it will be dangerous, he said. But with billions being spent each month and more than 2,800 U.S. soldiers killed, Cobar said, it is vital that significant American investment pay dividends. His contribution to that end is what he knows — the law.

"One key to a sustainable democracy," he said, "is a fair and workable criminal justice system."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-CEO Of Cendant Is Found Guilty In Third Trial (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

A federal jury found former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter A. Forbes guilty of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and two counts of making false statements in a massive fraud scheme that inflated the travel and real-estate company's earnings and crippled the company's once-stellar reputation.

Mr. Forbes was found not guilty of a fourth count -- securities fraud -- in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport, Conn.

The conviction came in Mr. Forbes's third trial in three years, after juries deadlocked in trials earlier this year and in early 2005. The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate-accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years, but is one of the last to reach a conclusion.

DOJ_NMG_0089556

"We are gratified by today's verdict," said Christopher J. Christie, the U.S. Attorney in Newark, N.J. "The innocent victims of this $14 billion fraud engineered by Walter Forbes have waited a very long time for justice to be done. This is a great day for those who believe that everyone in our society must be held accountable for their conduct."

"It's the third time and was worth all the effort," said Michael Drewniak, Mr. Christie's spokesman. "We always believed fully in all the evidence against Mr. Forbes. We are extremely gratified by today's results."

A Cendant spokesman said, "We're gratified that after all this time justice has finally been served."

Mr. Forbes's attorney couldn't be reached for comment. Prosecutors said they expect Mr. Forbes to appeal.

New York-based Cendant was formed by the merger of HFS Inc., a travel and real-estate company, with CUC International Inc., a membership-marketing company in 1997. Within months, employees from the HFS side uncovered extensive fraud in CUC's accounting, which inflated revenue by $500 million and earnings by $252 million.

Cendant disclosed the fraud in April 1998, causing its market value to drop by $14 billion in one day. Prosecutors say that Mr. Forbes, who had been chief executive of CUC before the merger, participated in the scheme.

Mr. Forbes has argued he had nothing to do with the fraud and put the blame on underlings, saying he was out of the loop. His co-defendant, former Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted last year of 12 counts of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC. Mr. Shelton had been president of CUC before the merger created Cendant.

Prosecutors narrowed the scope of their charges in the third trial to four counts, down from 16 in the first trial, in a bid to avoid another hung jury, which some blamed on the months of testimony about arcane accounting procedures.

Mr. Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison and ordered to pay $3.27 billion restitution to the company, now called Avis Budget Group. The restitution order includes a balloon payment of $15 million and monthly installments of $2,000 after he is released from prison.

Cendant's CEO and founder Henry R. Silverman held the company together by selling off assets and jettisoning Messrs. Forbes and Shelton, but Cendant was never able to regain its premerger growth or overcome the tarnish of the fraud. In 2000, Cendant settled shareholder class-action lawsuits with a record $2.85 billion settlement.

Mr. Silverman announced a year ago that he would break up the conglomerate into four pieces. Cendant sold its travel-distribution company, Travelport, and spun off its real-estate and hospitality businesses as Realogy Corp. and Wyndham Worldwide Corp. That left the company with its rental-car brands.

Chief Guilty At Cendant In 3rd Trial (NYT)

By Stacey Stowe

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Oct. 31 — It took eight years and three trials, but federal prosecutors finally won their case on Tuesday against Walter A. Forbes, the former chairman of the Cendant Corporation.

Mr. Forbes was convicted here on charges that he masterminded an accounting fraud that was considered at the time it was discovered — 1998 — to be the largest on record. Investors lost $19 billion when Cendant's stock fell after the disclosure. The Cendant fraud was later eclipsed by the scandals at Enron and WorldCom.

A jury of eight men and four women in Federal District Court deliberated for two and a half days before finding Mr. Forbes, 63, of New Canaan, Conn., guilty of conspiracy and of two counts of submitting false reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission in overstating his company's earnings by more than $250 million. He was acquitted on a fourth count, securities fraud.

Mr. Forbes remained free on $1.2 million bail. He is to be sentenced on Jan. 17 and faces as long as 25 years in prison.

Prosecutors said Mr. Forbes inflated the income at his original company, CUC International, which merged with HFS Inc. in 1997 to form Cendant — with holdings including the Avis and Budget car rental companies and the Century 21 and Coldwell Banker real estate brokerage firms, among other businesses.

Two months ago, Cendant stockholders changed the company's name to the Avis Budget Group. Besides Avis Budget, Cendant has been broken up into real estate, hotel and mortgage financing businesses.

As the verdicts were read on Tuesday, Mr. Forbes bit his lower lip but otherwise showed little emotion. His wife, Caryn, who attended each day of the proceedings, left the courtroom after the jurors were dismissed by Judge Alan H. Nevas.

"Justice was served," said Michael Martinez, an assistant United States attorney for New Jersey, who prosecuted Mr. Forbes along with Craig Carpenito, another assistant United States attorney. Mr. Forbes's defense team declined comment.

The trial was held in Connecticut after his lawyers succeeded in having it moved from New Jersey, where HFS had its headquarters.

Defense lawyers may have considered the transfer an advantage at one point because it had the effect of delaying the trial.

But James D. Cox, a professor of corporate and securities law at the Duke University School of Law, said Mr. Forbes might have been better off if the defense not been able to delay the proceedings. Instead, the trial followed a succession of accounting and stock fraud defendants at WorldCom, Enron, Tyco and Adelphi.

"It would have occurred in an era before there was a big revulsion against such defendants, before 'C.E.O.' became a code word for felon," Mr. Cox said.

The jury foreman, David Cunningham, a business analyst from Wilton, Conn., said the jury did not think that prosecutors proved their case on securities fraud. Asked if there had been a crucial piece of evidence that swayed the jury to vote to convict on other counts, Mr. Cunningham replied simply, "We were just following the evidence."

John C. Coffee, a specialist in securities law at Columbia University Law School, said he was certain that Mr. Forbes would appeal, as is common with white-collar defendants. Given that it took three trials to convict him, Mr. Coffee added, the appellate court could be expected to give the case a high level of scrutiny.

In Mr. Forbes's two previous trials, the jurors failed to reach a unanimous verdict despite lengthy deliberations. In this trial, as in the earlier ones, his lawyers portrayed Mr. Forbes, who was paid more than $100 million as chairman and chief executive of the CUC Corporation, as a global visionary who did not get involved in the workaday operations of the company. Similar defenses were tried — also unsuccessfully — in the Enron cases of Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling.

The initial prosecution of Mr. Forbes ended in January 2005, with the jury unable to reach a verdict after an eight-month trial and 33 days of deliberations. But the jury did convict his co-defendant, E. Kirk Shelton, the former vice chairman of Cendant. Mr. Shelton, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison, is free on appeal; the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit heard the appeal on Tuesday.

At Mr. Forbes's second trial, in February, jurors were again unable to agree on a verdict, this time despite 27 days of deliberations. The foreman in that case said the accounting issues were too complex.

At the trial just concluded, prosecutors winnowed their case to three weeks from four. Once again, Cosmo Corigliano, former chief financial officer of CUC, testified that the books had been cooked for years at Mr. Forbes's direction and that he and Mr. Forbes met regularly to discuss how much money would be taken from inflated reserves and used to increase profits to meet targets.

Mr. Forbes, in his third time on the stand, denied taking part in those conversations. His lawyers, particularly in closing arguments, portrayed Mr. Corigliano as a liar. He is awaiting sentencing after pleading guilty to fraud-related charges.

But in the third trial, the prosecution called a new witness: Henry R. Silverman, the former chief executive officer of HFS, who now runs one of Cendant's successor corporations. Mr. Silverman testified that Mr. Forbes lobbied him to keep the books of CUC and HFS separate and to retain CUC's auditor, Ernst & Young. Mr. Silverman also said that Mr. Forbes, who maintained that he delegated company financial details to others, in fact, presented detailed financial data to potential investors.

The criminal conviction of Mr. Forbes, who resigned from Cendant with a $47 million severance package, followed the settlement in 2000 of a civil case, in which Cendant paid $2.9 billion and Ernst & Young, $335 million. That combined $3.2 billion settlement is, for now, the largest securities class action on record. It, too, may well be eclipsed by Enron.

Cendant Ex-chairman Found Guilty (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 1, 2006

The longest-running white-collar-criminal saga of the past decade finally came to a close Tuesday in Bridgeport, Conn., where a jury found former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes guilty of conspiracy in the $252 million overstatement of his company's earnings.

The fraud, exposed in April 1998, precipitated one of the biggest sell-offs in the history of Wall Street, chopping Cendant's market capitalization by 50%, or $14 billion, in one furious day of trading. Prior to Enron, it was considered one of the largest accounting frauds ever perpetrated on investors in modern times.

The victory proved sweet for federal prosecutors from New Jersey, who have been pursuing Forbes for eight years. Two previous efforts to convict Forbes for his role in the Cendant fraud ended in mistrials, although jurors in the first trial found Forbes' top lieutenant, E. Kirk Shelton, guilty of participating in the fraud. Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison.

"We are gratified by today's verdict," said Christopher Christie, the U.S. Attorney for New Jersey. "The innocent victims of this $14 billion fraud engineered by Walter Forbes have waited a very long time for justice to be done. This is a great day for those who believe that everyone in our society must be held accountable for their conduct."

Jurors convicted Forbes of conspiracy as well as of two counts of making false statements, but acquitted him of one count of securities fraud. U.S. District Judge Alan Nevas scheduled sentencing for Jan. 17. Forbes' attorney, Brendan Sullivan, vowed to appeal the verdict.

Prior to the exposure of the accounting fraud at Cendant, Forbes was the widely respected CEO of Comp-U-Card International, a pioneer in the field of shopping clubs. Through organic growth and a constant stream of acquisitions, he built CUC into one of the hottest stocks of the 1990s. Prosecutors said Forbes and Shelton used reserve accounts set up for every acquisition to massage the company's income. Over several years, CUC padded its ledgers with hundreds of millions in phantom revenue.

In opening arguments to jurors last month, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Martinez alleged that in 1997, Forbes needed an enormous merger to keep the game going. He met several times with Henry Silverman, the billionaire investor who controlled HFS, parent company of Avis and Days Inn. The two decided to merge their companies to form a new entity, Cendant.

For the first time in three trials, Silverman testified in court. He told the jury that Forbes wanted to keep his longtime auditor, Ernst & Young, in charge of reporting CUC's financials, even after the merger was completed. As the dominant shareholder of HFS, Silverman was the biggest victim of the fraud, losing hundreds of millions of dollars in his stock's value in a single day.

Forbes testified in his own defense, saying he had no direct involvement in CUC's accounting practices, and that he relied on Ernst & Young to make sure the numbers were correct.

Cendant never fully recovered from the fallout of the fraud. Earlier this year, it split into four separate public companies.

Cendant's Ex-Chair Convicted In Fraud (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

A Connecticut jury yesterday convicted former Cendant Corp. chairman Walter A. Forbes of conspiracy and filing false financial reports, bringing to a close one of the government's longest-running fraud investigations after eight years and three trials.

Forbes, 63, faces more than 10 years in prison on the charges, which stem from a $250 million earnings manipulation at CUC International Inc., which through a merger became the travel and real estate conglomerate known as Cendant.

Two previous juries had failed to reach a unanimous verdict. Prosecutors this time cut the number of charges against Forbes and streamlined the presentation of their evidence, a strategy that made the case easier for jurors to digest, legal analysts said.

Cendant's disclosure of accounting tricks eight years ago slashed the stock price in half and erased $14 billion in shareholder value, ultimately leading the company to hand over a $3.2 billion settlement to investors, which was a record at the time.

The verdict closed the book on the Cendant case, which, at the time, before scandal-infused bankruptcies at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc., was considered the largest accounting fraud of the past decade. It also marked the third time in recent years that jurors rejected a top executive's claim that he failed to detect accounting tricks because he only breezily reviewed financial reports and delegated the details to subordinates who deceived him.

Two other businessmen who advanced that defense, WorldCom founder Bernard J. Ebbers and Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay, were convicted of all criminal charges against them. Ebbers is serving a 25-year prison sentence. Lay died in July before he could be sentenced, and a judge last month wiped away his conviction because of legal precedent.

Yesterday, U.S. District Judge Alan H. Nevas ordered Forbes to return to court Jan. 17 for sentencing. Nevas also increased Forbes's bail to $1.2 million and barred him from making significant asset transfers without court approval. Prosecutors had presented evidence that Forbes had shifted more than $25 million to his wife and children before his first trial.

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said he was "gratified" by the verdict and pleased for victims who "have waited a very long time for justice to be done."

"This is a great day for those who believe that everyone in our society must be held accountable for their conduct," Christie said in a statement.

Prosecutors contended that a scheme to produce steady earnings growth at CUC International got out of hand but that the fraud came to light months after the company merged with HFS Inc. to create Cendant in 1997. Cendant, which housed the Avis and Budget car rental businesses, Ramada hotels, and Century 21 Real Estate operations, among others, has since split into four companies.

In Forbes's case, government lawyers scuttled a dozen charges and focused on proving just four potential crimes. After three days of deliberation, jurors in Bridgeport, Conn., found Forbes not guilty of a related securities fraud charge. That strategy of paring down a complex case also proved successful against former Tyco International Ltd. chief executive L. Dennis

Kozlowski. Kozlowski's first prosecution ended in a mistrial, but he was convicted of larceny and other charges in a second attempt. He is serving a prison sentence of 8 1/3 to 25 years in a New York state facility.

Forbes's chief deputy, onetime Cendant vice chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was sentenced to 10 years in prison last year after a jury that deliberated for 33 days found him guilty of conspiracy, fraud and false statements. A trio of former Cendant executives, including finance chief Cosmo Corigliano, earlier pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate with the government in exchange for leniency at sentencing. Corigliano was the sole insider who tied Forbes to wrongdoing.

During the brief trial, which began last month, Forbes's attorneys attacked Corigliano as a liar who engineered the fraud, then struck a deal with prosecutors that allowed him to keep millions of dollars in cash and other assets.

Cendant, which had been paying Forbes's legal bills because a company spokesman said it was "obligated" to do so, may have grounds to recover some of the money because Forbes has been convicted.

Defense attorneys Brendan V. Sullivan Jr. and Barry Simon of the Washington law firm Williams & Connolly LLP did not return calls for comment, but Sullivan told Bloomberg News that he would appeal.

Cendant's Ex-Chairman Is Guilty Of 3 Charges (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, November 1, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) -- A jury found former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter Forbes guilty of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and two counts of making false statements Tuesday in a massive fraud scheme that cost the travel and real estate company and its investors more than $3 billion.

He was found not guilty of a fourth count, securities fraud.

The verdict could end what was, when it was first brought, the largest case of accounting fraud in the country. The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years.

The case was being tried after two previous juries deadlocked.

"It's the third time and was worth all the effort," said Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in New Jersey. "We always believed fully in all the evidence against Mr. Forbes. We are extremely gratified by today's results."

Prosecutors say that Forbes participated in a scheme to inflate the stock of Cendant's predecessor, CUC International, by $500 million. The fraud was reported in 1998, causing Cendant's market value to drop by $14 billion in one day.

Forbes has argued he knew nothing about the fraud. His co-defendant, former Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted last year of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC.

A message seeking comment was left with Forbes' attorney.

Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison and ordered to pay $3.27 billion restitution to the company, which stockholders renamed Avis Budget Group. (NYSE:CAR) The restitution order includes a balloon payment of $15 million and monthly installments of $2,000 after he is released from prison.

Forbes was chief executive officer of CUC and Shelton was president before CUC merged with HFS Inc. to form New York-based Cendant in December 1997.

CUC, which ran a membership marketing operation, merged in 1997 with HFS Inc., a travel and real-estate services company, to form Cendant. Cendant's brands included Ramada, Howard Johnson, Avis, Coldwell Banker and Century 21.

Cendant was based in New York, but the litigation has been in Connecticut because the CUC division was headquartered in Stamford at the time the fraud occurred. The case was prosecuted by the New Jersey U.S. Attorney's office because HFS was headquartered in Parsippany, N.J.

In September, Cendant stockholders changed the company's name to Avis Budget Group to reflect its Avis and Budget vehicle rental brands. Its real estate and hotel businesses were spun off as stand-alone companies and the company sold its travel distribution operations.

SEC Shines Light On Obscure Market (WSJ)

By Serena Ng And Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Behind a regulatory probe into possible manipulation of Treasury prices is a strategy that helps traders make certain bonds scarcer and more valuable, say people familiar with the matter.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating whether UBS AG was involved in improper manipulation of Treasury-securities prices. Separately, a Credit Suisse Group bond trader recently left the firm amid regulatory scrutiny of the market. No regulator has alleged wrongdoing by any individual or at any specific bank.

Regulators are focusing on a large and somewhat obscure corner of the market where investment banks, hedge funds, mutual funds and other investors use bonds as collateral for short-term cash loans. It is called the repurchase-agreement, or "repo," market. Wall Street uses the repo market to borrow large sums of cash quickly, and the Federal Reserve uses the market to help manage short-term interest rates.

People familiar with the government's investigation say some firms might be intentionally restraining supply in the repo market by borrowing scarce bonds and then entering deals that park a large proportion of those bonds with custodian banks, keeping them from being lent out to other traders. By constraining supply this way, traders can make their holdings -- or the holdings of clients -- more profitable.

The deals, known as triparty repurchase agreements, are part of normal trading activity, but regulators are concerned they are being abused.

The custodian banks in these cases -- banks like J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Bank of New York Co. -- act as intermediaries, managing the use of the bonds as collateral and ensuring funds are transferred and interest is paid on the loans.

These custodian banks aren't suspected of any wrongdoing.

Triparty repos are widely used and generally make it more efficient to finance transactions. But these arrangements "also allow firms to park scarce securities in a collateral pool without losing control of them," says Lou Crandall, chief economist at Wrightson ICAP.

A firm that has control over the supply of a Treasury issue in high demand can profit by lending some of the bonds to other market participants and pay an interest rate on the cash it borrows that is well below the market rate.

A UBS spokesman declined to comment on the firm's trading strategy. A Credit Suisse spokesman declined to comment.

James Clouse, a Treasury Department official who in September publicly warned dealers about market manipulation, also discussed the use of triparty repos as a way for firms to control the supply of bonds.

"This strategy can be an exercise in monopoly pricing," Mr. Clouse said in the September speech.

Bond Prices Rise

Treasury prices rose, as weaker-than-expected economic data inspired investors, and the market benefited from month-end buying.

Prices climbed after the Conference Board reported a drop in consumer confidence levels for October. A decline in the Chicago Purchasing Management's regional business activity index last month also helped to push prices up.

At 4 p.m., the benchmark 10-year note was up 16/32 point, or $5 per $1,000 face value, at 102 2/32. Its yield fell to 4.610% from 4.671% Monday, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond rose 31/32 point to 96 16/32 to yield 4.721%/

Yesterday's data, coupled with last week's soft gross-domestic-product figure, left investors with a "sense the economy is going to be slower in the fourth quarter than expected," said Scott Gewirtz, head of Treasury trading at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. in New York. "That's helping to move the market higher," he said.

The market also was pushed by money managers buying bonds to rebalance portfolios at month end, said Michael Cheah, vice president and portfolio manager at AIG SunAmerica Asset Management in Jersey City, N.J.

McAfee Ex-Official Settles Case By A WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A former McAfee Inc. treasurer agreed to pay $758,000 and accept a five-year ban on serving as an officer of a public company to settle civil charges that he aided the computer-security company's multimillion-dollar fraud from mid-1999 until he left the company in July 2000, the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

Eric Borrmann, who served in various senior positions including treasurer, settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing.

Mr. Borrmann was accused of assisting McAfee's executives and senior managers in preparing and distributing false and misleading information about the company's financial results. He also was accused of making $314,517 in illegal profits by trading on inside information about McAfee's fraud.

Earlier this year, McAfee, based in Santa Clara, Calif., agreed to pay a $50 million civil penalty to settle charges that it engaged in a fraudulent scheme that overstated cumulative net revenue by $622 million from 1998 through 2000.

An attorney for Mr. Borrmann couldn't be reached to comment.

Mr. Borrmann must return the money that he illegally earned and pay $128,529 in interest. In addition, he will pay a $314,517 civil penalty.

Executive compensation scandals are back, in Europe as well as in the U.S. Just think of the news during the last couple of weeks. There were stories about the backdating of executive stock options, a court ruling ordering former New York Stock Exchange boss Dick Grasso to repay tens of millions of dollars in retirement pay, the retrial of members of Mannesmann's supervisory board, the controversial BHP Billiton's bonus awards, and a 30% pay increase for Siemens CEO Klaus Kleinfeld at the same time that 3,000 of his employees lost their jobs. Whew!

Economists have traditionally taken a benign view of stock options and generous executive compensation. Basic economic theory suggests that they align management interests with shareholders'. If managers were simply paid moderate, flat salaries, why would they ever allow takeovers by a predator who might fire them, or implement painful but necessary restructurings, or take on the risks of major new investment projects?

But the excesses of the last few years have fueled the resurgence of the contrarian view: that high incentive pay can actually exacerbate conflicts between shareholder value and CEO interests. While executive pay is supposed to be awarded by shareholders to their managers in order to improve incentives, the reality is that managers often control their own pay awards. Thus, a culture of high pay may be a signal of expropriation rather than a tool for value creation.

So is incentives-based pay a symptom or a cure for corporate governance ailments?

Let's look at some of the recent controversies. Since options backdating was unearthed last year, over 30 U.S. CEOs and board members have lost their jobs. Last Friday a court in Germany began the retrial of six former Mannesmann board members accused of giving themselves €57 million in bonuses for facilitating the 2000 takeover by Britain's Vodafone. Noel Forgeard was forced out as Airbus CEO after exercising options in March, shortly before news of delays to the company's most important project sent the share price crashing down. The Association of British Insurers (who represent approximately 20% of shareholders in all U.K. companies) has recently put out an alert after BHP Billiton awarded bonuses in excess of its stated policy without first consulting shareholders.

Some of these events suggest the possibility of serious corporate governance abuses, such as options backdating in the U.S. For a CEO to cash in options while in possession of negative inside information would also be a serious abuse, which is why the Airbus case attracted so much attention despite explicit denials from management. But in other cases, while management received a large amount of money, this may have induced an outcome that is favorable to shareholders. The Mannesmann takeover created value for its shareholders. The corporate governance problem at BHP Billiton was one of process rather than outcome: Shareholders were not particularly opposed to the compensation package in itself, but the fact that it violated the company's declared guidelines.

What is the right balance between encouraging effort and preventing top management from simply helping themselves to corporate resources?

Different countries have adopted various responses to this question, combining three main elements: better disclosure of information on executive compensation, more power for shareholders to participate in compensation decisions, and stricter ex-post enforcement via regulation and legal sanctions.

Most countries now require listed companies to disclose much more information than in the past. While continental Europe has traditionally tolerated opaque reporting, complete disclosure of individual board members' compensation, including stock options, has been mandatory in Italy since 1999, in France since 2001, and in Germany since 2006.

Traditionally, U.K. shareholders have enjoyed more power over their companies than have shareholders in other countries. For instance, they cast a nonbinding vote on the report of the compensation committee. Boards promote shareholder interests by maintaining independence from management. The CEO normally cannot also serve as chairman. Boards should have a majority of independent directors. The compensation committee must comprise exclusively independent directors, and directors who have served more than 10 years on the board are no longer considered to be independent. Similar measures have now been introduced by the main U.S. stock exchanges and Continental Europe, although they both lag behind the U.K.

Ex-post enforcement takes two forms. Securities regulators can initiate proceedings including criminal prosecutions, or shareholders can take private action. The U.S. system relies heavily on both forms of enforcement. In Enron and other high-profile cases, top executives have received heavy jail sentences which would be out of the question in most other countries. Also, the class-action system in the U.S. facilitates civil suits on behalf of shareholders. Although most countries have given increased power to securities regulators, and some such as Germany have also tried to facilitate shareholder lawsuits, none compares to the U.S. in terms of severity of punishments.

Disclosure, shareholder empowerment and ex-post enforcement are all ways of improving corporate governance. Which one is best? Disclosure not only helps but clearly is necessary: "Sunshine is the best disinfectant," as Louis Brandeis wrote. But disclosure alone cannot solve the big problems in corporate governance.

We have no doubt that shareholder empowerment is the way forward. We would like to see more mechanisms for shareholders to voice their claims as owners, such as more democratic board elections, since potential board members too often run unopposed; a more open takeover market, since incumbent managers too often can rely on various means of fending off hostile takeovers; or better representation for minority shareholders, since larger shareholders too often can abuse their power against the interests of others.

We disagree with the view that aggressive enforcement is the key to improved corporate governance. We'd certainly like to see blatant transgressors punished, but available evidence shows that relying on enforcement by securities regulators does not suffice. If there is one lesson to be learned from the options backdating scandal, it is that even the most devious lawmaker could never anticipate and prohibit all the devices that managers might conceive to abuse their shareholders.

Intuit Emerges Unscathed From Government Stock Option Investigation (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - MOUNTAIN VIEW, California-Intuit Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission has closed its investigation into the software maker's stock option accounting practices without taking any punitive action.

The conclusion removes Mountain View-based Intuit from a long list of companies under SEC scrutiny as regulators examine whether employee stock options had been manipulated in a way that inflates profits and decreases tax bills. The SEC began its Intuit inquiry in June.

Most of the problems to surface so far have revolved around "backdating." Under this practice, insiders try to make the rewards more lucrative by retroactively pinning the option's exercise price to a low point in the stock's value. Backdating can distort a company's books if the activity isn't properly recorded.

Intuit, which makes the popular TurboTax and Quicken programs, had previously disclosed that it did not need to restate its past profits because an internal investigation found no evidence of stock options misconduct.

The U.S. Attorney's office subpoenaed Intuit for information pertaining to its stock options around the same time the SEC began its investigation. Intuit said the U.S. Attorney's office hasn't sought additional information since the company passed along the findings of its internal inquiry.

Intuit shares rose 64 cents Monday to close at $35.07 on the Nasdaq Stock Market, then added 15 cents in extended trading.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Florida Searches For Root Of Surge In Violent Crime (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, November 1, 2006

ORLANDO — It was another day of brilliant sunshine and big crowds last Thursday at Walt Disney World and Universal Studios.

A few hours earlier, however, and a few miles away from the resorts that draw millions of visitors each year, a grim milestone had been reached: Orange County, excluding Orlando, recorded its 50th homicide of the year, topping last year's record of 49.

Orlando itself also is reporting homicides at an unprecedented pace: 42 so far this year, nearly double the 22 slayings last year in the city of 200,000.

The escalating number of killings in the Orlando area has made it one of the most extreme examples of the increasing violent crime rates being reported in dozens of cities across the nation, according to a recent analysis by the Police Executive Research Forum, a police advocacy group.

The FBI, which issues an annual report on crime nationwide, has not released numbers for 2006. However, the police group's report led the Justice Department to launch a review of possible demographic and economic triggers for violence in cities from Philadelphia to Sacramento. Meanwhile, the FBI has directed more than 100 additional agents to help local authorities fight violent crime.

There are a range of theories on the reasons for the jump in violence nationwide, including escalating gang wars and turf fights among drug rings. The Police Executive Research Forum used its analysis to underscore its claim that the U.S. government's focus on counterterrorism has undermined local authorities by directing federal money away from law enforcement.

In Florida, however, the violence seems to have roots that are more complex. Local authorities such as Ron Stucker, criminal investigations chief for the Orange County Sheriff's Department, say that although traditional gangs have a presence here, most of the homicides in this area appear to have stemmed from robberies or drug-related disputes that suddenly turned violent.

Across Florida, police are reporting spikes in violence after a decade of historically low crime rates.

This month, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement reported that homicides statewide were up by 27% through the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period last year. Robberies were up about 11% from 2005, the department reported. Local officials gave similar reports:

·In Jacksonville, homicides were up 30% during the first nine months of 2006, compared with the same period last year.

·In West Palm Beach, homicides were up 50% in the first six months of this year, compared with the first half of 2005. Since then, Police Chief Delsa Bush says, murder has stabilized, but robberies have soared.

·In Miami, homicides and robberies rose during the first half of 2006. Homicides were up 15%; robberies were up 7%.

"I don't think there is a particular reason (for the violence) that can identified," Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said recently. "Yeah, I'm concerned when there is that level of violence. It's happening across the country."

Ask Stucker what's driving the surge in violence in the Orlando area, and he points to cases such as a slaying Oct. 25 outside a strip club and a brutal robbery hours earlier of a 78-year-old former sheriff's lieutenant.

Both, Stucker says, illustrate a new and increasingly deadly escalation of behavior in which offenders are quick to use lethal force. In the strip club case, an argument in the parking lot quickly became an exchange of punches and then a knife attack that killed a 24-year-old man.

Stucker and Sgt. Allen Lee, head of the Orange County Sheriff's Department's homicide division, say there was no evidence of a history of violence between the victim and an undisclosed number of suspects.

The same apparently was true of the robbery involving Paul Murphy. The retired sheriff's lieutenant was leaving a convenience store after buying a candy bar and a newspaper when he was beaten.

"It goes from zero to 100 mph and sometimes murder, just like that," Lee says. "You see minimal confrontations blow (up), and there is no hesitancy to kill."

Especially alarming, Lee says, is a rise in robbery-related homicides. At least 12 of the county's 50 killings this year have been linked to robberies, compared with three or four such incidents in recent years.

The random nature of the robbery-related murders makes it more difficult to identify and pursue suspects, he says, and has contributed to a decline in clearance rates — from near 70% in previous years to about 50% today.

"It's flabbergasting to see suspects sit across from you" during questioning, Lee says. "They talk like death is the cost of doing business, an acceptable loss."

Orlando and the University of Central Florida are reviewing homicides in the city over the past five years to try to pinpoint causes of violence. Orlando Police Chief Michael McCoy and police Sgt. Richard Ring, who directs the city's homicide unit, say researchers will analyze the connections between offenders and victims.

There is little evidence to suggest the violence is slowing the region's $28 billion-a-year resort industry, which attracted 50 million tourists to the area last year, according to the Orlando/Orange County Convention and Visitors Bureau.

The area's tourist attractions have not been immune to violent crime, however. Last Friday, one person was wounded in a shooting in a parking lot at the Universal Orlando resort.

Resort spokesman Tom Schroder says it was the first such incident in the resort's 16-year history.

Stucker says that for the most part, the local violence has been limited to the west and south sides of Orange County, about 15 minutes from the resort areas. Beyond those areas, Stucker says, he isn't sure whether most residents view the rising violence as a big concern.

"People should be concerned, because it will spill out," he says.

Crime Continues To Rise In Montgomery (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Crime in Montgomery County increased by 7 percent during the year's second quarter, largely driven by a sharp rise in robberies, according to statistics released yesterday.

Robberies increased by almost 68 percent during the reporting period, which ran from April to June. Another significant rise was in auto theft, which increased by 22 percent.

Taking into account the 12 percent increase in the first quarter, the county experienced a nearly 10 percent increase in reported crime during the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period last year.

Police Chief J. Thomas Manger said the increase is part of a national trend. Across the country, violent crime is on the rise, partly driven by an increase in juvenile delinquency.

DOJ_NMG_0089564

"I certainly react to it in a measured way," Manger said of the second quarter statistics. "My folks have a good handle on what the trends are, the locations where these things are happening. As best as we can, we're trying to buck this national trend."

Other jurisdictions in the area, including Fairfax and Prince William counties, also recorded more robberies in the second quarter. But Prince George's County, which generally has a higher crime rate than Montgomery, says reported robberies fell significantly.

Manger said he has added slots for robbery detectives and launched initiatives, including surveillance operations, in an effort to make a dent in the robbery rate.

He said Latinos in the county are being disproportionately targeted by robbers.

"There is a trend that Latino individuals are being targeted because the thought [among criminals] is that they don't keep money in the bank and they're going to have more money on them," Manger said.

The chief said groups of juveniles, some of whom belong to gangs, are responsible for a considerable number of robberies and other serious crimes. Montgomery police says crime committed by gang members in the county is on the rise.

The chief said victims could take steps to prevent many of the crimes that are driving the numbers up.

"In our burglaries and thefts, primarily, the victims in these cases are making it awfully easy for people to steal their stuff," Manger said. "They're leaving garage doors open, leaving car doors unlocked."

The number of reported homicides rose from three to six in the second quarter and from six to 10 in the first six months. The number of rapes decreased from 37 to 31 in the quarter and from 71 to 64 in the first six months.

Aggravated assaults decreased slightly during the second quarter. Burglaries and larcenies rose about 9 percent each. Less serious crimes -- such as minor assaults, forgery, embezzlement, prostitution and drug-related offenses -- increased by nearly 5 percent.

The number of reported arsons rose considerably during the quarter, from 15 in 2005 to 34 this year.

Attorneys: No Backstory In CIA Leak Case (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 1, 2006

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby agree on something: keeping Libby's perjury trial in the CIA leak case focused solely on his actions. The two are separately asking a federal judge not to allow three years of politically charged backstory in the case to seep into Libby's trial starting in January.

In new court documents, Fitzgerald argued that he shouldn't have to explain why Libby was charged while others, including the source of the leak, escaped prosecution. Libby said jurors shouldn't hear about New York Times reporter Judith Miller's 85-day jail term for refusing to discuss her conversations with him.

The court documents, filed late Monday, are an effort to keep the trial focused on whether Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, lied to investigators about his conversation with reporters regarding CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Libby's supporters have accused Fitzgerald of singling him out while not charging the source of the leak, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. Fitzgerald wrote Monday that discussing that issue would be irrelevant.

"If Mr. X was investigated for leaking classified information, the government's decision not to charge Mr. X should have nothing to do with the jury's role as the finder of fact in Libby's case," Fitzgerald wrote.

The prosecutor is trying to prevent Libby's attorneys from making the argument that Libby had no reason to lie because, if he had leaked classified information, prosecutors would have charged him with it.

Similarly, Libby's attorneys said it would be unfair for prosecutors to discuss Miller's refusal to testify or the lengthy court fight involving other reporters. Miller cooperated with investigators after serving 85 days in jail.

"The introduction of these issues would undoubtedly cause jurors to wonder whether Ms. Miller went to jail in an effort to shield Mr. Libby from liability, and whether Mr. Libby is to blame for her incarceration," defense attorneys wrote.

If such testimony is allowed at trial, defense attorneys said they might have to call Fitzgerald as a witness to discuss his role in getting Miller and others to testify.

Plame believes her identity was leaked as retribution for her husband's criticism of the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq. Defense attorneys also asked a federal judge to block discussions about whether Plame's CIA status was classified or whether releasing that information jeopardized her safety or national security.

Judge Is Asked To Block Libby Defense From Discussing Lack Of Stronger Charges (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 31, 2006

Prosecutors are asking a federal judge to preclude lawyers for a former White House aide facing trial for lying and obstruction of justice, I. Lewis Libby, from telling jurors that the government failed to charge Mr. Libby or anyone else in connection with the event that triggered the probe, the disclosure of the identity of a veteran CIA officer in 2003.

Meanwhile, defense attorneys are seeking to prevent jurors from learning about any damage caused by the leak about the CIA operative, Valerie Plame. The defense also wants to keep the jury in the dark about the 85-day incarceration of a New York Times reporter, Judith Miller, after she was cited for contempt for refusing to testify about her contacts with Mr. Libby, who was then chief of staff to Vice President Cheney.

The legal maneuvering came as the two sides faced a deadline yesterday to file motions aimed at restricting evidence or arguments to be presented at Mr. Libby's trial, which is set for January.

The special prosecutor assigned to the inquiry, Patrick Fitzgerald, asked Judge Reggie Walton to preclude defense attorneys from discussing during the trial why Mr. Libby was not charged with deliberately outing Ms. Plame. Mr. Fitzgerald also asked to exclude any evidence about why others were not charged in the case.

"The fact that neither Libby nor anyone else has been charged with a crime for the disclosure of classified information is irrelevant to whether Libby committed the crimes charged in the indictment," Mr. Fitzgerald argued. He wrote that discussion of the government's charging decisions could lead to "unfair prejudice" and "jury nullification."

"The jury might impute to the government certain beliefs based on the decisions not to charge certain crimes and improperly draw inferences regarding the government's view of the conduct, such as the conclusion that the government believes the defendant's behavior in disclosing information was proper," Mr. Fitzgerald said.

The Justice Department selected Mr. Fitzgerald, the top federal prosecutor in Chicago, to examine whether any laws were broken in the disclosure of Ms. Plame's identity in a newspaper column by Robert Novak in 2003. Initial speculation suggested that White House officials engineered the leak because Ms. Plame's husband, Joseph Wilson, had criticized President Bush for claiming that Iraq sought nuclear materials in Africa.

It emerged recently that the initial leak to Mr. Novak came from the deputy secretary of state at the time, Richard Armitage, though other reporters have testified that they learned of or confirmed Ms. Plame's CIA employment from Mr. Libby and another White House aide, Karl Rove.

No one has been charged criminally in connection with the leak itself, though Ms. Plame has brought a civil suit against various officials.

Mr. Libby resigned after being indicted last year on charges that he lied about his contacts with reporters and about his knowledge that Ms. Plame's status was classified. He has pleaded not guilty.

Defense lawyers asked Judge Walton to block all testimony about the legal maelstrom that surrounded the government's efforts to get testimony from reporters believed to have learned of Ms. Plame's identity from officials in the government.

The defense filing revisits a dispute about how clearly Mr. Libby informed Ms. Miller, who later left the Times, that he wanted her to testify about their discussions. Mr. Libby's attorneys have insisted that they left no doubt about the White House aide's position. Ms. Miller and one of her lawyers, Floyd Abrams, have said they picked up signals that Mr. Libby's waiver was less than voluntary. The reporter spent nearly three months in jail in Virginia before the waiver was clarified and she testified that she was told about Ms. Plame by Mr. Libby.

Defense lawyers said the details might lead the jury to think, unfairly, that Mr. Libby engineered a cover-up. "The introduction of these issues would undoubtedly cause jurors to wonder whether Ms. Miller went to jail in an effort to shield Mr. Libby from liability, and whether Mr. Libby is to blame for her incarceration," the defense team wrote.

Mr. Libby's attorneys are also seeking to exclude from the trial any talk that Ms. Plame's employment at the CIA was classified or covert. Such a ruling would leave jurors with little or no understanding of why Mr. Fitzgerald's investigation began. Instead, Mr. Libby's trial would become a sterile, seemingly-random discussion of inconsistent recollections between a former White House official and several reporters about conversations four years earlier.

However, the defense argued that such a constrained trial is the necessary result of the government's refusal to hand over documents detailing the secrecy surrounding Ms. Plame's employment. "It would be manifestly unfair to allow the government to put into issue a matter that Mr. Libby has been denied any real opportunity to investigate and contest," the defense lawyers wrote.

Mr. Libby's legal team also wants to block Mr. Fitzgerald from suggesting that Mr. Libby did anything wrong when he discussed contents of a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq with journalists, including Ms. Miller. Mr. Libby has claimed that he was told by Vice President Cheney that Mr. Bush authorized the release of key findings in the report, which was highly-classified until that point.

One of yesterday's defense filings discloses that two other White House employees were privy to at least part of another conversation where Mr. Libby allegedly discussed Ms. Plame's CIA post with a reporter. The defense said Mr. Cheney's spokesman, Catherine Martin, and Mr. Libby's assistant, Jennifer Mayfield, were present when Mr. Libby spoke by phone with Matthew Cooper of Time magazine.

However, it's unclear whether Ms. Martin and Ms. Mayfield would have understood the import of Mr. Libby's alleged comment about the CIA operative. Mr. Cooper has said that when he said he'd been told Ms. Plame worked at CIA, Mr. Libby replied something to the effect of, "Yeah, I've heard that, too."

Mr. Cooper got his initial tip about Ms. Plame from President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove. Mr. Rove was investigated intensely by Mr. Fitzgerald, who ultimately decided not to seek charges.

Democrats have urged Mr. Bush to fire Mr. Rove or strip him of his security clearance. The White House has not responded to the suggestion.

Judge Walton has said he wants all written arguments on the pre-trial motions wrapped up by Nov. 17 because he is scheduled to leave for Jamaica the next day. "It is particularly important for the expeditious resolution of these motions that Judge Walton have something to work on while relaxing on the beach," he wrote in an order earlier this month.

Masilotti Grand Jury Highlights Lobbyist's Role (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), November 1, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — William Boose, one of Palm Beach County's most influential lobbyists, is a central figure in the biggest corruption scandal to rock county government in nearly a century.

A federal grand jury that indicted former County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti in a land-deal conspiracy also is looking at Boose.

In the criminal information filed against Masilotti, the grand jury found Boose helped Masilotti hide his interest in a government land deal in Martin County. When FBI agents started asking questions, Boose falsified legal bills to disguise the fact that he didn't charge Masilotti full price for legal services, according to the court record. He worked on Masilotti's land deal while lobbying the county commission for other developer clients. His business relationship with the commissioner never was disclosed, the grand jury reported.

No criminal charges against Boose, 62, have been made public, but he has hired attorney Jack Goldberger - a legal powerhouse who has a reputation for working with authorities to negotiate plea deals for high-profile clients. Goldberger and his client aren't talking.

Boose's friends are worried. "I talked to him about 10 days ago, roughly when he realized something major was up," said George Elmore, a long-time friend and lobbying client. "Be kind to him."

Like scores of major landowners in the county, Elmore, the multimillionaire founder of Delray Beach-based Hardrives construction, credits Boose with getting government agencies to approve large, problem-plagued projects that would have flummoxed other attorneys.

Masilotti reached out to Boose in 2002 as the commissioner plotted a scheme to profit from a Martin County land purchase by the South Florida Water Management District, a well-publicized acquisition to help clean up the Loxahatchee River. Masilotti wanted to secretly own land that the district would buy. Boose provided the vehicle: a secret land trust, prosecutors alleged.

The land deal hit a snag when the district required disclosure of who was behind the land trust. Boose, according to the grand jury, helped engineer a land swap that would hide Masilotti's $1.3 million profit.

Boose has weathered adversity before.

In the 1980s, Boose was a tanned, fit and good-looking farm boy who had a wildly successful law practice, a two-story Colonial-style house along the Intracoastal Waterway in West Palm Beach and a reputation as the man high-rollers should see if they wanted to develop property in Palm Beach County.

Then came the late-'80s real-estate crash.

"He would have been a lot better off to file for bankruptcy," Elmore recalled. "But he wouldn't because it was against his principles."

Then Elmore added with a rueful laugh, "He's concerned about his image."

The image Boose carefully cultivated, the one that kept his financial problems hidden, allowed him to weather a financial storm that might have sunk lesser men.

It's a reputation Boose developed early in his multifaceted career, which took him from a $20,000 job as the county's first planning director to the height of his profession. After graduating from law school at the University of Florida, he got real-estate and general contractor's licenses and eventually became a developer himself.

Boose helped found the company that became Touchstone-Webb Realty. He was in a partnership that developed the Northbridge Centre, the black high-rise in downtown West Palm Beach known as the Darth Vader building. He was one of the owners of the Amtrak station on Tamarind Avenue before selling it to the city of West Palm Beach for $2.5 million. He has handled scores of large-scale rezoning requests.

"He's a workaholic," said County Commissioner Karen Marcus, who has known Boose since she was a commission aide.

Her first memory of him was when she was 19 and he and another young lawyer tried to pick up her and a friend as they were leaving the courthouse. Neither she nor her friend became romantically involved with either of the attorneys, but she and Boose became fast friends.

His friendship with commissioners has been both his strength and a sore point among those who question whether it made him uniquely qualified to persuade the commission to embrace unchecked development.

"He had an inordinate amount of influence with them because he knew them," said Dorothy Wilken, a former county commissioner and clerk of courts.

After serving as the county's first director of planning, zoning and building, he opened a private land-use law practice and began lobbying the commission. Based in part on his actions, Wilken unsuccessfully pushed for a law to restrict the ability of former county staffers to lobby the commission.

It was a time when county government was ruled by a group of young men and women dubbed the Kiddie Car Gang. Though some, such as current Airports Director Bruce Pelly and Assistant County Administrator Vince Bonvento, made careers in county offices, many turned up on the other side of the podium as lobbyists.

Boose's change of uniform was noteworthy because he had authored the county first comprehensive land-use plan, a document that won awards and rave reviews from managed-growth advocates.

"The ironic part is after assisting the county commission in adopting an award-winning land-use plan in the 1970s, he went to the other side and began to dismantle it," Wilken said. "He knew where all the loopholes were."

Former Commissioner Dennis Koehler, who was a member of the Kiddie Car Gang, said Wilken's criticism is unfounded.

In many respects, Boose was ahead of his time, he said. Long before impact fees were required of developers, Boose would force clients to donate land for parks or schools or pay for multimillion-dollar road projects to get development approval.

And, Koehler said, Boose wouldn't let his clients forget promises. "I don't think he created any loopholes," Koehler said. "He played the game straight up. I would credit Bill with influencing those kind of development contributions, and I would think that's a fine legacy."

And, those who knew him said, his rise wasn't happenstance. He set five-year plans for himself. A native of Nebraska, he went to law school in Florida because he knew it was a high-growth state. He planned his moves carefully and then worked hard to achieve his goals.

He once described himself this way: "I consider myself a B-skill player who tries to participate at an A level through intensive preparation."

The divorced father of an adult daughter, he lives with a longtime girlfriend in Palm Beach Gardens.

"He's gone through it all," Elmore said. "He's had trials and tribulations in his personal life. He takes on challenges and finds a way to solve them. He perseveres."

Fraud Charges Against 35 In Sting (PHI)

By Vernon Clark

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 1, 2006

A Center City lawyer and 34 other people were charged with fraud yesterday in an elaborate sting operation that focused on personal injury claims from supposed vehicular accidents, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced.

U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said his office and the FBI set up a bogus chiropractic clinic, known as Injury Associates, on Roosevelt Boulevard in Northeast Philadelphia as the center of the sting, which was conducted over about three years.

Officials said those charged were divided into three groups: the lawyer, Jordan B. Luber, who obtained a legal settlement on behalf of two FBI agents posing as injured patients from a vehicular accident; 31 "patients" who sought financial recovery based on false medical diagnoses and nonexistent medical treatment for supposed injuries from vehicle accidents; and "runners" who received referral fees from Injury Associates for recruiting "patients" to the clinic while knowing the clinic was a fraudulent operation.

In the scheme, the runners got kickbacks, and the patients received paperwork that could be used to file injury claims in hopes of receiving a settlement.

Meehan said the fraud caused harm to insurance companies and their customers.

"This goes back to the ratepayers, each and every one of us who pay insurance premiums," Meehan said.

Officials said the fraudulent personal injury actions pursued by the defendants yielded more than $1.5 million in settlement demands and more than $350,000 in insurance company payments. They provided no breakdown of individual payments.

The clinic offered no medical treatments, and the patients were told up front that they were going to be part of a fraud, officials said.

Meehan said the "patients" were given ample opportunity to back out of the fraud. "Instead, they went forward," he said.

"It was simply a paper-processing mill," Meehan said of Injury Associates.

He said the paperwork was primarily false treatment records and false medical diagnoses.

The undercover agents explained to the "patients" that Injury Associates' goal was to help them support their personal injury claims by preparing paperwork to make it appear as if they were receiving treatment even though they were not, officials said.

The clinic allowed people who were in real or staged car accidents a chance to seek compensation for personal injuries based on fake or exaggerated claims, officials said.

The defendants face maximum sentences from 60 to 210 years in prison, officials said.

35 Facing Charges In Insurance Claim Scam (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 1, 2006

Injury Associates was not just another chiropractic clinic. In fact, it wasn't a chiropractic clinic at all.

It was part of an elaborate FBI sting carried out from 2003 to June 2006 that targeted individuals participating in phony personal-injury claims against auto insurers arising out of supposed car accidents.

A federal grand jury yesterday charged 35 individuals with mail and health-care fraud in the scheme.

Among those charged was Philadelphia lawyer Jordan B. Luber, 40, of Lafayette Hill, a partner in the firm of Luber & Cataldi, which specializes in personal-injury cases, including those received from automobile accidents.

The feds say Luber sought and obtained legal settlement on behalf of two FBI undercover agents posing as patients injured in a car accident.

Prosecutors allege Luber knew that their injuries were either fabricated or exaggerated and that they had received no medical treatment. He then allegedly negotiated a $15,000 settlement with St. Paul Travelers insurance company.

Luber allegedly pocketed a $6,000 fee and split the rest of the proceeds with the two agents. The feds want him to forfeit the money.

Luber was arraigned yesterday before U.S. Magistrate Judge David R. Strawbridge and pleaded not guilty. He was released on $100,000 bail secured by his property in Lafayette Hill.

The grand jury also charged 31 people who tried to recover claims and three "runners" who received referral fees for recruiting patients to the clinic.

Most of those charged were arraigned yesterday and pleaded not guilty.

"It was explained to these defendants up front that they were going to be part of a fraud," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said yesterday. "They were given a chance to bail out and they chose to keep going."

The fake clinic offered people who claimed to have been in real or staged automobile accidents an opportunity to pursue fraudulent personal-injury claims based upon fake or exaggerated injuries.

The defendants should have been wary of the sting from the get-go. Injury Associates made clear to anyone who wanted to use their facilities that it did not provide any medical treatment or therapy but existed solely to create paperwork to support the bogus injury claims.

The paperwork consisted of false medical records and reports.

Each individual sting operation began with a meeting between patients and undercover agents. In some cases, the runner who referred the patients also attended.

Injury Associates appeared to be a legitimate clinic, operating at a storefront on Roosevelt Boulevard near Rhawn Street in Northeast Philadelphia.

Arriving patients were greeted by a receptionist and then were taken into an inner office for an initial consultation.

FBI agents then explained to potential patients how the scam worked. The meetings were both audio- and videotaped.

If a patient wanted to proceed, agents would assign injuries to the patient that would maximize the value of the patient's claim.

Agents then told the patients to report to the clinic at least once a week to sign in for the entire work week so it would appear they received treatment on numerous days each week.

Patients also were told that agents would use the sign-in sheets to describe the fake injuries which they would later submit to the patient's attorney to bolster the patient's claim.

The feds said the sting resulted in more than $1.5 million in settlement demands and $350,000 in actual insurance payments on the bogus claims.

The money was held in an escrow account maintained by the feds and later was returned to insurers.

Meehan said yesterday that the investigation is ongoing.

According to the Insurance Information Institute, bogus property and casualty claims cost insurers about $30 billion a year, a cost that is passed on to consumers in the form of higher rates.

35 Charged In Philly Insurance Fraud Sting (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Nearly three dozen people face fraud charges after federal authorities set up a phony chiropractic clinic as part of a sting operation that focused on personal-injury claims from supposed automobile accidents, authorities said Tuesday.

A lawyer, Jordan B. Luber, obtained a legal settlement on behalf of two FBI agents posing as injured patients from a traffic accident, according to federal authorities.

The 35 people charged also include 31 who sought payments based on false diagnoses and nonexistent treatment, and others who got fees from the clinic for bringing in phony patients, authorities said.

Patients at the Northeast Philadelphia clinic, called Injury Associates, were told up front that they were going to be part of a fraud, authorities said.

The scheme resulted in more than $1.5 million in settlement demands, and over $350,000 in insurance company payments on fraudulent claims, according to prosecutors.

"This kind of fraud affects the bottom line for all of us," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said in a statement. "We see higher insurance rates because some choose to exploit the system."

Messages left after business hours Tuesday at Luber's office and at a number provided to reach him after hours were not immediately returned.

Safety Margin For Tunnel Was Smaller Than Most, US Says (BOS)

By Sean P. Murphy And Scott Allen, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 1, 2006

Preliminary report issued

The Big Dig tunnel ceiling that collapsed in July was designed with a smaller margin of safety than other tunnel ceilings around the country, leaving nothing to prevent heavy concrete slabs from falling on a passing car when ceiling bolts fell out, according to a preliminary report by federal investigators obtained by the Globe.

The Interstate 90 connector's drop ceiling was held up by steel hangers, which were suspended from bolts that had been glued into the tunnel roof. But there were no beams attaching the ceiling to the walls, and the ceiling was constructed with half as many ceiling bolts as in the original design. "No redundancy was built into the ceiling in the event the hangers failed," the National Transportation Safety Board states in its report. "The NTSB has researched other tunnels throughout the country and has found that significant redundancy is built into the ceiling design" so that the ceilings would not collapse when bolts fall out.

The report does not reach conclusions about the cause of the ceiling collapse, because the investigation is not finished. But it shows reveals that the federal agency is looking into the adequacy of tests done to ensure the strength of the ceiling bolts and says notes that an employee of the testing contractor told investigators that testing procedures differed from what was required by the contruction contract.

The accident, which killed Milena Del Valle as she rode in a car to Logan International Airport with her husband late on July 10, already has triggered federal and state criminal investigations, a wrongful death lawsuit filed by Del Valle's family, and the resignation of the chief of the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority. But the investigation by the NTSB will carry enormous weight in assessing what went wrong and who should be punished, because of the agency's expertise in reconstructing disasters.

The preliminary report, sent to key federal officials yesterday, describes paints a picture of significant lapses by on the part of both the state government and private companies involved in the $14.6 billion Big Dig project. From the tunnel's original design in the mid-1990s to the moment of the accident, the report suggests that people involved in the project made decisions or mistakes that increased the risk of disaster, the report suggests.

For instance, the report said, officials from Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff, the joint venture overseeing the Big Dig, decided to use epoxy bolts to suspend the ceiling from the tunnel's roof, even after they had switched from a lightweight material used for the ceiling in the adjacent Ted Williams Tunnel to much heavier concrete ceiling panels to save money. Epoxy bolts, which are held in place by a kind of super glue, are rarely used to suspend such heavy objects over people's heads, according to Globe interviews with engineers who specialize in the low-cost, but somewhat delicate bolts.

Then in 1997, the NTSB found, Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff managers in 1997 directed the company designing the ceiling to follow a design that "provides little or no redundancy" to prevent a ceiling collapse if more than one hanger, each held up by two bolts, comes loose. NTSB researchers found that other US tunnels around the United States commonly feature side supports or other methods that back up the primary suspension system. if ceiling bolts come out.

By contrast, the connector tunnel had no side supports, and Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff persuaded the designers at Gannett Fleming to cut in half the overall number of ceiling bolts holding up the connector ceiling, according to a 1998 memo previously reported disclosed by the Globe. After the accident, state investigators found that ceiling panels in the connector tunnel could collapse if as few as four ceiling bolts fail.

The NTSB report also suggests that flaws in construction of the ceiling, carried out by Modern Continental Construction Co., may have made the design more hazardous. While offering few details, the report said FBI and State Police interviews with Modern Continental workers point to "potential problems in the procedures used during installation." In addition, epoxy samples taken from parts of the tunnel away from the accident site showed "dark brown discoloration," a sign that the epoxy was mixed improperly, diminishing weakening its strength.

The NTSB also said safety tests carried out to prove the ceiling bolts were securely in place may have damaged some bolts. An inspector from the bolt-testing company, ConAm Testing, told NTSB investigators that some bolts were tested while the concrete ceiling panels hung from them, which required workers to lift the weight off the bolt being tested - and shift it onto nearby bolts. That extra weight could have weakened weaken the strength of the bolts not undergoing the test, say engineers not connected to the Big Dig or the investigation.

The NTSB investigators also are looking at whether the bolt safety tests were rigorous enough. The Globe has reported that during construction in 1999, at least five bolts came loose soon after the connector ceiling was suspended from them, even though they had passed earlier safety tests. At the time, Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff officials required Modern Continental to retest bolts in parts of the connector using stricter safety standards, but bolts in the eastbound lane, where the ceiling caved in, were not retested.

Federal investigators have found no evidence that the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority ever rechecked the ceiling bolts after the connector opened to the public in 2003, to make sure they were not slipping out, the report said. If they had, the report finds, they would have seen some bolts showing "extreme displacement." under the stress of holding up the ceiling. Some of the 5Æ-inch-long bolts had come more than an inch out of their holes, the report said.

A lot of work remains to determine what happened and who is responsible. NTSB officials plan to interview more workers who built the ceiling, and lab analysts are testing the epoxy and how it was installed.

U.S. Supreme Court Considers Death Row Case In Florida (FINDLAW/AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A death row inmate's attorney argued Tuesday that the U.S. Supreme Court should allow the prisoner's appeal to continue despite a federal court ruling that he had missed a deadline for pursuing the case.

The lawyer for Gary Lawrence said Florida courts were to blame for the tardy appeal, not the inmate.

Attorney Mary Bonner told the justices that Lawrence did not receive a court-appointed counsel to handle his appeal for 10 months, wiping out most of the time that he had under federal law to seek review of his death sentence.

The issue involves the interpretation of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, which places limits on the prolonged appeals process in capital punishment cases. It imposes a one-year deadline for petitioning federal courts in death cases after final judgments in state courts.

Under questioning by Chief Justice John Roberts, Bonner agreed with Roberts that her interpretation of the law would involve a process lasting up to six months.

"This is not a frolic" that would last years, Bonner told the court.

The state of Florida said Lawrence had just one day remaining to petition the federal courts after the Florida Supreme Court ended the case on Nov. 18, 2002. The lawyer for the convicted killer says the deadline under the law did not expire until the U.S. Supreme Court refused to consider the case several months later.

Lawrence's appeal of his conviction came up in the Florida courts at a time when the state was reforming its post-conviction review process. It took the state three attempts and 10 months to find a lawyer to represent Lawrence.

Lawrence was convicted of beating his wife's lover to death with a pipe and baseball bat, then setting the body on fire 12 years ago.

Death Penalty In Limbo For Robinson (TOPCAPJ)

By Steve Fry, The Capital-Journal

Topeka (KS) Capitol-Journal, November 1, 2006

Federal prosecutors have one month to make decision

Frank Jerome "Chicago" Robinson, a Topekan charged with starting a fire that killed Marvina Washington last summer, will have another month before learning whether he will face possible imposition of the death penalty.

A federal district judge late last week gave federal prosecutors until Nov. 30 to decide whether to seek the federal death penalty against Robinson if he is convicted of a federal count of arson.

If Robinson is convicted, the maximum penalties for arson resulting in a death are life in prison or under certain circumstances, the death penalty, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office has said.

Marvina Washington, 53, was killed during a fire that destroyed the apartment house she lived in at 427 S.W. Tyler. After the fire was extinguished on Aug. 8, Washington's body was recovered from her second-floor apartment.

U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson said the delay wouldn't prejudice Frank Robinson and gave prosecutors until the close of business on Nov. 30 to file notice of the prosecution's intent to seek the death penalty. Before the judge's ruling, the deadline to file the notice had been Oct. 30.

In the prosecution request for more time, U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren and assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Mattivi didn't anticipate a decision would be made by federal prosecutors by the Oct. 30 deadline.

"As the court is undoubtedly aware, the process within the Department of Justice for determining whether or not to seek the death penalty in a particular case is both lengthy and cumbersome," the prosecution motion for more time said.

Any decision to seek the death penalty must be approved by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The judge granted the postponement motion on Oct. 26. The judge will hear the motion on Dec. 18, and Frank Robinson is to be tried starting Feb. 6.

One of two tenants who jumped from a second-story window, Sheila Ansley, 43, suffered serious injuries, an affidavit said. Washington's family identified Ansley as Washington's caretaker. Ansley had told an investigator that two other people, a blind woman and a man, remained in the building, but only Washington's body was found in the debris.

A Molotov cocktail was used to set fire to the four-unit apartment house, according to court records. The fire was started in a stairwell at the front entrance of the two-story apartment house at 427 S.W. Tyler, according to an investigator's affidavit filed in federal court. The stairway led to the apartment where Washington lived.

A federal magistrate judge denied setting bond for Frank Robinson, saying that Robinson would be a serious risk to flee if released and was a danger to the community.

Investigators probing the cause of the fire and arresting Robinson were from the Topeka Police Department, Topeka Fire Department, the Kansas Fire Marshal's Office and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Before it burned, the apartment house was the site of drug sales, fights, prostitution and drug use, two neighbors said. The neighbors said they witnessed people smoking crack cocaine on the porch, the brandishing of guns and knives by residents, and fights and arguing, all at 427 S.W. Tyler.

Since July 14, two men have been shot to death and a third was seriously wounded, all within a block of the fire.

Is A Trial Unfair If Accused Can't Confront Accuser? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON

In 1988, Marvin Bockting was accused of sexually abusing his 6-year-old stepdaughter. The little girl told her mother and a police detective about the alleged abuse, but she became too upset to testify at Mr. Bockting's trial in Nevada.

Instead, the girl's mother and the detective testified about what she had told them of the alleged sexual assault. Bockting was convicted and sentenced to life in prison.

Now, 18 years later, Bockting is seeking to overturn his conviction based on a 2004 US Supreme Court decision in a case called Crawford v. Washington. In that case, the Supreme Court strongly reaffirmed the constitutional right to confront one's accusers in court. At the same time, the court struck down a rule that had allowed the introduction at trial of testimonial statements made by a potential witness prior to the trial.

Bockting says his trial was unfair because his jury was never allowed to gauge the veracity of his stepdaughter's accusations through the crucible of cross-examination in open court.

Wednesday, the Supreme Court takes up Bockting's case to decide whether the high court's 2004 ruling should be applied retroactively to his 1988 child-abuse trial.

If it does apply retroactively, the case would also open the courthouse doors potentially for thousands of other individuals convicted under similar circumstances, where a key piece of testimonial evidence was allowed into the trial without the constitutional safeguard of cross-examination.

Since the Crawford decision was announced, it has been cited in roughly 20 cases each week seeking reversal of a conviction, according to a friend-of-the-court brief filed by 38 state attorneys general.

"The sheer volume of judicial citations to Crawford attests to the magnitude of the potential fallout if its holding applies retroactively," the brief says. "As of July 7, 2006, nearly 1,900 reported court decisions had cited Crawford."

A decision applying the ruling retroactively could trigger not only direct appeals in criminal cases, but also subsequent appeals under the federal habeas corpus statute. "The resulting litigation would be staggering, straining the capacity of the state and federal courts," the attorneys general warn.

Bockting's lawyer, Franny Forsman, the federal public defender in Las Vegas, says such warnings are overblown. Of 49 judicial opinions dealing with the Crawford issue handed down in state and federal courts within the Ninth US Circuit Court of Appeals' jurisdiction, only five resulted in defendants being granted some form of relief, Ms. Forsman writes in her brief.

In Bockting's case, a divided Ninth Circuit panel ruled that the Crawford decision does apply retroactively. Prosecutors in Nevada appealed that decision to the Supreme Court.

Nevada Attorney General George Chanos and US Solicitor General Paul Clement are urging the high court to reject the Ninth Circuit's reasoning. They say the Crawford decision established a new procedural rule rather than the kind of monumental watershed rule whose application is indispensable to a fair trial. To trigger retroactive application, a new rule must rise to a level of such constitutional import that not applying it would be fundamentally unfair to defendants convicted under the prior legal regime.

Six federal circuit courts and numerous state appellate courts have ruled that Crawford does not apply retroactively, says Mr. Chanos. "The Ninth Circuit stands alone in its conclusion that Crawford is retroactive," he writes in his brief.

At its core, the Bockting case presents the high court with a conundrum, according to some analysts: how to acknowledge the constitutional significance of the Crawford decision without opening a Pandora's box of criminal appeals.

"I don't see how the court could say this is not a watershed rule. It is such a fundamentally different way of thinking about the problem than anything we had before," says Richard Friedman, a professor at the University of Michigan Law School and a leading confrontation-clause scholar.

But he says it would damage the development of this area of law if the high court declared its Crawford decision retroactive.

Professor Friedman stresses that he is not an expert in legal retroactivity. But he says if the court rules in favor of retroactivity, many judges would probably embrace a more restrictive view of the right to confront one's accusers at trial.

"I would be sorry to see Crawford held retroactive because I think it would just be a dead weight around the clause," he says. "The tendency [of judges] would be to construe the confrontation right narrowly because of the horror about what the consequences would be if all these cases that had been long decided had to be opened up."

2 Men Found Guilty Of Murder In Slaying Of 14-Year-Old Witness (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

A man accused of ordering a hit on a 14-year-old witness was convicted of murder yesterday, along with the gunman he hired to kill the girl.

The slaying of Jahkema "Princess" Hansen was as brazen a witness attack as the city had experienced, and the trial, which began in late September, cast an unsettling light on the netherworld that Hansen -- and her killers -- inhabited. Just a seventh-grader, Hansen hung out with people a lot older, and she was out buying drugs with some of them at 3 a.m. when she saw a killing that later would cost her her life.

Franklin Thompson and Marquette Ward were convicted after a trial in D.C. Superior Court that took many strange turns. Last week, the judge removed a juror in the middle of deliberations after she tried to use numbers and colors to decide the case. Earlier, Hansen's mother had to stop attending the trial after the judge rebuked her for following a juror home.

Hansen was shot in January 2004 in the rough-and-tumble Sursum Corda housing complex, off North Capitol Street, where the two defendants were familiar faces. Ward was known as Corleone, for the Mafia family portrayed in the "Godfather" films, and Thompson was known as Frank Nitti, for the feared accomplice to Al Capone.

Yesterday, as the jury foreman answered guilty again and again -- 31 times in all -- Thompson, 24, and Ward, 31, betrayed no emotion as they sat behind their attorneys. Both were convicted of first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit murder, obstruction of justice and other offenses tied to Hansen's death.

Ward also was convicted of killing a drug dealer named Mario J. Evans, 21, just five days before Hansen was slain. It was that act that set in motion the chain of violence that would end in the girl's death, argued the prosecutors, assistant U.S. attorneys Deborah Sines and Michelle Jackson.

Thompson and Ward, who will be sentenced Jan. 19, could spend the rest of their lives in prison. Arrested soon after Hansen's death, they have been jailed since.

"I feel like they got what they deserved," one juror, a 65-year-old federal employee, said afterward. "It was a heinous crime."

The trial was full of horrible images and grim testimony about sex, drugs and violence. But it also had a bit of the bizarre.

A key government witness, despite his residence in a supposedly secure D.C. jail, turned out to have been high on marijuana when he showed up to testify, prompting an unsuccessful defense effort to strike the man's testimony. Judyann Hansen, the victim's mother, drew the judge's attention after she followed a juror home one day after court and introduced herself. Nothing more apparently was said.

And then there was the juror with the interest in numerology. Soon after deliberations began, the woman started talking to her fellow jurors about birth dates and names and colors and the significance of each in predicting the outcome of the case. Talks stalled until the other jurors alerted Judge Wendell P. Gardner Jr., who replaced the juror with an alternate.

But in the end, the trial was about a precocious girl named Princess. The teenager styled herself as a sex object of Sursum Corda, sleeping with older men, according to testimony. At one point, not long before she was killed, she even boasted that her prowess was her ultimate protection. One of the men she was having sex with was Ward, who was 28 at the time.

But after he fatally shot Evans in the hallway of an apartment building, with Hansen and others looking on, Ward grew worried that she was going to talk. After secretly following her to a police station, where she had been summoned by detectives, he was convinced of it.

In fact, it wasn't Hansen who was talking; she angrily gave police the brushoff. Another witness, Timika Holiday, was aiding police. She, too, had seen Evans slain, and she would see her friend Hansen killed as well.

In the small community in and around Sursum Corda, everyone seemed to know everyone else's business, and that made talking to the police a perilous practice.

It was a world that Hansen and her killers were part of, prosecutors say, and it was the world from which prosecutors had to draw many of their witnesses, including their star, Holiday.

But Holiday had issues of her own. She absconded from the witness protection program, and for a time prosecutors feared that she would be killed. They had her deposed so her testimony would be available for the jury to hear if she died before the trial began.

Ward's attorney, Steven D. Kupferberg, and Thompson's attorney, Rudolph Acree, did everything they could to undermine Holiday's credibility during her two days on the witness stand.

Like her friend Hansen, Holiday, now 22, was known around Sursum Corda for sleeping with older men, among them Thompson and Ward, sometimes for money, according to testimony in the trial.

"Even exchange," she called it, when asked during her testimony if what she was engaging in was prostitution.

In the days after Evans was killed, Ward was focused only on what Hansen might tell the police.

So, prosecutors said, he enlisted his friend Thompson, who lived in the neighborhood surrounding Sursum Corda and knew Hansen, to kill the girl for $8,000 -- even as Ward and Thompson were promising her money to keep quiet.

"Little sis, you best not be snitching," Thompson was alleged to have told Hansen hours before he would kill her.

What might have sounded to her like a tough-love admonition was in fact a sinister premonition of what would unfold shortly after 11 p.m. Jan. 23, 2004, in a townhouse in the 100 block of First Terrace NW.

Hansen and other children were gathered around a dining table at a friend's residence, laughing the evening away.

Sent along to make sure the hit went down, Ward's cousin peeked into the house to make sure Hansen was inside, prosecutors said.

Then, Thompson burst through the door and opened fire, prosecutors said. A 12-year-old girl was wounded. But she was not the target. Hansen was, and Thompson chased her through the house and ultimately shot her twice in the back of the head, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0089574

The crime, barely a mile from the Capitol, made national headlines. The police chief ordered a crackdown on the drugs and violence that had overtaken Sursum Corda. And Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) pushed to turn around the neighborhood for good. Over the summer, Williams gave the green light to a plan that would replace Sursum Corda with a much larger, mixed-income development of 1,600 units.

DNA Clears Man In Rape, Judge Rules (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

DALLAS, Oct. 31 (AP) — A man convicted of rape 25 years ago walked out of a courtroom a free man Tuesday after a judge ruled that he would probably not have been found guilty if DNA testing been available.

"My faith was tested, and I won," said the man, Larry Fuller, 57, who trembled slightly as he left the courthouse carrying two worn Bibles.

After the ruling by Judge Lana McDaniel of District Court, supporters of Mr. Fuller broke out in applause. The assistant district attorney, John Rolater, who was not involved in the original case, apologized to Mr. Fuller.

"Thank you," Mr. Fuller said. "Apology accepted."

Mr. Fuller was sentenced to 50 years after jurors convicted him of aggravated rape in 1981, finding that he had broken into a woman's apartment and raped her, using a butcher knife to cut her thumb, neck and back as she struggled.

The victim looked at two photo lineups, both of which included Mr. Fuller. She picked him in the second one, even though Mr. Fuller was bearded in the picture and she said her attacker had no facial hair.

At the time Mr. Fuller was a 32-year-old Vietnam veteran who had received the Air Medal for taking care of his crew. He was pursing a career in art and had worked as a driver and warehouse employee.

Mr. Fuller had no convictions for sexual assault, but he had pleaded guilty to robbing a convenience store in 1975 and had been sentenced to three years in prison. He served 18 years on the rape conviction. He was released in 1999 but sent back last year for a parole violation.

All the while, Mr. Fuller professed his innocence in the rape case and tried to prove it through DNA. This year, the Dallas County district attorney's office agreed to allow the additional testing.

Mr. Fuller's subsequent exoneration makes him the 10th Dallas County man in five years cleared by DNA testing. More than 20 men have been exonerated in Texas by such testing, according to the Innocence Project. Nationwide, 185 people have been cleared through DNA after their convictions, according to the Innocence Project. In most cases, testimony from mistaken witness identification led to the wrongful conviction, the group said.

Duke Rape Case Shadows An Unusual Campaign (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

DURHAM, N.C., Oct. 31 — The Democratic candidate is the prosecutor who brought the rape case against three Duke University lacrosse players.

His opponent on the ballot is a county commissioner who filed as an independent but refuses to campaign and says that if elected, he will not serve.

The third candidate is a Republican lawyer who is mounting a write-in campaign and promising to review the rape case, but is being pressured by the prosecutor's opponents to drop out in favor of the independent.

A week before Election Day, the race for Durham County district attorney is as odd a political campaign as anyone here can recall. The controversial lacrosse case looms over the incumbent, Michael B. Nifong. The opposition, under the banner of Anyone but Nifong, is fractured.

"The whole thing is very strange," said Joseph H. Collie, a retired businessman and supporter of the write-in Republican, Steve Monks.

Mr. Nifong's campaign director, Julie Linehan, remarked: "We have a saying here — O.I.D. Only in Durham."

After all the accusations and commentary that the case has generated around the country, there is mostly silence at the heart of the campaign: little advertising, no debates and no platform by the leading opponent except that if he should win, the governor will pick somebody else. Still, to the extent there is any campaign at all, it is because of Mr. Nifong's handling of the case against the three players, all white, accused of rape by a black woman hired to strip at a team party in March.

In a normal year in this heavily Democratic city, the Democrat would be a shoo-in. But this is not a normal year. Although Mr. Nifong by all appearances is the clear front-runner, a recent survey of 600 likely voters by WRAL-TV and The News &

Observer of Raleigh found that 28 percent favored Lewis A. Cheek, the candidate who says he will not serve if elected. Forty-six percent favored Mr. Nifong, but 24 percent were undecided. (Mr. Monks got only 2 percent.)

An Oct. 5 fund-raising letter from the Cheek campaign, signed by a retired sheriff, Roland W. Leary, and the campaign manager, Beth Brewer, said, "We deserve honesty, integrity, good judgment and a sense of fair play."

In an interview, Ms. Brewer was blunter, saying Mr. Nifong "twisted evidence he may or may not have to indict what I think are some pretty demonstrably innocent young men."

Out-of-state money from Duke supporters has also entered the campaign. Parents of two unindicted lacrosse players donated $5,000 to establish a group called Duke Students for an Ethical Durham, aimed at registering Duke students to vote against Mr. Nifong. The group's treasurer, Stefanie Anne Sparks, a paralegal in a law firm that has represented unindicted players, said the group had registered more than 1,000 new voters.

Mr. Nifong has been under attack for months by the defense and supporters of the lacrosse players for aggressively pursuing a case based almost entirely on the account of the accuser, which he acknowledges he has heard only from police reports and written statements, and not directly by speaking to her.

The flaws and gaps in the evidence have mounted. No DNA from the defendants was found on the dancer. At least one of the accused appears to have a strong alibi. A second woman hired to strip at the party has said she saw no evidence of an attack. And the array of photographs that led to the identification of the three defendants was not presented according to federal, state and local police guidelines for lineups.

The accusation against the players, by a student at predominantly black North Carolina Central University here, broke last March in the midst of a tough Democratic primary campaign for district attorney, and Mr. Nifong, who ultimately won that election, has been accused of seizing on the case to win black support. At the time, he asserted that he had "no doubt" a rape had occurred, and called the lacrosse players "a bunch of hooligans" whose "daddies could buy them expensive lawyers" whenever they got into trouble.

"I'm not going to allow Durham's view in the minds of the world to be a bunch of lacrosse players at Duke raping a black girl from Durham," he told a local television station.

In a recent interview, Mr. Nifong was defiant about pursuing the case in the face of defense attacks and questions about the strength of the evidence.

"They've come out really strong with the idea they would either scare me or the victim away," he said. "That's never worked for me, which they should know by now, and it didn't work for her, either. And so here we are."

Even if Mr. Nifong loses, it is unclear how the case will be affected. Mr. Cheek said that he tried twice this year to get Mr. Nifong to hand off the case to the state attorney general, and that he allowed the anti-Nifong campaign to put him up as a candidate when the district attorney refused. But because he has decided that he does not want to leave private practice, a victory by Mr. Cheek would mean that Gov. Michael F. Easley would have to pick a successor to Mr. Nifong. The governor, a Democrat, has not made his views on the case known publicly.

Mr. Monks, the Republican candidate, who is running on the slogan "It's Your Choice. Not the Governor's," said that if elected he would review the evidence carefully to make his own determination, but that "this case might very well have to go to trial."

Meanwhile, Mr. Nifong's supporters are trying to cast him as an experienced prosecutor and a neophyte politician. He has been a prosecutor for 28 years and says he has handled about 300 felony cases, but he is engaged in his first political race, having been appointed acting district attorney in April 2005.

"He's a good person, he's a good lawyer, but he's in a situation he has never been in before," said Ronald L. Stephens, a local judge who was district attorney before Mr. Nifong.

Last month Mr. Nifong won the endorsement of the city's most influential political group, the Durham Committee on the Affairs of Black People. His supporters are predicting that whatever controversy the case has generated will not determine the outcome at the polls.

"People who are upset about the lacrosse case, they will be vocal but I don't think significant," said Frank Hyman, a former city councilman and longtime political observer, who backs Mr. Nifong. "I think most people are going to recognize this needs to be settled in court and not in the press."

Boy, 15, Arrested After 'Bottle Bomb' Blows Up Near School Bus (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

A 15-year-old Rockville student was arrested yesterday afternoon after a homemade "bottle bomb" he was about to bring onto a school bus exploded as a teacher discarded it, Montgomery County Fire and Rescue Service officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0089576

A teacher at Mark Twain School who saw something suspicious approached the student -- whom authorities did not identify because he was charged as a juvenile -- as he was getting ready to board a school bus. As the teacher seized the two-liter bottle, its contents were activated by the movement, leading to an explosive chemical reaction.

The homemade bombs are unusual but easy to make, officials said.

"They're made to explode and can cause significant damage," said Pete Piringer, a spokesman for the fire and rescue service. "They're very dangerous to first-responders."

Firefighters were called to the school, at 14501 Avery Rd., shortly after the bottle detonated at 2:30 p.m. Investigators believe the bomb was made with common household products. It is unclear what the teenager sought to do with the bomb, Piringer said.

The student was charged with manufacturing and possession of an explosive device -- a felony punishable by up to 25 years in jail -- and reckless endangerment.

Most students who attend Mark Twain have special education needs, such as learning disabilities and behavioral problems

Auditor Reports Contract Lapses By Reiner Panel (LAT)

By Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

SACRAMENTO — A state commission chaired by Hollywood entertainer Rob Reiner suffered from lapses in its contracting, failed to properly award millions of dollars and did not adequately justify many of its payments, according to a state audit released today.

The nonpartisan California Bureau of State Audits found that the California Children and Families Commission, also known as the California First 5 Commission, used tax money to overpay for some services and failed to follow state rules when it awarded some contracts.

"We found a number of problems with the way it awards and manages these contracts," the report said, referring to the tens of millions in advertising and public relations contracts awarded since the commission was created after voters approved Proposition 10 in 1998.

"As a result, the state commission paid for services it had not contracted for, effectively preventing that money from being used to further the other activities allowed by the contract, namely purchasing printed ad space or broadcast media time," the audit said.

After a six-month investigation, the audit team concluded that the commission violated no laws when it aired television commercials last winter touting the benefits of preschool at the same time Reiner began a campaign to place an initiative on the state ballot to create universal preschool. Voters rejected that initiative, Proposition 82, in June.

"Our review determined that the state commission had clear legal authority to conduct its public advertising campaigns related to preschool," the auditors found.

Legislators requested the audit after The Times reported that the commission had used public money to pay for $23 million in preschool ads as the initiative campaign was launched.

Reiner resigned as the commission's chairman in March. He had created the First 5 Commission by sponsoring Proposition 10, which raised tobacco taxes to pay for early childhood health and education programs.

The audit said the "content of these advertisements and their timing were consistent with applicable legal restrictions related to the use of public funds for political purposes and confirmed that the state commission did not contribute any of its public funds to campaign accounts used to support the various ballot measures."

News accounts and criticism from politicians had raised two questions: Did the commission use public money to promote Reiner's political goals of creating universal preschool and did the commission's outside advertising and public relations firms get involved in the campaigns?

"On those two issues, the state audit confirms what we've said all along: that the First 5 Commission's advertising to promote universal preschool was appropriate and legal," said Reiner's spokesman, Mark Fabiani, adding that the commission never confused its public work with Reiner's political advocacy.

Reiner could not be reached for comment.

The commission answered the auditors by saying it "is deeply committed to making itself a model for state contracting practices, and has already begun to implement new policies and practices and improve staff training."

Among its findings, the audit said the commission:

Did not follow state policy when it used a competitive process to award three contracts valued at more than $47.7 million and failed to provide sufficient justification for awarding one $3 million contract and six amendments totaling $27.6 million using the noncompetitive process.

DOJ_NMG_0089577

Paid $1.2 million more than it should have for administrative overhead because it did not follow state policy that limits such payments.

Paid invoices totaling $673,000 in 2002 and 2003 for fees and expenses of a contractor's employees. These payments violated the contract, "effectively preventing these funds from being used to further other activities that were allowable under the terms of the contract."

Such problems "caused the state commission to make some questionable payments to contractors for items such as laptop computers valued at $10,000, food catering costs and monthly parking fees," the audit said.

Security Firm's Founder Gets Detention For Fraud (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The founder of a D.C. security firm that has become bankrupt was sentenced yesterday to eight months' home detention and five years' probation for illegally diverting hundreds of thousands of dollars from a payroll account.

Jeffrey N. Jackson, 44, a former chief executive of Unlimited Security Inc. and part-time boxing promoter, also was ordered to pay $361,000 in restitution.

He was sentenced in U.S. District Court in the District.

Jackson and his brother founded Unlimited Security in the early 1990s. Within a decade, the company had hundreds of employees and tens of millions of dollars in federal and city security contracts.

But the company went bankrupt in 2002. According to bankruptcy filings, the company's finances were entangled with Jackson's boxing-promotions business.

Earlier this year, Jackson pleaded guilty to one count of bankruptcy fraud, admitting that in 2003, he illegally diverted more than $370,000 from a payroll account.

Charging documents stated that Jackson took the money "for his personal use, primarily for the funding of a private professional boxing promotion business."

The Washington Times first reported on the company's questionable expenses and financial troubles last year.

Yesterday, Jackson, the one-time promoter for former heavyweight boxing champion Riddick Bowe, said that he took the payroll money to help keep the company afloat.

"I wanted to do something to get the company out of bankruptcy," he said.

He said he wasn't prepared for his company's fast rise and fall.

"Success came so quickly that I didn't realize the situation I was in," Jackson said.

In allowing Jackson to remain out of prison, U.S. District Court Judge Ricardo M. Urbina departed significantly from federal sentencing guidelines.

The guidelines had called for Jackson to receive at least two years in prison.

Prosecutors thought Jackson should go to prison.

"This case, although it is a financial case, involves the integrity of the bankruptcy system," Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Butler said.

Defense attorney G. Allen Dale said that Jackson quickly admitted his guilt and has been making restitution.

"The crime was not one to benefit himself personally," Mr. Dale said.

Judge Urbina cited a recommendation from U.S. probation officer Kelly Kraemer-Soares that Jackson should not go to prison.

He also said Jackson's job as an executive at District-based Innovative Security would help him repay his debt faster.

The judge warned Jackson that he would sentence him to the maximum five years in prison if Jackson fails to adhere to guidelines of probation.

Jackson also was sentenced to undergo weekly drug tests and complete 250 hours of community service.

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Hears Appeal Of $79.5M Judgment (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089578

WASHINGTON — An attorney for a smoker's widow urged the Supreme Court on Tuesday to uphold a 1999 jury verdict that imposed a huge penalty on Philip Morris based on the tobacco giant's publicity campaign that played down the dangers of smoking.

Robert Peck told the justices that an Oregon jury that assessed punitive damages in the lung cancer death of Jesse Williams rightly considered how other smokers across the state were affected by Philip Morris' campaign. “This was a massive, market-directed fraud … to deceive customers and knowingly endanger their health,” said Peck, asking the justices to spurn an appeal of a $79.5 million punitive damages award.

Mayola Williams sued the cigarette-maker for fraud and negligence after her husband, Jesse Williams, a Portland school janitor and three-pack-a-day Marlboro smoker, died in 1997. The jury's punitive damages award was 97 times the award it gave for actual damages. (Punitive damages are intended to punish a defendant and deter future wrongdoing.)

The Oregon Supreme Court upheld the verdict, saying the huge punitive damages award was permissible because of Philip Morris' “extraordinarily reprehensible” conduct.

Philip Morris, which makes Marlboros, contends the punitive damages were unconstitutionally excessive because they were so disproportionate to the actual damages and because jurors considered the company's impact on smokers not part of the case.

The dispute gives the justices a chance to clarify guidelines for awarding punitive damages. For decades, the court gave great leeway to state juries. In recent years, however, the court has begun to rein in damage awards. In 2003, the court said punitive damages that are more than 10 times the actual damages could be presumed excessive and in violation of the 14th Amendment's guarantee of due process of law. A question in this case is whether Philip Morris' conduct was so egregious that it justified an award beyond those guidelines.

On Tuesday, however, much of the hour-long session for oral arguments revolved around what Oregon jurors may have weighed as they levied the damages. There appeared to be a chance the justices would return the case to Oregon for more hearings.

Peck said the jury properly looked at how Philip Morris' publicity campaign endangered smokers who were as addicted as Williams, but it did not look at individual harms to other smokers.

Andrew Frey, representing Philip Morris, said jurors should have been specifically warned that they could not try to punish the company for harm to others who might end up bringing lawsuits.

Justice David Souter said it was difficult to know what the jury had in mind. He also said that a jury instruction proposed by Philip Morris at trial was unclear, so it would be difficult to fault the judge for disallowing it. Chief Justice John Roberts observed that juries must follow “a fine line” between considering the “reprehensibility” of a company's misconduct but not punishing it for specific harm to parties outside the case.

Philip Morris Asks Court For Relief (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

The Supreme Court heard a tobacco company's plea for relief from a $79.5 million punitive damages award yesterday, in a case that could illuminate the Roberts court's approach to tort reform.

In recent years, the court has helped the business community on the punitive-damages issue, ruling that excessive awards violate companies' constitutional rights. But yesterday's case may be especially significant because the firm seeking help is tobacco company Philip Morris, and it has been found liable not for bilking a consumer out of money, but for actually killing him.

A ruling in Philip Morris's favor would suggest that the court is so concerned about high punitive damages that it would protect even an unpopular corporate defendant. For their part, consumer and anti-smoking groups hope that the court will rule against Philip Morris -- and show thatpunitive-damage limits do not apply to especially reprehensible conduct.

By the end of oral arguments yesterday, however, it seemed that the court was reluctant to rule broadly in either direction.

Instead, several members of the court, including some who had supported its recent limits on punitive damages, suggested that the best way to handle the case would be to send it back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification of technical state law issues.

"What's worrying me about this case is . . . that we're going to be in a kind of bog of mixtures of constitutional law, unclear Oregon state law, not certain exactly what was meant by whom in the context of the trial, et cetera," said Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who voted in favor of the court's previous decisions limiting punitive damages.

Justices Antonin Scalia and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who dissented from those decisions, made similar points, as did Justice David H. Souter.

DOJ_NMG_0089579

Compensatory damages are usually awarded to compensate for economic losses or pain and suffering. About six states do not have punitive damages. Elsewhere, punitive damages may be added -- subject to statutory limits in some states -- to deter and punish corporate misconduct.

Businesses say that the patchwork of state laws, coupled with the unpredictable behavior of juries, has left them at the mercy of an expensive and arbitrary system. Consumer organizations and trial lawyers say punitive damages are often the only effective means to combat corporations' wrongdoing.

In 1996, the Supreme Court sided with business. It overturned a $4 million punitive-damage award to an Alabama man who had sued a BMW dealer for selling him a repainted car instead of a new one.

For the first time, the court declared that the constitutional right to due process of law meant that companies may not be subject to disproportionate punitive damages.

In 2003, the court broadly defined what qualifies as an excessive award, suggesting that punitive damages should normally be no more than nine times as large as compensatory damages.

Yesterday's case, Philip Morris v. Williams , No. 05-1256, began with a lawsuit in Oregon by Mayola Williams, the widow of Jesse Williams, a lifelong Marlboro smoker who died of lung cancer in 1997.

She alleged that the company had knowingly lied when it minimized the health risks of smoking in public statements beginning in the 1950s and stretching over four decades thereafter. Jesse Williams repeatedly referred to those statements in explaining his refusal to quit smoking.

In 1999, an Oregon jury found Philip Morris liable for fraud. It awarded Mayola Williams $821,000 in compensation and assessed the company $79.5 million in punitive damages, a ratio of punitive to compensatory damages of 97 to 1.

The Oregon Supreme Court has upheld the award, even after the Supreme Court asked it to reconsider in light of its ruling outlining a maximum punitive-compensatory ratio of 9 to 1.

"This was a massive, market-directed fraud driven by their rational and deliberate decisions at the highest levels of the company to deceive customers and knowingly endanger their health," Williams's lawyer, Robert S. Peck, said yesterday. "And so this is the misconduct Oregon is seeking to deter."

Philip Morris alleges that the trial judge violated the Constitution when he refused Philip Morris's request to bar the jury from punishing the company for harm it caused other smokers than Jesse Williams.

The jury instruction Philip Morris had proposed would have told jurors that they could "consider" the impact of the company's conduct on other smokers but not punish it.

Several justices thought the instruction was so unclear that it would not have necessarily helped Philip Morris anyway.

"I don't know how a juror is supposed to figure this out," Souter said.

Members of the court also pointed out that the instruction might have violated an Oregon law allowing jurors to assess punitive damages based on probable harm to others in the state.

High Court Appears Reluctant To Alter Punitive-Damage Law Several Justices Suggest Philip Morris's Appeal Be Returned To Lower Court By JESS BRAVIN (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court seemed reluctant to move the law on punitive damages, with several justices suggesting during oral arguments on the term's most closely watched business case that it could be returned to a lower court for clarification rather than decided here along constitutional principles.

At issue is a $79.5 million punitive damage award to a cigarette smoker's widow who sued Philip Morris USA, a division of Altria Group Inc. A state court jury in Oregon made the award, about 97 times the compensatory damages it also awarded, after the trial judge rejected Philip Morris's request to instruct jurors to ignore "alleged harms suffered by nonparties." Oregon's high court upheld the verdict, finding it comported with U.S. Supreme Court rulings that imposed constitutional limits on punitive awards.

CASE DOCKET

Read the case docket for Philip Morris v. Williams1, courtesy of Findlaw2.

Philip Morris felt otherwise, and the justices agreed to consider two grounds of appeal: whether the jury could award damages for harm to nonparties and, in any case, if a 97-to-1 punitive-to-compensatory damage ratio is automatically excessive.

In the past decade, business has won two major rulings that rolled back blockbuster punitive damage awards, money intended to punish a defendant for its behavior and deter repetition. In each case, the court ruled the awards violated the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause.

The justices in 1996 threw out a $2 million punitive award a consumer won after learning that the seller concealed the fact that his new BMW had been damaged and repainted before sale. A 5-4 court, in an opinion by Justice John Paul Stevens, found the amount "grossly excessive" after considering the actual damages the plaintiff suffered, civil penalties for similar misconduct and the defendant's "degree of reprehensibility."

Then in 2003, in a 6-3 opinion by Justice Anthony Kennedy, the court rejected a 145-to-1 punitive-to-compensatory damage ratio. A Utah court had awarded the damages to a policyholder who contended State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. had misled her into believing it would cover her liability for a car accident. The court suggested that "single digit multipliers are more likely to comport with due process" than larger ones.

The Philip Morris case promised to be the third act in punitive damages, presenting issues absent from the previous two opinions. Only financial losses were at issue there, but the cigarette lawsuit dealt with sickness and death, in what the jury found to be a decades-long fraud to mislead the public about the dangers of smoking. The outcome could affect tobacco companies and other industries whose long-term conduct potentially harmed large numbers of victims.

WSJ.com's Law Blogger Peter Lattman4 talks with Legal Editor Ashby Jones about arguments before the Supreme Court involving the constitutionality of punitive damages in a tobacco case.

Philip Morris's attorney, Andrew Frey, told the justices that the Oregon Supreme Court had rejected the proposed jury instruction because it improperly held it acceptable to award damages for harm to nonparties. Several justices weren't so sure, and Justice Antonin Scalia, who agreed that nonparty harm can't be a factor, nonetheless suggested the Oregon court could have found Philip Morris's instruction improper for other reasons.

"We can say that was error and remand it to them," Justice Scalia said. "That might not make anybody happy," but it would dispose of the case by letting the Oregon court clarify its reasoning.

The justices barely reached the second issue -- whether there was an absolute rule against damages beyond a certain formula. No justice disagreed when Justice Stephen Breyer, who voted with the BMW and State Farm majorities to limit punitive damages, suggested that some conduct could be so reprehensible as to warrant a 100-to-1 punitive damage ratio.

Justices Weigh Limits On Punitive Damages (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 31 — The Supreme Court is accustomed to drawing fine lines. But during arguments on Tuesday on the limits the Constitution places on punitive damages, the proposed line between the permissible and the unconstitutional was so fine that the justices appeared close to giving up.

The result was that a case widely anticipated to produce the most important business ruling of the Roberts court so far looked likely instead to end with a trip back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification.

That court upheld an award of $79.5 million in punitive damages against the cigarette maker Philip Morris in a lawsuit brought by the widow of a man who smoked two packs of Marlboros every day for 45 years. The man, Jesse Williams, died five months after a diagnosis of inoperable lung cancer in 1996.

The jury had awarded his widow, Mayola, compensatory damages of $821,000, meaning that the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages was 97 to 1. That was far greater than the “single digit” ratio the Supreme Court placed at the outer limit of constitutionality three years ago, the last time it decided a punitive damages case.

Philip Morris’s lawyer, Andrew L. Frey, argued that the Oregon courts had allowed the jury to punish the company for the harm to other Oregon smokers who had not filed suit. Mr. Frey said this had allowed a single plaintiff’s case to be turned into “a one-way class action in which Philip Morris was exposed to global punishment by the jury without any of the protections of a class action.”

There was general agreement during the argument, including by Mrs. Williams’s lawyer, Robert S. Peck, that awarding damages on the basis of injury to nonplaintiffs was impermissible under the Supreme Court’s recent precedents.

But there was no agreement on whether that actually happened. Mr. Peck argued that the Oregon courts had simply permitted the jury to consider harm to others, not to impose “global punishment” but as part of its assessment of the “reprehensibility” of the cigarette company’s behavior, a factor that the Supreme Court’s precedents permit juries in punitive damages cases to consider.

The basis for the lawsuit was the claim that Philip Morris’s strategy of denying the connection between smoking and cancer deceived Mr. Williams into believing that he could safely keep smoking.

"This was a massive market-directed fraud driven by their rational and deliberate decisions at the highest levels of the company to deceive customers and knowingly endanger their health," Mr. Peck told the justices. The Oregon Supreme Court, in upholding the award, called Philip Morris's conduct "extraordinarily reprehensible, by any measure of which we are aware."

The United States Supreme Court has been deeply split on the punitive damages question, with three justices, Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, rejecting the idea that the Constitution's guarantee of due process places a limit on what states can permit juries to award.

With the departure of William H. Rehnquist, the former chief justice, and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, both of whom supported due process limits on punitive damages, the known margin of support for the court's precedents fell to 4 to 3, with the views of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. unknown.

The court's decision last May to hear the Philip Morris appeal, Philip Morris USA v. Williams, No. 05-1256, suggested an effort to find a new center of gravity on an issue of considerable interest to the business community.

But the problem that emerged during Tuesday's argument was the justices' evident concern that they lacked a basis for deciding whether, on the one hand, the Oregon courts had improperly allowed jurors to take into account the harm to nonplaintiffs, or on the other hand, had properly allowed consideration of the reprehensibility of the conduct by Philip Morris, a unit of Altria. Finding the Oregon Supreme Court's opinion insufficiently clear on this basic point, the justices would be unable to use the case as a vehicle for taking their consideration of punitive damages to the next level.

"What's worrying me," Justice Stephen G. Breyer said to Mr. Frey, "is that we're going to be in a kind of bog of mixtures of constitutional law, unclear Oregon state law, not certain exactly what was meant by whom in the context of the trial, et cetera."

And Justice David H. Souter, referring to the Oregon Supreme Court, asked Mr. Peck: "Isn't perhaps the better course to send this back to them and say, 'We don't know what you mean?' And let them tell us clearly."

The confusion was evident at the beginning of the argument, when Mr. Frey said the Oregon trial court had improperly refused to use a jury instruction proposed by Philip Morris "which would have told the jury that it was not to punish for harm to nonparties."

The proposed instruction said that "although you may consider the extent of harm suffered by others" in deciding whether the punishment bore a "reasonable relationship" to the injury to Mr. Williams, "you are not to punish the defendant for the impact of its alleged misconduct on other persons, who may bring lawsuits of their own."

The failure to give this instruction was part of the denial of Philip Morris's right to due process, Mr. Frey said.

But several justices said they found the instruction confusing and unlikely to have steered jurors away from an improper basis for awarding damages.

"You don't think that would confuse the jury if they are first told that they may consider the extent of harm suffered by others, and then the next instruction seems to say they can't?" Justice Ginsburg asked Mr. Frey.

"The concept may be abstract," Mr. Frey replied, insisting that there was a "difference between considering and punishing" that a proper jury instruction would have made "quite clear to the jury."

Tobacco Judgment Blocked

WASHINGTON, Oct. 31 (AP) — A federal appeals court blocked a landmark judgment against the tobacco industry on Tuesday, allowing the companies to continue selling "light" and "low tar" cigarettes until their appeals can be reviewed.

The decision by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia also allows the companies to continue for now the advertising campaigns that a federal judge in August ruled were misleading.

Without comment, the appeals court granted the tobacco companies' request to put Judge Gladys Kessler's order on hold. They have argued that her far-reaching ruling could cost them millions of dollars and lead to a loss of customers.

In mid-August, Judge Kessler ruled that the companies had violated racketeering laws and conspired for decades to mislead the public about the health hazards of smoking.

She ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as "low tar," "light," "ultra light" or "mild," because such cigarettes have been found to be no safer than others because of how people smoke them.

Judge Kessler's ruling was appealed by Philip Morris USA, Lorillard Inc., Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation and British American Tobacco.

Justices May Return Punitive Damages Case To Oregon High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 1, 2006

The Supreme Court's long-awaited oral argument in the "Big Tobacco" punitive damages case appeared to fizzle on Tuesday, with several justices hinting that they'd like to kick the case back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification.

DOJ_NMG_0089582

Instead of delving deeply into the contentious debate over the constitutionality of high punitive damages in the context of tobacco litigation, the justices seemed troubled over more technical matters during hourlong arguments in Philip Morris USA v. Williams.

But there were some signs that if the high court decides to keep the case and rule on it, the justices might be willing to uphold the large verdict in the Philip Morris case, in spite of Court precedents that point toward limiting punitive damages.

In the State Farm v. Campbell decision in 2003, the high court suggested that a 9-to-1 ratio between punitive and compensatory damages was the outer limit of acceptability under the Constitution, though it said some cases could warrant higher punitive damages.

But at oral argument Tuesday, there was scant mention of ratios and a greater climate of deference toward state courts and how they handle punitive damages without federal strictures. The result could be the Court tolerating a "tobacco exception" to State Farm that would allow higher damages because of evidence of decades of industry fraud and deception over the dangers of smoking.

But much of the argument Tuesday was taken up with the smaller-gauge issue of jury instructions that were not allowed in the 1999 trial at issue in the case. Portland, Ore., jurors awarded Mayola Williams $821,485 in compensatory and $79.5 million in punitive damages levied against Philip Morris -- a 97-to-1 ratio between punitives and compensatories. Her husband, Jesse, died in 1997 after four decades of smoking Marlboros.

Philip Morris had sought a jury instruction at trial that would keep jurors from imposing punitive damages for harm suffered by nonparties, namely other Oregon smokers besides Williams. The trial judge's denial of that request figured in the tobacco company's appeal of the verdict, but the Oregon Supreme Court said the trial judge's decision was proper under state law.

Justices on Tuesday seemed bothered by the fact that the jury instruction sought by Philip Morris would have told jurors that they could consider the harm to others inflicted by Philip Morris but could not punish the company for that harm. That seemingly confusing instruction led in turn to puzzlement over the Oregon Supreme Court's basis for rejecting it.

"I don't know how a juror is supposed to figure this out," said Justice David Souter, adding later, "Isn't perhaps the better course to send this back to them [the Oregon Supreme Court] and say, 'We don't know what you mean'?" He and other justices appeared reluctant to supersede the Oregon court's reading of Oregon law, but they wanted to be sure exactly what the Oregon Supreme Court was saying about that law.

"We're going to be in a kind of bog of mixtures of constitutional law, unclear Oregon state law, not certain exactly what was meant by whom in the context of the trial," said Justice Stephen Breyer at one point.

Andrew Frey, the Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw partner arguing on behalf of Philip Morris, tried with mixed success to steer the debate back to his main argument that punishing his client for harm to nonparties violates the due process clause of the 14th Amendment. "What you're doing is ... you're allowing a potentially aberrational verdict to pre-empt the work of other juries," Frey said.

Pressed by Justice Antonin Scalia, Frey acknowledged that if a jury found that actions by a defendant risked harming other people, "they could punish this more severely. What they cannot do is punish it globally."

In advance of the arguments, there was suspense over how the Court's new members, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr., would respond to the case, because they do not have much of a track record on the punitive damages issue. But their comments did not tip their hands. Alito seemed concerned about the confusing jury instructions and may be one of the justices considering sending the case back to Oregon.

More significantly, Roberts pointedly asked Robert Peck, the lawyer for Williams, whether he was asking the Court to reconsider State Farm and other precedents. Peck said no, adding that "this judgment is valid under those precedents." He said Oregon had enacted procedural safeguards to guarantee that defendants are not unfairly punished, and he urged the Court to allow the states to "address any concerns with due process" by allowing them to continue to experiment legislatively without strict federal constraints.

For example, under Oregon law, juries in future tobacco cases would be required to consider the high damages in the Williams case in determining the appropriateness of punitive damages against the same defendant for the same conduct.

Damages Assessment (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

When the Supreme Court agreed to hear Philip Morris v. Williams, many wondered if the Justices would merely tinker with their punitive damages jurisprudence. But after yesterday's oral arguments, it looks as though they have bigger fish to fry.

In Philip Morris, the tobacco giant is challenging a $79.5 billion verdict affirmed by the Oregon Supreme Court in February. And the conventional thinking was that the U.S. Supremes would focus on the size of the award, especially given their rulings in BMW v. Gore (1996) and State Farm v. Campbell (2003) that the Constitution limits punitive damage awards.

Instead, yesterday's arguments focused on the procedural and structural limits of punitive damages. The main issue, based on the Justices' questioning, was whether a single plaintiff should collect damages on behalf of other people not involved in the case. The Court still might rule on the damage amount. But it is encouraging for tort reformers that the Court is thinking more broadly about runaway litigation.

Much of the questioning concerned whether the lower courts had allowed extra punishment based on alleged harm to third parties. The plaintiffs argued that the Oregon jury didn't need to be told that it wasn't permitted to punish Philip Morris on behalf of other smokers. But Justices Stephen Breyer and David Souter and Chief Justice John Roberts were skeptical of that view. So was Justice Antonin Scalia, who has voted against due process limits on punitive damages.

The outcome of this case could have ramifications far beyond tobacco. Whether a jury, in a case involving a single plaintiff, can impose extra damages on a defendant for harming other people who haven't brought suit is an issue that arises in product-liability cases of all kinds -- from autos to drugs.

And the Justices yesterday seemed to agree that these pseudo-class actions might present problems of due process. When a plaintiffs lawyer is permitted to argue that damages directed at Merck or Toyota should reflect that their products harmed not only his lone client but (allegedly) everyone in the state, it raises the possibility of duplicative punishment. Even if a defendant prevails, what stops the next plaintiffs lawyer from making the same argument on behalf of another (and another and another) lone client?

This is what class actions are for, or so we thought. Yet plaintiffs attorneys want it both ways. Without having to get a class certified, or divvy up any potential award among class members, the trial bar wants to press for damages on behalf of millions of people they don't even represent.

This may be an even deeper due process violation than outrageous punitive damages because it goes directly to the powers of the jury, and the standards by which it imposes punishment. Some guiding restraint from the Supreme Court on the matter would be helpful.

Sheep's Clothing (WP)

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

TOBACCO GIANT R.J. Reynolds tried to wrap itself in a cloak of corporate responsibility last month when it agreed to stop selling flavored cigarettes with names such as Twista Lime and Mocha Taboo, which a band of state attorneys general said appealed to the underaged. But when Big Tobacco has the chance to support the most effective measures to mitigate the health consequences of smoking, it instead uses tricky tactics and spends millions to defeat them.

Next week voters in Arizona and Ohio will decide between two ballot measures, both of which purport to ban smoking in many public places. In reality, Ohio's Issue 5 would ban smoking in bars and restaurants across the state, and it is supported by the American Cancer Society and other public health advocates. The state's Issue 4, on the other hand, would allow patrons to light up in bowling alleys, most bars and smoking areas in restaurants. Its principal backer is R.J. Reynolds. Big Tobacco's measure would also amend the Ohio state constitution, which means that it would invalidate tougher existing local ordinances and Issue 5, even if the latter passed by a wider margin. The story is about the same in Arizona, with two ballot initiatives, one declawed and backed by R.J. Reynolds.

Evidence -- including a painstaking surgeon general's review published this summer -- shows that tough smoking bans are the only effective way to protect bar and restaurant workers, not to mention nonsmoking patrons. Bartenders' smoking-related ailments disappeared within months of the imposition of strict smoking bans in jurisdictions across the country and overseas. Separate smoking zones, on the other hand, fail to contain secondhand smoke.

R.J. Reynolds and other tobacco firms are also spending tens of millions in Arizona, California and Missouri to kill proposed increases in tobacco excise taxes. Raising the price of cigarettes reduces demand for them, encouraging smokers to quit. Frank J. Chaloupka, a researcher at the University of Illinois at Chicago, estimates that a 10 percent increase in the price of cigarettes would decrease overall cigarette smoking among youth by 13 percent.

Cancer rates in this country continue to decline, in large part because of measures such as smoking bans and cigarette taxes. If tobacco companies wanted to live up to their televised pronouncements, they would not hijack the initiative process in Arizona and Ohio, nor would they pour millions into defeating new tobacco taxes.

Standards Are Essential (USAT)

Punitive damages — damages awarded for reprehensible conduct — are a great deterrent for corporate misbehavior. But like any other punishment, punitive damages cannot be imposed without rational standards and reasonable limits. Unfortunately, too many courts fail to enforce existing standards and limits, resulting too often in arbitrary and grossly excessive awards.

In Philip Morris v. Williams, in which the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday heard oral arguments, Oregon's Supreme Court upheld a $79.5 million punitive damages award that is nearly 100 times the amount of the plaintiff's compensatory damages. In its amicus brief, the National Chamber Litigation Center argued that the state supreme court ignored the Supreme Court's guidance in 2003's State Farm v. Campbell, recommending a single-digit ratio for most punitive damages awards.

An increasing number of courts throughout the country are ignoring the crucial guidance outlined in State Farm. Unless the high court reaffirms and further clarifies the standards governing punitive damages awards, order and rationality in awarding punitive damages never will be realized.

Some argue that the judicial branch is not the proper place for punitive damages reform, but rather that irrational punitive damages awards are solely a problem for state legislatures and even Congress. We disagree. The Constitution prohibits the deprivation of property without “due process of law,” and the essence of “law” is rational and predictable standards. Courts thus have a fundamental obligation to ensure that the trial procedures employed in determining punitive damages include reasonable standards for measuring them. And when the results of the trial process are demonstrably not rational, courts have an equal obligation to impose reasonable standards after the fact and reduce outsized awards to reasonably proportional amounts.

We hope and expect that the U.S. Supreme Court will reaffirm its 2003 State Farm decision so that punitive damages, where reprehensible conduct has been proved, are awarded fairly, and American jobs and the economy are protected.

Appeals Court Blocks Ruling Against 'light' Cigarettes (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — A federal appeals court blocked a landmark judgment against the tobacco industry Tuesday, clearing the way for the companies to continue selling "light" and "low tar" cigarettes until their appeals can be reviewed.

The decision by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit also allows the companies to continue for now the advertising campaigns that a federal judge in August ruled were misleading.

Without comment, the appeals court granted the tobacco companies' request to put Judge Gladys Kessler's order on hold. The companies have argued that her far-reaching ruling could cost them millions of dollars and lead to a loss of customers.

In mid-August, Kessler ruled that the companies had violated racketeering laws and conspired for decades to mislead the public about the health hazards of smoking.

The judge ordered the companies to publish in newspapers and on their Web sites "corrective statements" on the adverse health effects and addictiveness of smoking and nicotine.

She also ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as "low tar," "light," "ultra light" or "mild," since such cigarettes have been found to be no safer than others because of how people smoke them.

William V. Corr, executive director of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, said the appeals court stay was not surprising.

"Judge Kessler's finding was that these companies have lied to the American people for 50 years," Corr said. "We're confident that, if it means going all the way to the Supreme Court, the government's case will be vindicated and the industry will be held accountable."

Tobacco Companies Win Delay Of `Light' Marketing Ban (Update2) (BLOOM)

By William McQuillen

Bloomberg, November 1, 2006

Oct. 31 (Bloomberg) -- Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA and other U.S. cigarette makers won a delay of a court-imposed ban on the marketing of ``light'' cigarettes the industry claimed would cost it hundreds of millions of dollars.

The ruling today by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington postpones enforcement of an order by U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler requiring the companies to stop marketing cigarettes as ``light'' and ``low-tar'' by January, and to make statements about the health effects of smoking in the media and on cigarette packages. Her ruling is delayed while they pursue an appeal.

Following a nine-month trial, Kessler ruled in August that the companies violated the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, or RICO, in a case filed in 1999 by the U.S. Department of Justice. Today, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said the companies had ``satisfied the stringent standards required'' for a stay pending their appeal to the court.

Kessler said in her opinion that the companies `` marketed and sold their lethal product with zeal, with deception, with a single-minded focus on their financial success, and without regard for the human tragedy or social costs."

In the same ruling, the judge also said she lacked the authority to order the companies to pay $14 billion to fund nationwide smoking cessation and anti-smoking education programs sought by the government.

Praise

Praising the appellate court's ruling, Altria's associate general counsel William Ohlemeyer said Kessler's decision ``is contrary to the law and facts presented during trial."

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller declined to comment.

In addition to Philip Morris, the defendants that requested the stay are Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco; Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp.; Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco Co. and British American Tobacco Plc's British American Tobacco (Investments) Ltd.

Shares of New York-based Altria were unchanged at $81.33 at 5:04 p.m. in trading after the close of the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of Winston-Salem, North Carolina-based Reynolds American fell 34 cents to $63.16.

The case is U.S. v. Philip Morris USA, 99-CV-2496, U.S. District Court, District of Columbia (Washington).

Canadian Tied To Merrill Fraud Gets 10-Year Sentence (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Joe Schneider

Bloomberg, November 1, 2006

Oct. 31 (Bloomberg) -- Michael Ritter, a Canadian who admitted helping ex-Merrill Lynch & Co. trader Daniel Gordon hide $43 million stolen from the securities firm, was sentenced to 10 years in prison.

Ritter, 49, former chief counsel to the Alberta Legislature, was also ordered to forfeit $471,000 in a court hearing today in Edmonton, Alberta. He pleaded guilty Oct. 27 to theft and fraud, admitting he took part in money-laundering with Gordon, then stole $10.5 million from the Merrill trader.

``The fact Mr. Ritter was stealing money from a thief may be ironic, but it's not mitigating," Provincial Court Judge Elizabeth Johnson said in handing down the sentence.

Ritter was sentenced to three years for the crimes involving Merrill, the world's third-biggest securities firm, and seven years for an unrelated investment fraud. The sentence will keep Ritter from having to face charges in the U.S. connected to the second scheme.

``I take full and complete responsibility for my actions," Ritter told Johnson, reading a statement for five minutes. ``I am deeply and sincerely sorry."

Ritter, former chief executive officer of Newport Pacific Financial Group, admitted using the company to hide Gordon's embezzled funds in offshore accounts. He used money left in the accounts by Gordon to buy a condominium, an airplane and a box at the National Hockey League's Edmonton Oilers hockey arena, he said.

Gordon Guilty Plea

Gordon pleaded guilty. He was sentenced Oct. 14 to 3 1/2 years in prison, fined $100,000 and ordered to return the money he stole.

Ritter said he set up an offshore trust for Gordon and sent the money to a Swiss bank account, according to a statement given the court last week approved by Ritter and prosecutors. The ex- CEO said he didn't know the money was embezzled.

Gordon transferred all but $10.5 million from the account back to the U.S., without Ritter's knowledge and in violation of a bank requirement that at least $15 million be left in the account, the statement said. Ritter closed the account and kept the remaining money.

Ritter was indicted by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles for his role in aiding Larry Toshio Osaki in a Ponzi scheme in which early investors received returns above market rates from money deposited by later investors. U.S. prosecutors said Osaki collected $250 million from almost 7,000 investors and caused them to lose $150 million.

No Extradition

In exchange for his guilty plea today, Ritter won't be extradited to the U.S. Osaki pleaded guilty March 24, 2005, to conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering charges. He was sentenced last December to 20 years in prison and ordered to pay $145 million in restitution.

Osaki was the ringleader, and Ritter deserved a lesser sentence, Thom Mrozek, spokesman at the U.S. Attorney's office in Los Angeles said in a telephone interview.

``It was a fair resolution to this matter," Mrozek said.

DOJ_NMG_0089586

Provincial prosecutor Gregg Lepp said after the sentencing the Ritter case is ``just the tip of the iceberg'' of international fraud. He said Alberta prosecutors and police are investigating other frauds of more than $10 million. He declined to be more specific.

``Earlier in my career we saw very few cases having international connections,'' Lepp told reporters. ``Now it's the exceptional case of six-figure, seven-figure frauds that doesn't have an international connection.''

Jailed Since August

Ritter has been jailed since an Aug. 2 conviction for failing to comply with a court order. He was charged after he failed to turn in a Belize passport and sought a replacement from authorities in the Central American country using a fake name.

The 10-year sentence is in addition to the 11 months Ritter has already served. Usually, in Canada, prisoners get double credit for time served while awaiting trial. U.S. authorities urged that Ritter be denied the usual credit for time served, Mrozek said.

The case is Between Her Majesty the Queen and Michael Ritter, 051047785P1, Court of Queen's Bench (Edmonton).

OAKLAND Man Gets 4-year Term For $1.5 Million Scam (SFC)

By Patrick Hoge

San Francisco Chronicle, November 1, 2006

A Walnut Creek man has been sentenced to four years in federal prison for swindling investors out of $1.5 million by falsely claiming that Bill Gates and other magnates were buying shares in his company, prosecutors said Monday.

Lal Bhatia, 39, was convicted in February of 27 charges of mail fraud and money laundering. Prosecutors said Bhatia, as chief executive of ABE Technologies Inc., had lured investors by telling them Gates, Michael Dell of Dell Inc. and Sabeer Bhatia, the founder of Hotmail, had agreed to invest in the company.

Sabeer Bhatia, who is no relation to the defendant, testified at the trial that he had never met Lal Bhatia or done business with him.

Prosecutors said Lal Bhatia had shown forged documents to investors to support his claim that a Swiss banking entity, which didn't exist, was backing him.

He was sentenced to prison Oct. 23 by U.S. District Judge Claudia Wilken, who also imposed a $100,000 fine and ordered him to pay $894,531 in restitution to his victims.

Man Gets 4 Years For Fraud (CCT)

By George Avalos

The Contra Costa Times, November 1, 2006

Lal Bhatia, a Walnut Creek man, has received a four-year sentence for a case in which he posed as an executive with ties to Bill Gates and other tech luminaries.

He also is awaiting a separate trial on different fraud charges.

Bhatia, 39, was convicted of swindling investors out of $1.5 million, government authorities said. Federal investigators said Monday that Bhatia was sentenced on Oct. 23, following his conviction in February.

As part of the scam, Bhatia posed as the chief executive of ABE Technologies Inc., a bogus company that Bhatia claimed had received financial backing from some of the biggest names in technology.

Bill Gates, the founder of Microsoft Corp., and Michael Dell, founder of Dell Inc., were among the digital leaders whom Bhatia said had invested in, or had bought shares in, ABE Technologies.

Bhatia also said one of his investors was the coincidentally named Sabeer Bhatia, the co-founder of Hotmail. The Hotmail executive testified at the trial.

"This was brazen," said Dana Wagner, an assistant U.S. attorney who co-prosecuted the case.

Bhatia filed a notice of appeal Monday for the conviction and sentencing, said Sunita Kapoor, Bhatia's Danville-based attorney.

"Mr. Bhatia intends to vindicate himself," Kapoor said. "This is a family feud." Kapoor said the real fault in the case lies with the relatives. The relatives, Kapoor and Bhatia's father claim in a civil lawsuit, misappropriated funds from Bhatia's grandfather through an ancient system of financial dealing called hawala.

Investigators pointed out the conviction and sentencing show that the jury and judge believe Lal Bhatia was at fault. By taking advantage of the peak of the Internet frenzy in 1999 and 2000, Bhatia bilked his own relatives, prosecutors said.

"There was a fever at that time, with people excited about getting into the tech industry, the dot-coms, companies going public," Wagner said. "The victims in this case were members of his family."

Bhatia's uncle, two aunts, and another relative were the victims, said Joe Camillucci, a special agent for the Internal Revenue Service.

Bhatia told his relatives that ABE Technologies was one of the hottest of the dot-com companies. He spun a yarn about its impressive technologies and backers.

"He told them it was an Internet 2, a company that would completely revolutionize the Internet," Camillucci said.

ABE Technologies, Bhatia told his relatives, had developed a secret product or service for which the biggest companies in the tech world hungered. Those grandiose claims preyed on the desire that many people had to harvest a bumper crop of profits from the Net.

"This was seen as a high-tech opportunity, a very exciting company, a chance to get in on the ground floor and make millions of dollars out of it," Wagner said.

For further authenticity, Bhatia fashioned a brochure about his company from bits and pieces of public statements made by American companies. The balance sheet came from Intel, the income statement from Coca Cola, a shareholders message from a book, Camillucci said.

Bhatia also capitalized on the pride that many Indians have about Sabeer Bhatia, who has achieved iconic status in South Asia as being India's first celebrity entrepreneur, as the Financial Times described it in March.

Yet the Sabeer connection helped trip up Lal Bhatia. One of the aunts noticed that the name of Sabeer's new venture was misspelled in a Lal Bhatia brochure. What's more, the relatives became suspicious when they were never repaid for their investments.

The FBI and the IRS teamed up to track Bhatia's complex schemes, said Joseph Schadler, a spokesman for the FBI's Bay Area operations.

"The money trail is so convoluted that it really behooves us to have the financial expertise of the IRS on board," Schadler said.

In a separate case, Bhatia awaits trial over accusations that he and other suspects posed as wealthy financiers and a British noble as part of an alleged scam in which victims lost $1.9 million.

The suspects convinced developers in Florida and Texas that they could arrange large loans for their projects in return for up-front fees to process the bogus loans, FBI investigators said. Bhatia allegedly had his victims meet a nobleman who said he had rescued Queen Elizabeth II from financial ruin.

"Lal talked the talk and he seemed to know the industry," Wagner said. "He drove the right cars and said the right things. He impressed people."

Tech CEO Gets 4-year Prison Term In Investment Scam (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, November 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A technology entrepreneur convicted of bilking investors out of $1.5 million with false claims that Bill Gates and Michael Dell also invested in his company was sentenced to four years in federal prison, authorities said Monday.

Lal Bhatia, 39, of Walnut Creek, also was ordered at his Oct. 23 sentencing to pay nearly $1 million in fines and restitution for the scheme at ABE Technologies Inc., according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California.

Bhatia, who was the company's chief executive, was convicted in February on 27 counts of mail fraud and money laundering stemming from a series of bogus claims to drum up support for his startup business.

Bhatia lured investors by claiming that tech luminaries Gates and Dell invested in the company, prosecutors said.

He also touted the support of Sabeer Bhatia, a co-founder of the Hotmail e-mail service, who later testified that he had never met nor done business with the defendant. The two Bhatias are not related.

Lal Bhatia also duped investors by providing forged documents touting the backing of a fictitious multibillion dollar Swiss banking entity, prosecutors said.

Bhatia, who is free on bail, is appealing the conviction and the sentence, said Sunita Kapoor, one of his lawyers.

Kapoor declined to discuss specifics of the case. But she said the case boiled down to a family feud between Bhatia's relatives who invested in the company and demanded their money back after it folded during the dot-com collapse.

She said the business was a "viable entity" that sought to incubate other companies to serve as Internet service providers.

Longview Woman Sentenced For Posing As Katrina Victim (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089588

A 29-year-old woman who posed as a Hurricane Katrina evacuee to collect $2,000 in federal aid received three years probation Tuesday.

Tomisha Embry, of Longview, must also pay back the money as restitution after being sentenced by U.S. District Judge Leonard Davis.

Embry claimed she had a New Orleans home damaged by Katrina and submitted an application to the Federal Emergency Management Agency for disaster assistance.

Last month, Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez said the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force has produced charges against more than 400 people in more than 30 federal judicial districts around the nation.

PUBLIC SAFETY | Women Guilty In Health-care Plan Fraud (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, November 1, 2006

Two women pleaded guilty in federal court Monday for their roles in a scheme to defraud an employee health-care plan. Sandra Rivers, 34, of Kansas City, and Delorise Jean Killiebrew, 49, of Independence, had been indicted in July with 11 others.

Killiebrew acknowledged that Cheri Smith, an employee of Health Midwest Comprehensive Care's claim department, persuaded her to cash nine checks totaling more than $33,000. She said she kept half and gave the rest to Smith. A total of $121,284 was fraudulently paid out between January and August 2002, according to the charges. Prosecutors alleged that Smith, 37, of Independence, organized the scheme. She pleaded guilty Oct. 10.

KANSAS CITY | Residents flee apartment fire

A fire that started on a couch forced the evacuation of a Kansas City high-rise apartment building Monday afternoon.

The blaze largely was contained to one room in a fifth-floor apartment at the Brush Creek Tower in the 1800 block of Cleaver II Boulevard, a fire department spokesman said.

The fire destroyed the couch, blistered the walls and blackened the ceiling. No one was injured.

Go to KansasCity.com for video of the fire.

KANSAS CITY | Probation given in marriage fraud case

A marriage fraud scheme netted a Kansas City woman a sentence of three years of federal probation Monday.

Joyce Porter, 44, pleaded guilty in August to concealing and failing to report the fraud.

Porter admitted she falsely told authorities that she lived with co-defendant Mohamed Elouerrassi, 54, a citizen of Morocco.

Elouerrassi also has pleaded guilty to falsifying statements on immigration applications. He was accorded status as a permanent resident of the United States in January 2000, based on his marriage to Porter, who is a U.S. citizen.

He has not yet been sentenced.

KANSAS CITY, Kan. | BPU employee burned in accident

The Kansas City, Kan., Board of Public Utilities was investigating the cause of a flash burn Friday that injured a longtime employee.

Spokeswoman Susan Allen said the employee, a lead electrician and a 33-year BPU veteran, was working on a breaker at the utility's Quindaro Power Plant when an electrical failure occurred.

Allen said the burns, though serious, were not life-threatening. The employee was in the intensive care unit at an area hospital.

KANSAS CITY, Kan.| Fire displaces 3 children, 2 adults

An electrical fire in a lower-level laundry room about 10:35 a.m. Monday caused damage of about $25,000 to a house in the 1200 Block of North 62nd Place.

The fire was confined to that room, but there was smoke damage to the entire house.

The fire displaced the home's residents because of the damage.

KANSAS CITY, Kan. | Park ranger threatened during robbery

A man called a "person of interest" in a quadruple murder earlier this month was one of three suspects arrested in connection with an armed robbery Monday morning at Seventh Street and Lowell Avenue.

A Wyandotte County park ranger interrupted the robbery, and at least one of the suspects pointed a gun at the ranger.

One suspect was arrested at the scene. The other two were arrested in the 3000 block of Indiana Avenue in Kansas City.

KANSAS CITY, Kan. | Victim remains in serious condition

A man in his 50s remained in serious condition Monday at an area hospital after being shot Sunday evening.

Police responded to a report of a shooting about 7:30 p.m. in the 300 block of South Eleventh Street.

Police had a person in custody who might have been involved in the incident.

Two Area Women Plead Guilty To Fraud (KCBIZ)

Kansas City Business Journal, November 1, 2006

Two women from Independence and Kansas City pleaded guilty in federal court to participating in a conspiracy to defraud Health Midwest's employee health care plan administrator of more than $120,000.

In a release Monday, Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, said that Delorise Jean Killiebrew, 49, of Independence, and Sandra Rivers, 34, of Kansas City, pleaded guilty in separate appearances before U.S. District Judge Howard Sachs to the charge contained in a July 18 federal indictment.

By pleading guilty, Killiebrew and Rivers admitted that they had participated in a health fraud conspiracy by cashing benefits checks from Health Midwest and Health Midwest Comprehensive Care that they knew they weren't entitled to receive, Schlozman said.

Prosecutors say Cheri Smith, 37, of Independence, devised the scheme to defraud a health care benefit program from Jan. 17 to Aug. 29, 2002.

Smith worked for Health Midwest Comprehensive Care (HMCC), a third-party administrator for the employee health care plan maintained by Health Midwest. Smith was a senior team leader in HMCC's claims department and was responsible for data entry of all pharmacy claims. She also was authorized to enter pharmacy claims data, change or modify account information and pay pharmacy claims.

Smith accessed the computer database containing the names of employees covered by the pharmacy benefits program and changed valid member names to those of her family members, friends and others who were neither Health Midwest employees nor entitled to receive benefits. Smith then entered false pharmacy claims for those bogus employees and caused checks to be issued to them. After cashing the checks, those in whose names the checks were fraudulently issued typically gave some of the proceeds back to Smith.

Killiebrew admitted that she had received nine checks for a total of $33,249 from the Pharmaceutical Insurance Reimbursement Account at Health Midwest and Health Midwest Comprehensive Care. She kept part of the proceeds of the checks and gave some to Smith.

Rivers admitted that she had learned about the health care fraud conspiracy from Killiebrew, a co-worker, and had agreed to accept checks in the summer of 2002. Rivers received two checks for a total of $5,516. After cashing each of the checks, Rivers kept $300 and gave the rest of the money to Killiebrew.

Killiebrew and Rivers are among six co-defendants who have pleaded guilty to their role in the health care fraud conspiracy.

Smith pleaded guilty to health care fraud on Oct. 10. Smith admitted that she made at least 36 fraudulent entries in the computer system responsible for paying pharmacy claims for Health Midwest employees.

Federal statutes stipulate that Smith could be subject to a sentence of as much as 10 years in federal prison without parole, plus a fine of as much as $250,000. Each of the other co-defendants could be subject to a sentence of as much as five years in federal prison without parole, plus a fine of as much as $250,000.

Sentencing hearings will be scheduled after the completion of presentence investigations by the U.S. Probation Office.

Executive Assistant U.S. Attorney Roseann Ketchmark is prosecuting the case, which the FBI investigated.

3rd Circuit Revives Case Against Asbestos Class Action Lawyers (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, November 1, 2006

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has revived a proposed class action suit against a group of lawyers from southern states brought by more than 2,600 former clients from northern states who say they were cheated out of their fair share of $400 million in asbestos personal injury settlements in the Mississippi state courts when the lawyers gave larger payouts to southern plaintiffs.

Reversing a lower court's decision that dismissed the suit, Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Jane R. Roth issued a stern lecture to lawyers about the duty of loyalty.

"We are embarrassed to have to explain a matter so elementary to the legal profession that it speaks for itself: All attorneys in a co-counsel relationship individually owe each and every client the duty of loyalty. For it to be otherwise is inconceivable," Roth wrote in Huber v. Taylor.

The case provides a rare glimpse into the high-stakes world of asbestos litigation in which plaintiffs are termed "inventory" and settlements often involve hundreds or even thousands of cases.

DOJ_NMG_0089590

The plaintiffs in Huber v. Taylor are steelworkers from Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana who joined a massive Mississippi asbestos suit. The defendants are lawyers from Mississippi, North Carolina and Texas.

The suit, filed by attorneys Esther S. Trakinski and Irving Cohen of Cohen Pope in New York, alleges that the northern plaintiffs were never made aware of a complex series of agreements between and among the lawyers that, they say, ultimately led to their receiving smaller payouts than southern plaintiffs.

The northern plaintiffs had all retained lawyers in their home states -- referred to in the case as "local counsel" -- who had in turn struck deals with a Texas lawyer who served as co-counsel.

But when the lawyers struck a series of settlements worth more than $400 million, the northern plaintiffs claim that their share was reduced because the southern lawyers wanted to allocate a greater percentage of aggregate settlements to southerners in order to minimize the percentages paid to the northern plaintiffs' local counsel.

The suit alleges that, by cheating the northern plaintiffs of their fair share, the southern lawyers saved more than $10 million that would have been paid to their local counsel.

The stakes are even higher than that because the northern plaintiffs are seeking "disgorgement" of all the fees earned by the southern lawyers -- 40 percent of $400 million, or $160 million.

In the first round of the litigation, the plaintiffs suffered two major setbacks when U.S. District Judge Arthur Schwab of the Western District of Pennsylvania refused to certify the suit as a class action and later dismissed the entire case.

Finding no conflict among the laws of Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Schwab held that the plaintiffs could not prove their breach of fiduciary duty claims because they had no proof of "causation" or "actual injury."

Now the 3rd Circuit has ruled that Schwab erred by failing to apply Texas law that includes no such requirement.

But a dissenting judge said he would have upheld Schwab's dismissal of the suit on the grounds that the plaintiffs had waived their right to complain about the choice-of-law issue.

"In my view, plaintiffs' failure to brief and argue the choice of law issue before the district court and in their opening brief on appeal constitutes waiver of that issue," U.S. Circuit Judge Julio M. Fuentes wrote.

Roth disagreed, saying the plaintiffs had never waived the choice-of-law issue.

"The issue of which state's law to apply is inherent in the parties' positions throughout this case. Defendants claim that the law in all the relevant jurisdictions requires a showing of actual harm for breach of fiduciary duties, while plaintiffs assert that it does not when the remedy sought is disgorgement, citing to Texas law," Roth wrote.

Roth also found that, even if the plaintiffs had technically waived the issue, the exceptions to the waiver doctrine would apply because "plaintiffs' repeated and insistent citation to Texas law as providing the governing standard alerted this court to the choice-of-law issue."

A lengthy section of Roth's majority opinion is devoted to describing the complex relationships and fee agreements at the heart of the case.

Before that, Roth outlined the circumstances that made Mississippi an attractive venue for asbestos plaintiffs in the mid-1990s.

In 1995, a case captioned Cosey v. E.D. Bullard Co. was filed in Jefferson County, Miss., and over the next few years it grew to include several thousand plaintiffs due, Roth said, to Mississippi's "reputation as a plaintiff-friendly jurisdiction" and the state's "liberal joinder rules."

In 1998, a jury awarded $48.5 million to 12 of the Cosey plaintiffs with malignant asbestos-related diseases. The sole attorneys of record for all the Cosey plaintiffs were Mississippi lawyers Robert A. Pritchard and Christopher Fitzgerald.

Roth said the big verdict "prompted many companies with potential asbestos liability to explore settlements."

In May 1999, before any settlements were reached, Pritchard brought a second asbestos personal injury mass action in Mississippi state court in which the Huber plaintiffs were joined.

The northern plaintiffs joined the Mississippi suit through a co-counsel agreement their northern lawyers had struck with Texas attorney Robert G. Taylor II who had become involved in the Cosey case.

As Roth described it, Taylor's fee arrangements with the northern lawyers is key to understanding the claims.

According to the opinion, Taylor had contracted with the local counsel to serve as co-counsel for any future asbestos plaintiffs in exchange for Taylor's receiving about 95 percent of their fees if suit were brought outside of local counsel's home state, and a smaller amount if suit were brought in the home state.

Roth found that the arrangement meant that local counsel would find the work profitable only as "volume, rote work" since their percentage was so low, but that even such a small percentage was ultimately "a sizeable amount given the hundreds of millions of dollars of recoveries."

DOJ_NMG_0089591

Taylor also entered into "upstream co-counsel agreements" with Fitzgerald and Pritchard, who in turn entered into an upstream co-counsel agreement with Joseph B. Cox Jr. of North Carolina, to negotiate settlements, for which Cox would receive 4 percent of all gross settlements.

The Huber plaintiffs claim in the suit that they were never informed of the various co-counsel arrangements.

Taylor, Pritchard and Cox are the lead defendants named in the suit.

But lawyers defending the southern lawyers argued that none of the northern plaintiffs was cheated in any way.

The size of the settlement payouts, they said, was calculated on the basis of numerous factors including the level of injury and the home state of the claimants.

Although the northern plaintiffs were paid less than their co-plaintiffs from Mississippi and Texas, the defense also noted that the northerners nonetheless received larger settlements than similar asbestos plaintiffs from Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana usually receive in their home state courts.

The plaintiffs insist that their payouts were reduced to avoid paying fees to their local counsel.

But defense lawyers insisted that the settlements were not aggregate settlements that they then allocated as they saw fit. Instead, they said, the plaintiffs in the settled cases were presented with offers that varied for different individuals based on factors such as the type of injury or asbestos exposure, lifestyle habits like smoking, and geographic origin.

Geographic origin was an appropriate factor in determining settlement value, the defense lawyers said, because jury verdicts in northern states are traditionally lower than in southern states and because, in southern courts, jury verdicts for northerners are typically lower than for southerners in their home state.

But Roth found there was evidence that the settlements were, in fact, aggregate, and that the plaintiffs may have a valid claim under Texas law for breach of fiduciary duty that could entitle them to a disgorgement of the southern lawyers' fees.

At the heart of the claim, Roth found, is the duty of loyalty every lawyer has to every client.

That duty exists, Roth said, "even when clients are viewed as mere 'inventory.'"

"This is the cost of doing business as an attorney at law, and we will not countenance shortcuts," Roth wrote.

"Disclosures to clients must be meaningful, by which we mean something beyond form disclosures, as clients must understand a conflict to give their informed consent to an intelligible waiver. ... There is no question that defendant attorneys owed plaintiffs fiduciary duties," Roth wrote.

Taylor's lawyer, Howard M. Klein of Conrad O'Brien Gellman & Rohn, said he was "very disappointed" by the ruling and is studying the opinion with an eye toward seeking re-argument before the full 3rd Circuit.

Klein also said that Taylor and the other defendants "acted in compliance with their ethical and legal obligations."

Group Asks FTC To Probe Web Ads (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins

USA Today, November 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — A non-profit consumer advocacy group plans to ask federal regulators today to rein in the fast-growing $100 billion online marketing industry.

The Center for Digital Democracy is expected to file a Federal Trade Commission complaint asking the agency to investigate online advertisers. It also wants the FTC to force companies to halt what it calls deceptive practices and encourage Congress to pass legislation bolstering consumer privacy protection.

Executive Director Jeff Chester says hundreds of companies now track consumers online, gathering detailed dossiers about reading, spending and other habits that endanger personal privacy. Privacy policies published on websites don't adequately warn consumers, he says.

“The FTC has largely ignored the critical developments of the electronic marketplace that has placed the privacy of every American at risk,” a draft version of the complaint says. The complaint comes amid rising privacy concerns as billions of dollars in commerce shifts to the Internet and mobile devices, creating new global players such as search giant Google. And it comes a week before the FTC holds a three-day e-commerce conference that's “insufficient” to shield consumers, the center says.

The FTC declined to comment.

The center, based in Washington, gets financial support from philanthropies including the Ford Foundation and the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation, Chester says. It's joined in its FTC filing by the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, another non-profit consumer advocate.

While the complaint says questionable online marketing practices are widespread, it wants the FTC to first examine Microsoft's adCenter service. Launched last year, it lets advertisers bid to have advertisements published next to online search results, similar to Google's better-known AdSense program.

Chester says adCenter endangers privacy because it relies on data gathered from the No. 1 software maker's widely used Hotmail e-mail service and other Microsoft products. “They have fully opened up the entire suite of Microsoft's very extensive properties to marketers,” Chester says.

Microsoft disputed the center's allegations, saying it protects consumer privacy and is “very open” about its privacy policies.

Chester has been involved in high-profile privacy issues for some time. He co-founded the Center for Media Education, which filed an FTC complaint 10 years ago that helped spur passage of the Children's Online Privacy Protection Act of 1998, Chester says.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Many Eyes Will Watch The Polls (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Thousands of lawyers, election monitors and volunteers with video cameras will be mobilized on Election Day in an effort to guard against problems at the polls.

The Justice Department will dispatch more than 800 observers, a record for a non-presidential election year, to look for evidence of discrimination, intimidation and other obstacles to voter accessibility in at least 20 states.

The Democratic Party has a 50-state voter-protection effort and an estimated 7,000 lawyers at the ready. Liberal groups have set up hotlines for voters to call if they are denied the right to vote. And hundreds of people plan to film interviews at polling places where voters are being challenged that day.

Fueling the activity this year: dozens of close elections that could decide control of Congress and the potential for problems caused by electronic voting machines, statewide databases and identification requirements.

"There are going to be problems in every state," says Jon Greenbaum, director of the Voting Rights Project for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights. The group is part of a coalition that has a toll-free hotline and lawyers poised in 23 states.

Republican and conservative interest groups are keeping a lower profile. The Republican National Committee is relying on its state parties for poll monitors and lawyers. Groups such as the Republican National Lawyers Association lack the manpower to match the NAACP, Common Cause and People for the American Way.

"Folks can game the system, and that's a concern," says Thor Hearne, general counsel for the American Center for Voting Rights, a conservative group. He calls candidates and local parties "the first line of defense."

Justice Department monitors will be deployed next week, partly based on close races for Congress and where questions have been raised about the integrity of the election process. That could include Baltimore, Chicago, Cleveland and other places that encountered problems during primaries this year.

Prosecutors will be on standby in each federal district across the country to pursue possible fraud cases or other election-related criminal activity. "Everyone agrees that we want to make voting easier and fraud harder," says Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim.

The effort by some liberal groups begins today with a series of public-service announcements by actors such as Ben Affleck and Jodie Foster.

·A consortium led by Common Cause plans to track voters' problems on a database and publicize them. In 2004, it received 55,000 complaints.

·The NAACP has hundreds of lawyers ready. "We're focusing more on how to redress problems when they occur," says the group's Dennis Hayes.

·Filmmaker Ian Inaba's volunteers hope to get aggrieved voters on the Internet via YouTube "while the polls are still open and the races are still alive."

Federal Observers And Monitors Heading To Polls (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Justice Department plans to dispatch more than 800 federal observers and monitors to 20 states to protect voting rights in potentially troubled polling locations, officials announced Tuesday.

That is a record number of federal officials watching polling stations in an off-year election.

"Yes, the anticipated closeness of races is one factor in our decisions about where we'll be sending people," said Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Wan Kim.

DOJ_NMG_0089593

Kim said he would not identify until Monday the more than 65 cities and counties to which the observers will be sent.

The locations where federal observers will be stationed are selected because of past polling problems, an uneasy history among ethnically or racially diverse groups, or where fears and allegations of potential violations are asserted.

The Justice Department is reluctant to make public plans for elections observers. One official said that is because observers are viewed, in part, as frontline collectors of data that could be used to construct cases against local jurisdictions.

An influential non-governmental group, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, has asked the Justice Department to send monitors to seven locations in Alabama where black candidates are challenging white candidates. The organization also asked for monitors in Alaska where, it said, "the Native Alaskan community faces multiple barriers to voting access."

The group also called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to watch for problems at locations in Arizona, Louisiana, Montana, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Dakota and Virginia.

The group's concern in Virginia is centered on Chesterfield County, where in 2004 armed guards were placed at polls to "ward off terrorists." Would-be voters were incorrectly told while in line that they needed an identification card to vote.Focus on racial, ethnic hotspots

State voter-identification requirements are before courts in several states, where varying requirements are alleged by some groups to be unconstitutionally restrictive.

Justice officials say the election observers will focus on historic racial and ethnic hotspots, and also will watch for balloting access issues and assistance for non-English speakers and the disabled.

In addition, U.S. attorneys, the FBI and criminal fraud prosecutors from will be on standby in the event evidence of ballot stuffing or other voting fraud is found.

"The Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section has assigned attorneys to assist with potential election crimes," a Justice Department statement said.

Those officials will be on duty to field complaints from the time the polls open in the East until they close in the West, the department said. The criminal investigators and prosecutors will not be at the polling stations. Any investigations will take place after the elections.

Despite warnings by some computer scientists and interest groups of problems with voting machines, Justice Department officials charged with enforcing the Help America Vote Act of 2002 insisted Tuesday they do not anticipate widespread problems.

"Clearly, some states are moving along better than others," Kim said. "Those who waited too long to implement requirements are a bit behind the eight ball."

This year the Justice Department brought cases against New York, Maine, Alabama and New Jersey for violations, all of which have been resolved, Kim said.Sensitive mission

The hundreds of experienced monitors from the Justice Department and observers from the Office of Personnel Management heading to the polls are trained for a sensitive mission: wading into sometimes tense and strongly partisan surroundings under intense scrutiny.

More than 1,000 federal personnel were sent to monitor elections in 2004. Greater numbers are the norm in presidential election years, when voter turnout is higher, officials said.

The Justice Department officials acknowledge walking a tightrope. They want to make clear they will vigorously enforce federal voting laws but are equally determined not to intrude in a process run almost entirely by state officials.

The observers must represent an eagle-eye corps dedicated to protecting voters' rights while remaining virtually invisible and avoiding actions that could be viewed as heavy-handed or intimidating.

Civil rights authorities say the monitors quietly identify themselves to polling officials, which serves both to provide notice of a source of assistance should problems arise, as well as a not-so-subtle deterrent against raising obstacles to categories of minority voters protected by federal statutes.

"We want to send a strong message that we want fair elections," Gonzales told reporters Tuesday. "While our role is relatively small, it is an important role, and we intend to play it."

He said his department over the past year prosecuted more voting-rights cases than in any prior year.

During the past four years, the Justice Department charged 120 people with election fraud offenses, 86 of whom have been convicted of voter fraud.

Another approximately 200 investigations are open.

The nature of the cases has changed since the tumult of the early 1960s produced the Voting Rights Act of 1965. At the time, the vast majority of cases concerned the provision of ballot access to black voters in Southern states.

Since then, overt discrimination against minority voters has declined. However, more subtle forms of bias at the polls remains a concern in certain locations.

In one ongoing case in Mississippi, black elections officials have been sued for violating the voting rights of white voters.

DOJ_NMG_0089594

In recent years, attention has shifted to providing unfettered ballot access and voting assistance to tribal and ethnic groups who are entitled to federal protections. Native Americans, Hispanics and Vietnamese voting groups have received the most federal help on Election Day because of incidents of alleged discrimination.

NAACP Plans To Monitor St. Landry Vote (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess, Advocate Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, November 1, 2006

OPELOUSAS — The NAACP plans to organize poll watchers in St. Landry Parish to monitor what's expected to be a tight race between a black woman interim sheriff and her white male challenger.

Interim Sheriff Laura Balthazar faces former State Police official Bobby Guidroz on Nov. 7 in a race to fill the seat of former Sheriff

Howard Zerangue Sr., who died in April while serving his seventh consecutive term of office.

Concerns of possible racial intimidation in the sheriff's election have also attracted the attention of the U.S. Justice Department, which monitored the parish's primary election on Sept. 30 and is expected to return next week.

The NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, working with local civil rights groups, hopes to assemble a team of 24 poll watchers to oversee the elections, said Kristen Clarke-Avery, assistant counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund.

Clarke-Avery said the group had 12 monitors for last month's elections.

"All of us are out there to see to it that everybody can exercise their constitutional right to vote," said Clifton Lemelle Sr., a retired educator from Eunice who is helping organize the poll watchers.

Lemelle said there were no confirmed reports of racial intimidation from the Sept. 30 election.

Federal monitors also reported no apparent violations.

Clarke-Avery said questions did arise over whether some residents were improperly denied the right to vote because they had no photo identification.

Louisiana law allows a registered voter to cast a ballot without photo identification if the voter fills out an affidavit attesting to his identify.

"We received some reports of those affidavits not being offered," Clarke-Avery said.

Lemelle said there were also reports of candidates remaining too close to polling precincts.

State law prohibits campaigning within 600 feet of a polling place, and Lemelle said the mere presence of a candidate may also work to unduly sway some voters.

No Penalty For Voting Systems Lapse (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

The Justice Department isn't penalizing states that fail to upgrade voting systems by next week's elections, a requirement passed by Congress in 2002.

Federal efforts to combat election fraud and prevent voter intimidation on Nov. 7 are among the most rigorous ever, Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said Tuesday. He estimated 800 federal observers and monitors are headed next week to oversee elections in 20 states - selected in part because of close races there.

But prosecutors have not penalized states, or tried to hold them in contempt, if they failed to comply with the 2002 Help America Vote Act, Kim said. The law required states to plan for switching to electronic ballot machines and have a voter registration database up and working in time for the 2006 elections.

If states "miss a deadline, or if they don't do something by a certain time, then obviously we would first go back to the table and try to figure out why, and how we can fix the problem," Kim told reporters.

If a state still falls short, the Justice Department could go to court and seek a contempt order, which could carry penalties, Kim said. "But that's something we don't like to do. It means a problem's broken and we can't fix it easily."

Justice Department officials said it is unclear how many states have not fully updated their voting systems. The department has filed lawsuits against four states - Alabama, Maine, New Jersey and New York - and they have until sometime in 2007 to comply.

Other states are in varying degrees of compliance. They have escaped legal action because they have made good-faith efforts to meet the new standards.

But critics say the absence of electronic voting machines and outdated registration rolls can lead to major problems at the polls - and potentially skew election results.

DOJ_NMG_0089595

States like New York and Connecticut, with a number of competitive elections that could decide which party controls the U.S. House, still use lever ballot machines that generally have a higher error rate than other machines, said George Washington University law professor Spencer Overton.

Lever ballot machines also can't be used by blind voters, and not all election jurisdictions have the required alternate handicapped-accessible voting systems available, Kim acknowledged.

"We could see machinery outcomes shape the direction of our country," said Overton, a commissioner on the 2005 Carter-Baker Commission on Federal Election Reform.

Kim said the Justice Department has been far more aggressive in targeting election law violations, filing 17 lawsuits this year alone against counties, states and other jurisdictions. On average over the last two decades, the department has sued eight or nine jurisdictions a year.

Republicans Challenge Voter Rolls In Westchester (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

YONKERS, Oct. 31 — Republicans are challenging the right of thousands of registered voters in the local State Senate district to cast ballots on Nov. 7, charging that these voters do not live at the addresses listed with the Westchester County Board of Elections.

The dispute set off a war of words between the district's longtime incumbent, State Senator Nicholas A. Spano, and his Democratic rival, Andrea Stewart-Cousins, whom Mr. Spano beat by just 18 votes in 2004, after a contentious recount that lasted three months.

John Ciampoli, a Republican lawyer who handled the recount for Mr. Spano two years ago, said he found the discrepancies after checking postal change-of-address cards against district's voting rolls. On Friday, Mr. Ciampoli submitted the challenges to the Board of Elections, questioning the validity of 5,929 voter registrations and asking the board to send police officers to voters' homes to find out if any of them had moved.

Ms. Stewart-Cousins, a six-term county legislator, held a flurry of news conferences criticizing the challenges. In an interview, she called the idea of using officers to verify addresses as "an attempt to intimidate voters before the voting even begins."

Mr. Ciampoli, who lives on the outskirts of Albany, said he filed the challenges on behalf of the state's Republican Party and the Westchester Republican Committee. In 2004, he successfully challenged hundreds of paper ballots most likely cast for Ms. Stewart-Cousins in the 35th State Senate district race.

Mr. Spano, for his part, said that he supported the current challenge, but had no part in devising it.

"This is a simple procedural request that is not targeting any ethnic group or any party, and we just want to make sure that there's no fraud," said Mr. Spano, who has served in the Legislature since 1986.

Ms. Stewart-Cousins's spokesman, Ted Lazarus, charged that most of the voters whose registrations are in dispute are Democrats and that many live in some of the city's poorest — and heavily minority — neighborhoods, a claim that could not be independently verified.

In 2004, scores of poor, minority voters complained that they felt intimidated by Republican poll-watchers, Ms. Stewart-Cousins said. With that in mind, her campaign asked the Justice Department, four days before the challenges were filed, to monitor poll sites on Election Day.

According to Mr. Ciampoli, the voters whose registrations are being challenged are a mix of Republican and Democrat, as well as independent and unaffiliated voters. "I have not excluded from the database people from any party, and there's no way for me to tell if they're black, Latino or what," he said.

Carolee C. Saunderland, a Republican commissioner at the county's Board of Elections, said that the process of verifying the challenged addresses could not be completed by Election Day. To check the addresses, first-class letters are mailed to each person on the list, and if they are returned as undeliverable, the police are sent to the address to check if the voter still lives there.

Suspects Accused In Voter Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ANA, Calif.-Twelve people have been charged with tricking voters in Orange County into registering as Republicans, prosecutors said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0089596

The defendants, ranging in age from 19 to 52, were accused of fraudulently registering 37 voters as Republicans between August 2005 and February 2006. Democrats, Green Party members and a noncitizen were registered as Republicans, prosecutors said.

The suspects were hired to register new Republicans by private firms paid by the Orange County Republican Party, prosecutors said. The recruiters worked for the firm Bader & Associates, as well as a subcontractor, John Burkett. Both have said they no longer work on voter registration drives.

No charges were filed against the companies or the Republican Party.

The recruiters visited shopping centers and college campuses and were paid $10 a head for newly registered Republicans in a district represented by U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat, prosecutors said.

Voters were asked to sign petitions for lower taxes or stricter sex offender laws, then tricked into signing voter registration cards, Orange County prosecutor Anthony Rackauckas said. Other information was filled in using voters' driver's licenses, he said.

County Democratic Party officials said they have filed more than 500 verified complaints of fraud in the drive.

The 12 defendants were charged with fraudulent completion of affidavit of registration, a felony. Five defendants remain at large. The maximum penalty for a conviction is three years in prison.

The charges are the latest voting controversy to roil Orange County. In a separate case, the campaign of Sanchez's Republican opponent, Tan Nguyen, has been linked to intimidating letters sent to registered voters with Hispanic last names.

U.S. Attorney, Nightclub To Settle Civil Rights Suit (MJS)

By Gina Barton

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 1, 2006

Eve's attorney denies discrimination against African-Americans

The federal government and the owner of a downtown Milwaukee nightclub have agreed to settle a civil rights suit in which the government accused the business of discriminating against African-Americans.

The suit, filed by U.S. Attorney Steven M. Biskupic in late 2005, said that Eve, a club at 718 N. Milwaukee St., has discriminated against African-Americans since at least 2002, according to court records. The suit accused the owner of the club, Tom Wackman, of refusing entry to black patrons on the basis of race. Wackman contended that he runs an exclusive club that turns prospective patrons away for a number of reasons, but not race.

The government contended that Eve gave "false or pretextual reasons" for denying black people entry, "such as inappropriate attire, exclusion due to a private party, or that Eve was already full, while similarly-situated white persons were admitted to Eve," according to a Department of Justice news release.

Eve did not admit wrongdoing and will not be sanctioned, according to Timothy Baldwin, attorney for Wackman.

"We'll continue to do business as in the past, and the government will watch and make sure we're doing exactly what we said, which is maintaining a high-end, limited-access nightclub," Baldwin said.

Wackman has contended that his goal was to run an exclusive club like those in Chicago and Los Angeles that grant or deny entry based on things such as clothing, attitude and fame.

Before the agreement becomes binding, the U.S. district judge assigned to the case, James T. Moody, must sign it. Attorneys for both sides filed a motion Tuesday in federal court in Milwaukee asking him to do so.

There was no indication in the court record of when the judge might sign the agreement.

According to the Justice Department, under the consent decree, the club must not discriminate on the basis of race and must do several other things, including:

· Post and enforce a non-discriminatory dress code policy.

· Implement a system for receiving and investigating discrimination complaints.

· Conduct monitoring to make sure that employees are following the law.

"We will aggressively pursue claims of racial discrimination," Biskupic said Tuesday.

A civil case on the same issue, filed by another black patron who was denied entry to the club, Jason Holloway, is pending.

Feds Decline Civil Rights Probe In Beard Death (LYNN&A)

By Ron Brown & Matt Busse

Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, November 1, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department says it lacks sufficient information to justify a civil rights investigation into the death of Clarence Lightfoot Beard Jr., who died Sept. 24 while in custody of Lynchburg police.

DOJ_NMG_0089597

The department's decision was outlined in an Oct. 25 letter to L. Garnell Stamps, a local civil rights activist who requested the investigation.

Stamps wrote an Oct. 6 letter to the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division expressing his concerns about the circumstances surrounding Beard's death.

The matter is the focus of an ongoing investigation by the Virginia State Police and two separate investigations by the Lynchburg Police Department.

Meanwhile, city officials have refused to release public records about the incident, saying they are confidential because they deal with "personnel matters" or an "ongoing investigation."

The lack of a public record weighed heavily on the justice department's decision not to proceed with a civil rights investigation.

"The information which you furnished is insufficient to permit us to determine the existence of a possible violation of federal criminal civil rights statutes," wrote Daniel Rosenholtz, a paralegal specialist for the Civil Rights Division's Criminal Section, to Stamps. "Therefore, we are unable to authorize investigation of your complaint at this time."

Beard, 46, died after police came to his apartment at the James Crossing apartment complex around 3 a.m.

Police said they heard an argument inside before knocking on the apartment's door. They had come to the apartment complex looking for a woman, who was wanted.

Police said Beard struck two of the officers as he struggled with them during his arrest. It is unclear what prompted the confrontation between Beard and police.

The city has refused to release dispatcher logs or 911 tapes relative to the night Beard died, although The News & Advance requested those records under the Virginia Freedom of Information Act.

City officials also have declined to confirm whether police in-car cameras recorded the activities surrounding Beard's death.

Rosenholtz said Stamps would have to provide the Justice Department with details of Beard's death before an investigation would be authorized.

"You should include the date of the incident; the sequence of events leading up to and including any assault by police officers; a description of the injuries Mr. Beard sustained, copies of medical reports, if possible; and the name of involved law enforcement officials and possible witnesses," Rosenholtz' letter said.

The city has refused to name the officers involved.

The two officers involved have since returned to desk duty within the department.

While an autopsy of Beard by the state medical examiner in Roanoke showed he suffered from advanced coronary artery disease, there were also two lumps on his head near the hairline, an abrasion on his forehead and a bruise on his temple.

The medical examiner said none of the injuries appeared lethal.

The medical examiner is awaiting results of toxicology tests, which could show if Beard had any drugs in his system.

A check of other 911 records shows police came to Beard's apartment one other time between March and Sept. 24, when Apartment No. 111 was occupied by Beard and his fiancée, Roxanne Brown.

On March 14, police followed Timothy Hunter Paige to the apartment and arrested him on charges in connection with a hit-and-run, according to a letter from City Attorney Walter Erwin in response to a Freedom of Information request.

Beard and Brown were at the apartment, according to Erwin's letter.

Brown was charged with disorderly conduct for behaving "in a manner that hampered the officers' ability to perform their duties," according to Erwin's letter.

She was later found not guilty of the charge.

The letter's description of the incident says nothing about Beard except that he was at the apartment at the time. It also said a bag of what appeared to be marijuana, whose ownership could not be determined, was in plain view in the apartment.

Stamps said early last month that witnesses at the scene on Sept. 24 said Beard was pepper sprayed by police and struck repeatedly with fists.

Stamps said he has cell phone pictures of blood on the wall of Beard's apartment.

"There is some evidence that we have seen that his head was slammed up against the wall," Stamps said.

Stamps has also said a 16-year-old girl witnessed the beating.

"She came out and begged them to stop," Stamps said.

Black Plaintiffs Had Attacked Miss. Voting Method For Judges (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - The attorney for a group of black plaintiffs has withdrawn a federal complaint challenging how Mississippi will elect state circuit and chancery judges.

Attorney Carroll Rhodes of Hazlehurst, who filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in October, told Judge Henry T. Wingate that he was withdrawing the request after the Justice Department officially pre-cleared the election change Monday in a letter.

"Our complaint was that it should be submitted for pre-clearance," Rhodes said. "On Oct. 10, the state submitted it for pre-clearance and on Oct. 30, 2006, the attorney general tentatively gave pre-clearance."

Rhodes told Wingate the request shouldn't go forward.

In the pre-clearance letter, the Justice Department said that for the remainder of the 60-day period the office has to review the matter under the Voting Rights Act, information can be submitted that could result in changes to the pre-clearance.

Rhodes said plaintiffs were never seeking to stop or postpone the election. Rhodes said he wanted the judiciary races under the election law before it was rewritten by the Legislature in 2005.

He said the new law was to take effect Jan. 1, 2007, not for the Nov. 7 general election.

The lawsuit said that in six chancery court and nine circuit court districts, the opportunity for the election of black candidates has been harmed by the new law.

In those districts, the Legislature changed the election process from a "herd" system to a "post" system. The lawsuit had asked a federal panel to revert to the herd system for the Nov. 7 elections.

Under the herd system, all candidates run in a pack and the top vote getters win the available seats. The herd system was put in place in the late 1980s as part of a settlement of a lawsuit that also claimed the judicial election method diluted black voting strength.

Supporters argue the herd system can help blacks be elected because minorities can make their vote count more by voting only once, presumably for the black candidate.

In the post system, candidates choose the post for which they are running. Many incumbents like the post system because generally a challenger will opt not to run against an incumbent if there is an open spot to pursue.

Teen Shot By Police Stun Gun Dies (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - JERSEYVILLE, Ill.-A teenager carrying a Bible and shouting "I want Jesus" was shot twice with a police stun gun and later died at a St. Louis hospital, authorities said.

In a statement obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press, police in Jerseyville, about 40 miles north of St. Louis, said 17-year-old Roger Holyfield would not acknowledge officers who approached him and he continued yelling, "I want Jesus."

Police tried to calm the teen, but Holyfield became combative, according to the statement. Officers fired the stun gun at him after he ignored their warnings, then fired again when he continued struggling, police said.

Holyfield was flown to St. Louis' Cardinal Glennon Hospital after the confrontation Saturday; he died there Sunday, police said.

An autopsy was planned for Tuesday.

The statement expressed sympathy to Holyfield's family but said city and police officials would not discuss the matter further.

Calls Tuesday to Jerseyville Police Chief Brad Blackorby were not immediately returned. The department has been using stun guns for about five months, according to the statement.

In a report released in March, international human rights group Amnesty International said it had logged at least 156 deaths across the country in the previous five years related to police stun guns.

The rise in deaths accompanies a marked increase in the number of U.S. law enforcement agencies employing devices made by Taser International Inc. of Scottsdale, Ariz. About 1,000 of the nation's 18,000 police agencies used Tasers in 2001; more than 7,000 departments had them last year, according to a government study.

Police had used Tasers more than 70,000 times as of last year, Congress' Government Accountability Office said.

Amnesty International has urged police departments to suspend the use of Tasers pending more study. Taser International said the group's count was flawed and falsely linked deaths to Taser use when there has been no such official conclusion.

The city of St. Louis also drew unwanted attention for crime this week when it was named the most dangerous U.S. city by Morgan Quitno Press. The ranking looked only at crime within St. Louis city limits, not its metro area.

Discrimination Claim Might Be Viewed Again (INLVDB)

By Troy Anderson, Staff Writer

Inland Valley (CA) Daily Bulletin, November 1, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department might reopen an inquiry into a claim that the 2001 redistricting plan for the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors discriminates against Latinos, officials said Tuesday.

Latinos comprise 47 percent of the county's population but are represented by only one of the five supervisors.

Joaquin G. Avila, special counsel to the 1,070-member Los Angeles County Chicano Employees Association, recently provided the Justice Department with what he says is new evidence that indicates supervisors packed Latino voters into a single district when two districts could have been drawn.

First District Supervisor Gloria Molina, whose district includes Pomona, represents most of the county's Latino residents.

Avila's filing seeks the creation of two supervisorial districts with Latino majorities that would give the Latino community an opportunity to elect a second candidate to the Board of Supervisors, said Alan Clayton, director of equal employment opportunity at the LACCEA.

Eastern Los Angeles County is split among three supervisorial districts and no member of the Board of Supervisors lives there.

Scuffle With Deputies Results In Death (LAT)

By Nancy Wride

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

Authorities today are investigating the death of a Long Beach man after a confrontation with Los Angeles County sheriff's deputies Sunday night.

The 39-year-old man scuffled on a Lakewood corner with deputies who thought he had a handgun, according to the Sheriff's Department. What was thought to be a weapon turned out to be a cell phone, officials said.

The incident is being investigated by sheriff's homicide detectives and the Los Angeles County district attorney's office.

The name of the dead man was not released.

The incident began about 5:30 p.m. Sunday near the intersection of Paramount Boulevard and Flangel Street, a residential area just west of the Lakewood Country Club.

When two deputies "contacted the man," according to a statement by Sgt. Paul Patterson, "the man attempted to flee as he concealed an object which deputies believed was a handgun.

"A violent struggled ensued, which lasted for several minutes," according to the statement. "Throughout the struggle, the man kicked the deputies and resisted their every effort to control him. Once assisting units arrived, deputies were finally able to handcuff and restrain the man.

"At this time, it was discovered that the man was holding a cellular phone, not a handgun," the statement said.

The man was not breathing and had no pulse. Deputies and paramedics resuscitated the man, who was then taken to a hospital.

The man died at 7:40 p.m. Monday. The statement did not say where he died. The cause of death is under investigation by the Los Angeles County coroner.

The two deputies, who work out of the sheriff's substation in Lakewood, suffered moderate injuries and were treated and released from a hospital.

Mike Gennaco, chief attorney for the Sheriff's Department's Office of Independent Review, which examines events when department employees use force, said the unnamed man "had other encounters with the police and they had been violent."

Asked if there was any indication that the man suffered from mental illness, Gennaco said he had not been told that. He also noted that there were new legal limits about disclosing personal details.

He said that an autopsy today or Wednesday could help point homicide investigators in the direction to go.

There were several witnesses to the violent encounter, Gennaco added, and he had not yet reviewed all the officer and witness reports.

He said he thought the deputies "had made a gun arrest in that area the day before, and I think they were concerned [about the man].

"I think it was mostly instinct," Gennaco said. "When they had tried to conduct a consensual encounter, to ask some questions, he started reaching for his waistband. That's what's been conveyed to me."

Battle Over Abortion Focuses On South Dakota Vote (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — In the downtown headquarters of those opposing a ban on nearly all abortions in this state, there are notes from around the country taped up and down the hallway: "They need to butt out of women's lives" and "Why did S.D. vote for this?"

On the other side of town, in a warehouse decorated in pink, the supporters of the ban doggedly work a phone bank, in some cases young children playing nearby.

The battle here over a statewide ballot measure to install one of the country's strictest anti-abortion laws is playing out in television commercials, yard signs and Sunday sermons. It is also drawing the attention of national advocates on both sides of the abortion debate, who are watching the campaign with deep intensity and even fear.

Both sides predict that the outcome of the vote in South Dakota could send the country's broader debate over abortion rights swerving in new directions, and will set the tone for the fate of similarly strict laws being considered in nearly a dozen other states.

"I think there's some sense out there that — 'By golly, if they can do it there, we're going to do it here,' " said Nancy Keenan, the president of Naral Pro-Choice America, which opposes the South Dakota ban.

Daniel McConchie, the vice president of Americans United for Life, which favors passage of the measure, said a defeat at the polls on Nov. 7 could take the steam out of efforts to impose even less restrictive measures, like parental notification rules or waiting periods, that have been the focus of the anti-abortion movement in recent years.

"There's fear that legislators elsewhere would see what happened there and try to play it safer," Mr. McConchie said. "That would have a chilling effect on more incremental legislation in other places."

The South Dakota ban was passed by the Legislature in February but was pushed to a statewide vote by opponents. If the law survives, it would become a felony for a doctor in South Dakota to perform abortions except to prevent the death of the pregnant woman. The latest poll shows voters leaning against the ban, but its fate remains uncertain and both sides are now clearly searching to grab the last, undecided voters whose views on abortion may fall somewhere in the blurry middle.

For that, the most extreme arguments are nowhere to be found. No bloody fetuses fill billboards, no absolute claims are being offered about women's rights.

Instead, in calls from a phone bank at the ban opponents' headquarters, volunteers quietly tell potential voters that the law is just too narrow, failing to allow abortions in circumstances like rape or incest. The supporters of the ban, meanwhile, speak in gentle tones about how abortion hurts women.

"I refuse to show pictures of dead babies," said Leslee Unruh, who leads Vote Yes For Life, the group that is campaigning for the law, reflecting on methods used by anti-abortion groups. "That's what the old way was, and that's why they were losing all these years."

The messages may be muted to appeal to moderates, but the debate has nonetheless grown tense.

Local advocates on each side insist that they are drawing mainly on South Dakotans for help, while also insisting that the other side is getting significant help from wealthy, powerful, well-organized operations outside of the state.

The Rev. Jerry Falwell issued an Internet plea to his followers, calling on them in September to "counter the propaganda" Planned Parenthood would be promoting. And Cecile Richards, the president of Planned Parenthood, scoffed at Mr. Falwell's claims about how much money her group would spend, but acknowledged, "This is really on the top of everyone's mind."

Until the week beginning Oct. 29, the political groups have not been required by state rules to publicly disclose the amount or sources of their money since early summer. They were required to submit financial disclosures to the secretary of state's office with postmarks of Oct. 31.

[Neither report had arrived there Tuesday.

[The South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, which has led efforts to oppose the ban, said late Tuesday that the group raised more than $1.8 million (not including in-kind contributions) since late June, all but $160,000 of that from donors outside the state. Vote Yes For Life, which supports the ban, said it was still deciding whether to release some of its figures late Tuesday evening.]

Oregon and California have abortion measures on their ballots this year, both weighing parental notification laws, similar to provisions for parental notification or consent that exist in various forms in 34 states.

But because of its breadth and scope, South Dakota's measure has eclipsed the other two measures when it comes to national campaign efforts, which have included ambitious fund-raising drives and potluck suppers in 233 towns around the country.

South Dakota's abortion law was intentionally sweeping and was designed, as Gov. Mike Rounds has described it, as a "full frontal attack" on Roe v. Wade, the 1973 United States Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal.

If upheld by the voters, the law is also certain to draw a lawsuit from Planned Parenthood — which operates the only abortion clinic in the state, where about 800 abortions are performed a year — setting off the legal battle that the ban's authors had anticipated and wished for: the most direct challenge to Roe v. Wade in more than a decade. The ban, which could take effect as soon as the state's vote is certified, would probably be put on hold while the case makes its way through the courts.

In the continuing quest to sway wavering voters, the debate in recent days has centered on what the law says and does not say about exceptions — a question that seemed not to be in doubt for many months after state lawmakers passed the bill and Governor Rounds signed it in March.

A month earlier, legislators had voted down amendments that would have allowed abortions in cases of incest, rape or in instances when the pregnant woman's health would be jeopardized (though not fatally).

But supporters of the ban, including advocates on a television commercial that has been broadcast around the state, now say there are other exceptions written in the law.

In the commercial, as more than a dozen doctors — some of the scores of members of a group calling itself South Dakota Physicians for Life — stand together in white coats, stethoscopes draped around their necks, Dr. Mark Rector says: "This measure does provide exception for the life and health of the mother."

Asked about the commercial's assertions, the ban's supporters say the law includes "an exception" for the health of the mother because it would allow a doctor to treat a sick mother for her illness and, if treatment accidentally resulted in the death of a fetus, that would not be deemed a crime.

The ban also does not apply to the use of emergency contraception — the so-called "morning after pill" — in the first days after conception, a fact that ban supporters say amounts to "an exception" that would cover rape and incest cases.

[The new debate may reflect the polls, the latest of which found that 52 percent of those polled said they would vote against the ban, 42 percent for keeping it. Another 6 percent were undecided in the Mason-Dixon Polling & Research survey published in the Argus Leader of Sioux Falls on Sunday and the margin of error was plus or minus four percentage points.

[But the poll also found that 56 percent of those who opposed the ban or were undecided said they would support it if it carried a clear exception for rape and incest.]

In a recent interview, Roger Hunt, a state representative who sponsored the bill, said he and others were clarifying points that had always been part of the law. "Regardless of how we label these things or whether we use the phrase 'exceptions,' what we're saying is that there are these provisions to deal with such cases," Mr. Hunt said.

Opponents of the ban have filed complaints with local television stations over the commercial, saying supporters are trying to confuse undecided voters in the final days.

An Untimely Voter Purge (NYT)

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

One of the most deplorable political tactics — trying to suppress the votes of poor or minority citizens by raising the specter of voter fraud — is playing out this week in the city of Yonkers. Republican Party lawyers are calling for an 11th-hour purge of voter rolls in a clear effort to help their endangered state senator, Nicholas Spano.

Two years ago, Mr. Spano won a race against Andrea Stewart-Cousins, a Democratic Westchester County legislator, by 18 votes after months of courtroom wrangling and ballot-challenging. This year's rematch has been bitter, full of venomous ads and slung mud. Then last Friday, Republican lawyers filed challenges to nearly 6,000 voter registrations in the Senate district, charging discrepancies between county voter lists and change-of-address records compiled by the Postal Service.

There is a process for investigating an accusation of voter fraud. It involves sending a letter to an address in dispute, and possibly following up with a police inquiry. The Westchester County Board of Elections is doing that. But it has never had an outside party dump so many contested names so close to such a fiercely contested election.

The Republicans say they have only the purest motives. "It's in everyone's interest to put the election beyond the pale of fraud," said John Ciampoli, a lawyer for the county Republican Party.

Forgive us if we are unmoved by this freelance fit of pre-election rectitude. If the Republicans were sincere about tidying the voter rolls, they could have raised the alarm long ago. Instead they dropped a bomb at the last minute — a conjectural list of possibly problematic names that the Board of Elections has no hope of clearing up before Nov. 7. Efforts to purge voter rolls are notoriously prone to error and misuse, because of the innocent or inconsequential discrepancies that abound in voter records.

Whatever happens on Tuesday, this list must not be used to disenfranchise voters. People should go to the polls knowing they will not be intimidated or threatened for trying to vote.

Mr. Spano can make a credible case for re-election based on his record. It's regrettable that he belongs to a party that demonstrates an unseemly enthusiasm for keeping people from voting and for turning the exercise of democracy into a game won on technicalities. He should disavow this scheme, call off the lawyers and try to win an open, aboveboard election.

ANTITRUST:

Entercom To Sell 3 Radio Stations Due To Antitrust Concerns (AP)

By Deborah Yao, AP Business Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

PHILADELPHIA — The Justice Department said Tuesday it has suspended an antitrust investigation into Entercom Communications Corp.'s purchase of several New York radio stations because the company said it would sell three stations to comply with media ownership rules.

The Justice Department had been looking into Entercom's $262 million purchase of 15 radio stations from CBS Corp. in Austin, Texas; Cincinnati; Memphis, Tenn.; and Rochester, N.Y.

The investigation centered on Rochester, where Bala Cynwyd-based Entercom already owns four radio stations, one AM and three FM. The acquisition would hand over four more FM stations in the area.

With eight radio stations, Entercom would control more than 57 percent of the radio advertising market, and the Justice Department was investigating whether its dominant market share would lead to reduced competition and higher prices for radio advertising.

Federal Communications Commission's rules on local ownership would prohibit Entercom from owning more than five FM stations in an area, requiring it to sell two.

Entercom said it's planning to sell three stations — the CBS-owned WRMM-FM and WZNE-FM and Entercom's WFKL-FM — to comply with FCC rules. The stations are expected to be sold within three months to a buyer approved by the Justice Department, according to a news release issued by the department Tuesday.

After the sale, Entercom's share of Rochester's radio ad market would fall to 40 percent.

Entercom officials did not immediately return a call for comment Tuesday.

One of the nation's largest broadcasters, Entercom owns radio stations in 20 markets and posted annual revenue of $432.5 million. CBS, based in New York, owns and operates 179 radio stations in 40 markets nationwide, among other assets. Last year, it reported $14.5 billion in total revenue.

Shares of Entercom fell by 2.6 percent, or 75 cents, to close at $27.67 on Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange. CBS shares fell by 6 cents to end the day at $28.94 on the New York Stock Exchange.

R.R. Donnelley To Buy Banta In $1.3 Billion Deal (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co. said late yesterday it has agreed to acquire Banta Corp., a Menasha, Wis., provider of printing and digital-imaging solutions, in a $1.3 billion deal.

The agreement comes as printing-services provider Cenveo Inc. said it has withdrawn its $50-a-share acquisition offer for Banta. Cenveo, Stamford, Conn., in August offered to buy rival Banta for $46 a share, or about $1.12 billion. Banta rejected the offer, opting instead to announce a restructuring that would cut as many as 500 jobs and close five printing plants.

In September, Cenveo sweetened its bid to $47 a share. Banta, in rejecting the bid, said its board authorized management to explore strategies for further maximizing shareholder value, including a possible sale of the company. Cenveo then raised its bid to $50 a share.

"I am disappointed [but not surprised] that Banta has not accepted or even entered into discussions with us regarding our proposal," said Cenveo Chief Executive Robert Burton Sr. in an open letter to Stephanie Streeter, Banta's CEO, before the Donnelley deal was announced.

The deal with Donnelley -- consisting of $36.50 a share after a special dividend of $16 a share already declared by Banta -- has been unanimously approved by both companies' boards and is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007.

R.R. Donnelley, a Chicago provider of print services, sees the acquisition adding to earnings in the first full year after the close of the deal, which remains subject to approval from regulators and shareholders.

Banta has annual revenue of about $1.5 billion, while Donnelley had 2005 sales of $8.43 billion.

Sony Targeted In Widening Justice Department Memory-chip Probe (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, AP Business Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

An obscure corner of the semiconductor industry became an international battleground Tuesday as Sony Corp. became the fifth company ensnared in a U.S. Department of Justice antitrust probe into the sales of a particular type of memory chip.

DOJ_NMG_0089603

The same day, European Union regulators said they raided several unnamed semiconductor companies in Germany on Oct. 11 as part of a probe into possible price fixing for the same type of chip.

Both investigations center on the sale of static random access memory, or SRAM, a kind of computer memory found in relatively small quantities in PCs and used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear.

SRAM memory is faster and more reliable than dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, the most common type used in personal computers.

But it also can be more expensive for high-end corporate uses, and SRAM sales are shrinking as customers gravitate toward chips with integrated memory to save space and cut costs, said Mark DeVoss, a senior analyst with market researcher iSuppli Corp.

Worldwide SRAM sales totaled $2.8 billion in 2005, compared with DRAM sales the same year of about $24.8 billion, according to iSuppli.

DeVoss said he was puzzled by the widening probe, saying any pricing shenanigans would likely have little impact on consumers because of the small market size and relatively low selling prices for most types of SRAM, he said.

"Unless there's something really, really, really wrong, I think this is a tempest in a teapot," he said. "I don't think consumers are being affected that much, simply because the business is too small."

European regulators were explicit that the companies targeted in the cartel raid were suspected of breaking price-fixing laws.

However, the European Commission never names the companies suspected of operating a cartel and said that the surprise inspections were a preliminary step in its probe.

Under EU law, businesses found guilty of taking part in a cartel can be fined up to 10 percent of their annual revenue.

In Washington, Justice Department officials declined to discuss details of the probe. Spokeswoman Gina Talamona would only say that antitrust prosecutors are "investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the SRAM industry."

Sony said Tuesday it had received a subpoena from the Justice Department's antitrust division seeking information on its SRAM business, but it did not disclose details of the probe. The company said it would cooperate with investigators.

The company said it sold $27.7 million worth of SRAM in 2005. Outside companies make the product for Sony, which in turn sells the memory chips to other electronics makers.

Sony shares fell 57 cents, or 1.37 percent, to close at $40.98 Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Earlier this month, four other companies said they had been contacted by the Justice Department as part of the industrywide probe - San Jose-based Cypress Semiconductor Corp., and the U.S. units of Mitsubishi Electric Corp., Samsung Electronics Co. and Toshiba Corp.

The SRAM investigation comes amid a Justice Department probe of price-fixing among DRAM companies.

That probe has so far resulted in more than a dozen charges against individuals and more than $731 million in fines against Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

But unlike the DRAM probe, which examined practices with a direct impact on the bottom line for consumers, the SRAM probe may have been prompted by corporations concerned they were overcharged for the fastest memory used in high-end networking equipment, said Adrienne Downey, senior analyst with Semico Research Corp.

Downey said she expects more companies to get pulled into the investigation, but questioned whether the manpower employed in the investigation was warranted considering the small SRAM market size.

"They're really making a mountain out of a molehill," she said. "They're really looking for something that might not be a really big issue. If the price fixing is the real thing, they're doing it more for the spirit or the thought behind it."

Sony Discloses U.S. Antitrust Investigation Over Chips (NYT)

By Martin Fackler

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 31 — Sony, the Japanese electronics giant, said on Tuesday that its electronics unit was under investigation by the United States Justice Department for possible antitrust violations, the latest problem for a company battered by battery recalls, product delays and plunging profits.

Sony said in a statement that it had received a subpoena from the Justice Department in what appeared to be part of a broader investigation into a type of memory chip called static random access memory, or SRAM. The chip is used in computers, disk drives and other devices like cellphones.

“Sony intends to cooperate fully with the D.O.J. in what appears to be an industrywide inquiry,” Sony’s statement said.

Sony is at least the fifth company whose SRAM business has come under investigation by American regulators. The Justice Department is also investigating Matsushita Electric and Toshiba of Japan, Samsung Electronics of South Korea and Cypress Semiconductor of San Jose, Calif.

An earlier investigation by the Justice Department into price fixing in the market for another type of memory chip, dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, led to $731 million in fines imposed on four companies and several individuals.

Sony's sales last year of SRAM chips totaled $28 million, a fraction of the company's $64 billion in global sales. The bigger potential damage will probably be to Sony's once-sterling reputation, which has already been tarnished by the recent recall of 9.6 million laptop batteries and delays to its widely awaited next-generation game console, PlayStation 3.

The recent problems have come just as Sony appeared headed to recovery under its first non-Japanese chief executive, Sir Howard Stringer.

Under Mr. Stringer, who took Sony's helm last year, the company had appeared to be bouncing back from blunders like losing the market in global portable music players to the iPod from Apple and being late to produce flat-panel televisions.

But the company has hit a series of new problems. The first were delays to PlayStation 3, which Sony badly needs to be a hit so that it can regain its image as an electronics innovator. The rollout of PlayStation 3, initially expected last summer, is now scheduled this month in Japan and the United States, and for March in Europe. Last August, Sony began a global recall of lithium-ion batteries after laptops overheated and in rare cases burst into flames.

The recall has so far cost Sony $429 million. Sony could also face additional costs from lawsuits. The recalls and PlayStation 3 development costs also led Sony to lower its net profit forecast for the current fiscal year, ending March 2007, by 38 percent to 80 billion yen, or $673 million.

Raids in Germany

BRUSSELS, Oct. 31 (AP) — European antitrust regulators said on Tuesday that they had carried out raids on several semiconductor makers in Germany this month.

The European Commission said it had reason to believe that the companies, which make static random access memory chips, had broken the organization's rules that prohibit price fixing.

The commission did not identify the companies suspected of operating a cartel.

EU Probes For Price Fixing In Computer Memory Market (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, November 1, 2006

Oct. 31 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators are investigating potential price-fixing of memory chips used in computers and mobile phones, working with U.S. authorities.

A Sony Corp. chip-making unit, Sony Electronics Inc., received a U.S. Justice Department subpoena seeking information about its business, the company said in a statement today. U.S. regulators are conducting a criminal price-fixing investigation into the market for static random-access memory chips.

The EU is probing makers of SRAM chips, coordinating with U.S. authorities. The commission conducted unannounced inspections at offices in Germany on Oct. 11 along with national antitrust officials, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said. He didn't identify the companies involved. The U.S. inquiry follows a three-year probe of price-fixing in the DRAM chip market.

``The commission has reason to believe that the companies concerned may have violated Article 81 of the EC Treaty, which prohibits practices such as price fixing," the European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, said in a statement today.

Samsung Electronics Co., Cypress Semiconductor Corp. and Micron Technology Inc., among the biggest makers of the chips, said Oct. 12 that the Justice Department had contacted them about SRAMs. In the probe of the dynamic random-access memory chip probe, the Justice Department has collected $731 million in criminal fines, including $300 million from Samsung.

Raids Denied

Qimonda AG, the memory chip unit of Germany's Infineon Technologies AG, said its offices weren't raided by EU officials, spokesman Ralph Heinrich said by telephone today. Qimonda was spun off on May 1 this year. It had net sales of 2.8 billion euros ($3.6 billion) in the year ended Sept. 30, 2005, according to Qimonda's Web site.

Spokesmen for San Jose, California-based Cypress and Boise, Idaho-based Micron both denied that their companies' European offices had been visited as part of the investigation there.

``I'm not aware of any kind of investigation by the European Union as of yet," said Daniel Francisco, a Micron spokesman, in an interview today. Matt Beevers, a Cypress spokesman, also denied that EU regulators had visited the company's offices in Germany.

Francisco reiterated that Micron is cooperating with the Justice Department probe. In its statement, Sony said the U.S. probe ``appears to be an industrywide inquiry."

Nicholas Babin, a spokeswoman for Sony Europe GmbH, said the company hadn't been raided in Germany.

Spokespeople for Suwon, South Korea-based Samsung didn't immediately return a phone message seeking comment. Samsung, the market leader in SRAM production, on Oct. 12 acknowledged receiving a Justice Department subpoena for SRAM data sales and marketing. Chris Goodhart, a spokeswoman, said the company is cooperating with U.S. authorities.

The 2006 worldwide market for SRAM chips was valued at $2.9 billion by iSuppli Corp., a market research company. The global market for DRAM chips is valued at about $30 billion.

Judge Fines Company For Bid-rigging (DURHER)

By Joe Hanel, Herald Denver Bureau

Durango (CO) Herald, November 1, 2006

Former head of Farmington office also pleaded guilty to charge

DENVER - A Tulsa company was fined $150,000 for rigging bids for the construction of BP natural-gas pipelines in Southwest Colorado.

Flint Energy Services received the sentence on Monday from U.S. District Court Judge Phillip Figa.

The company and the former head of its Farmington office, Kenneth L. Rains, pleaded guilty in August to conspiring with other unnamed people to defraud BP by submitting high bids for pipeline construction. Bid-rigging is a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Rains has been transferred to the company's Oklahoma headquarters, but he hasn't been fired. Figa questioned why not.

"Why does the company keep on someone who has committed a felony?" Figa asked.

Flint's attorney, Ryan Stoll, said the company isolated Rains from his old post but decided not to fire him because of "personal circumstances" that might become clear at Rains' sentencing in January. Stoll said he expects Rains to be sent to prison.

Flint and lawyers for the Justice Department's antitrust division had asked for a fine of $100,000, citing the prompt cooperation of Flint executives. Federal sentencing guidelines call for a fine of $161,000 to $322,000.

Figa said a $100,000 fine is "not significant enough to reflect the crime that has occurred here."

Flint already has paid restitution to BP.

Rains was in charge of the Farmington office, which has more than 200 employees. One of Rains' subordinates blew the whistle on the bid-rigging by informing BP and the government.

Carla Stern, a Justice Department attorney, said there's no evidence the conspiracy went any higher than Rains. She praised Flint executives for cooperating and speeding up the case.

Court documents hint at an ongoing investigation. Justice Department attorneys wrote that Flint has provided "extensive, credible information against both corporate and individual co-conspirators."

Aside from Flint and Rains, no other people or corporations have been charged.

AMD Wants To Force Intel To Divulge Documents For Antitrust Suit (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

Advanced Micro Devices Inc., the No. 2 computer chip maker behind Intel Corp., asked the court overseeing its antitrust lawsuit against Intel to force the company to produce documents related to its conduct outside of the United States.

The judge had previously ruled AMD cannot sue in the U.S. for Intel's alleged monopolistic tactics overseas.

But AMD argued in the motion filed Monday in a Delaware federal court that the order only applies to damages sought in the U.S. for Intel's alleged strong-arm tactics abroad. AMD maintains it should be allowed to use documentation of those actions to pursue domestic commerce claims.

Sunnyvale-based AMD, which filed its lawsuit in June 2005, accuses Santa Clara-based Intel of bullying major customers into exclusive deals and offering secret rebates to undercut AMD in the market for microprocessors, which act as the brains of computers.

The lawsuit alleges anticompetitive practices in several countries including Britain, Germany and Japan.

In September, U.S. District Judge Joseph J. Farnan Jr. dismissed a key portion of the lawsuit, ruling that AMD failed to prove that Intel's alleged tactics abroad had a direct effect on its operations in the U.S.

AMD argued in its latest motion that "evidence of Intel's foreign exclusionary conduct is directly relevant" to its claims of lost microprocessor sales to U.S. customers, and for lost sales of domestically made microprocessors to foreign customers.

Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy said the company disagreed with AMD's interpretation of the ruling and planned to file its reply in the coming weeks.

A trial date has been set for April 27, 2009.

Donnelley To Acquire Banta In $1.3B Deal (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

MENASHA, Wis. - R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co. will acquire Banta Corp. in a $1.3 billion deal combining two Midwestern printing firms with histories dating back more than a century, the companies announced Tuesday.

Chicago-based R.R. Donnelley, which prints the Yellow Pages, said the acquisition will allow it to expand its range of products and services for customers and also enhance its services in magazine, catalog and book printing and in direct marketing.

Donnelley also said in a press release that while it expected its 2006 earnings from continuing operations to be at the high end of earlier guidance of $2.45 to $2.50, anticipated restructuring charges made it impossible to estimate net income for the full year.

Banta, based in Menasha, Wis., has operations in Europe and Asia, in addition to the United States.

"Banta is an exceptional fit with R.R. Donnelley," said Mark A. Angelson, R.R. Donnelley chief executive officer, in a statement. "This combination will create immediate cross-selling opportunities with our blue-chip customers as well as offer substantial synergies in our procurement, manufacturing and services operations. "

The cash deal is valued at about $1.3 billion, or $36.50 per share after a special dividend of $16.00 per share already declared by Banta. The offer, equal to $52.50 per share, represents a premium of 18.6 percent over Banta's closing share price Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange of $44.28.

Banta said in September that it would declare a $16 per share special dividend payable in November.

The agreement, unanimously approved by boards of directors of both companies, is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007.

Earlier Tuesday, Cenveo Inc., which makes envelopes and provides digital printing services, said it had dropped its bid to acquire Banta for $1.21 billion.

Stephanie A. Streeter, Banta's chairwoman and CEO, said the result of the deal will be "a combined organization that creates new and exciting opportunities for our customers and employees moving forward.

"Together, the companies will offer enhanced capabilities and an increased array of options to our customers and I look forward to working closely with R.R. Donnelley's management to ensure a smooth transition."

Banta, with 1,585 employees in Wisconsin's Fox Valley and 8,000 worldwide, reported 2005 revenues of $1.54 billion. It produces books and other printed matter and also provides supply chain management services.

R.R. Donnelley has 47,000 employees worldwide and had 2005 revenues of $8.43 billion.

Stratex, Harris Deal Gets Antitrust OK (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. --Stratex Networks Inc., a maker of digital microwave radios used in wireless communications, said Tuesday the required waiting period for its merger into Harris Corp.'s microwave communications unit has ended.

The deal, announced in September, would give Harris a majority stake in the new company.

Melbourne, Fla.-based Harris, which sells communications products to government and commercial customers, will contribute its microwave division and $25 million in cash and get a 56 percent ownership stake in the combined company. Shareholders of Stratex will own 44 percent.

The waiting period was required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976.

The deal still requires approval by other regulators and Stratex shareholders.

Stratex shares closed down 3 cents at $4.67 on the Nasdaq. Shares of Harris closed up 78 cents at $42.60 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Music Publishers Say Anti-piracy Settlement Reached With Kazaa (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-The music publishing industry reached a tentative deal with operators of the Kazaa file-sharing network over claims of copyright infringement, an industry group said.

Publishers pursuing a class-action suit against Kazaa informed U.S. District Court on Monday that the peer-to-peer network had agreed to pay "a substantial sum" under the agreement, the National Music Publishers' Association said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0089607

The amount of the settlement was not disclosed. It is subject to final approval by the association board.

The settlement "will be another key milestone of the ongoing transformation of the digital music marketplace to one that will allow legal services to thrive," NMPA president and chief executive David Israelite said in the statement.

Phil Armstrong. a spokesman for Sharman Networks Ltd., which owns and distributes Kazaa, said he was not familiar with the lawsuit and declined to comment.

Sharman Networks announced in July that it had settled copyright infringement lawsuits with music labels and movie studios, agreeing to redesign its software to block customers from downloading protected music and movies and to pay more than $115 million (â,¬90.6 million) in penalties.

The agreements are among a wave of legal settlements between file-sharing networks and the entertainment industry since the Supreme Court ruled last year that technology companies caught encouraging customers to steal music and movies over the Internet could be sued.

Last month, a federal judge ruled against StreamCast Inc., the distributor of the Morpheus online file-sharing software, finding the firm encouraged computer users to share music, movies and other copyright works without permission.

Major Commercial Real Estate Firms Merge (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

CB Richard Ellis Group Inc., the world's largest commercial real estate broker and one of the most prominent real estate firms in Washington, agreed yesterday to buy rival Trammell Crow Co. in a deal worth $2.2 billion that will more than double its property management business.

Although neither company is based here, both are considered major local players. CB Richard Ellis, which manages 22 million square feet of space in the Washington area, is handling the leasing of one of the Watergate office buildings and has done leasing for Northrop Grumman Corp., Verizon Communications Inc. and General Dynamics Corp.

Trammell Crow is turning Columbia Hospital for Women in the District into a retail and residential building. It builds, buys and sells properties, and manages buildings and oversees refurbishing for customers such as Ford Motor Co., American Express Co., Bank of America Corp. and Exxon Mobil Corp.

The deal is one of several mergers that have occurred in the past few years as clients seek more efficient ways of buying, selling and leasing office space, industry experts said. Jones Lang LaSalle Inc. of Chicago recently acquired Spaulding & Slye Colliers of Boston. Three years ago, CB Richard Ellis paid $415 million for Insignia Financial Group Inc. of New York.

Yesterday's deal combines CB Richard Ellis's global operations in leasing space and buying and selling office buildings with Trammell Crow's corporate services, development and project management experience, company executives and real estate experts said.

CB Richard Ellis, based in El Segundo, Calif., is buying Dallas-based Trammell Crow for $49.51 per share in cash. The deal is expected to close by the end of the year. CB Richard Ellis stock closed up $1.81 yesterday, at $30.03; Trammell Crow closed up $9.65, at $48.75.

A Trammell Crow division that builds office buildings will keep its name and be run as a separate subsidiary; all of its development projects will proceed. Executives said it is too early to know if either company will move its local offices or if there will be layoffs.

"It means we're joining two significant real estate firms and combining them into one better organization both locally and nationally," said John Germano, senior managing director in the Washington office of CB Richard Ellis. "You're going to get a company that has more service lines and an unprecedented level of talent," he said. "There will be very little cannibalization, very little overlap."

CB Richard Ellis has 14,500 employees worldwide in 200 offices and revenue of nearly $3 billion. It has 300 employees locally.

It dwarfs Trammell Crow, which has 6,700 employees in 71 offices nationally and revenue of $896 million. Trammell Crow has a large local presence, however, managing 27 million square feet of space with 470 employees in the mid-Atlantic region, which stretches from Richmond to Baltimore. Figures were not available last night for the Washington area alone.

"We bring project management and property management," said Joseph A. Callanan, Northeast regional director for Trammell Crow. "When you put that with CB's global reach and their strong brokerage platform, that combined provides a seamless set of services that's not been seen in the industry.

"If you're a small company in Bethesda and you need space in London, we can now find the space and do the project management," he said. "Or if you're a bigger company and have large campuses, we can acquire a property for you, build a building, do the interior construction, manage it and maintain it."

Local real estate industry executives saw the deal as a logical move.

"CB has always been looking to expand their services, and they saw the development arm of Trammell Crow as something they didn't really have," said Scott Johnston, a senior vice president at Jones Lang LaSalle. "From Trammell Crow's side, they didn't have a strong global platform, so that's what each is getting from the other."

Chief executive Bob Pinkard of the real estate service firm Cassidy & Pinkard Inc., said: "CB's stock has done very well in the last few years because they've shown they have the capacity to grow, but the problem becomes that when you get as large as they are, you can't grow by simply adding a few brokers here and there. You have to acquire other companies."

Others suggested it could be difficult for the combined company to sort out the interests of competing tenants and landlords.

"I'm quite sure they have a strategy that will make the Trammell Crow acquisition a success," said Ray Ritchey, executive vice president at Boston Properties Inc. who worked at CB Richard Ellis as a broker in the late 1970s. "We have an expression here that bigger is not always better. Better is better. It's going to be interesting to see how they'll make that transition."

CB Richard Ellis Buys Trammell Crow Deal Valued At $1.79 Billion Will Hasten Consolidation, Boost Corporate Services (WSJ)

By Ryan Chittum

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

CB Richard Ellis Group Inc. agreed to buy Trammell Crow Co. for $1.79 billion, in a deal that further cements CB Richard Ellis's position as the biggest player in the booming business of helping companies handle their real estate.

The deal, by far the biggest in the commercial real-estate services sector, hastens consolidation that began in earnest a decade ago and has transformed what were once regional businesses focused on lease and sales brokerage into a handful of multiservice behemoths catering to multinational corporations increasingly looking to outsource their global real-estate functions.

Los Angeles-based CB Richard Ellis would gain a more robust presence in the corporate-services outsourcing market, in which Trammell Crow is an industry leader, along with bigger positions in facilities and project management. "We believe Trammell Crow is best in class in that area," CB Richard Ellis Chief Executive Brett White said in an interview. "They were doing, frankly, a better job than we were."

CB Richard Ellis will keep the Trammell Crow brand name and operate the development business as an independent subsidiary -- acknowledgement of the long and colorful role of the Dallas-based company, which retired Texas entrepreneur Trammell Crow built into one of the nation's largest real-estate developers during the 1980s.

The deal, expected to close late this year or early in 2007, would diversify CB Richard Ellis's revenue and income, which are susceptible to volatile cyclical swings. About 78% of the company's revenue comes from transactions; with Trammell Crow, that number would fall to 68%, according to Mr. White.

CB Richard Ellis would pay $49.51 a share for Trammell Crow, a number JMP Securities analyst Will Marks called "a great deal for Trammell shareholders." The offer represents a 27% premium over Trammell Crow's Monday close. Yesterday, Trammell Crow shares soared 25% while CB Richard Ellis shares jumped 6.4% in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Including debt and transaction costs, the deal's value comes to $2.2 billion.

Much of the industry's consolidation has been driven by geographic considerations, including the last major deal in 2003 when CB Richard Ellis swallowed Insignia/ESG to boost its New York presence. This deal is different for CB Richard Ellis, which would get a boost in its corporate services and facilities and property management capabilities, but would receive little or no benefit from geographic expansion. Trammell Crow, though, will be able to capitalize on its parent company's global reach. "Trammell Crow was well aware that they needed to get an international presence in order to maintain their competitiveness," said Michele Flynn, president of Expense Management Solutions Inc., a Boston-based firm that advises companies on outsourcing services.

Ms. Flynn said the combined company would be better able to go head to head with Chicago-based Jones Lang LaSalle Inc., the leader in the corporate-services area.

The two companies will have redundancies that could lead to a loss of brokers and revenue in some markets, said Jeffrey Finn, president and chief operating officer of NAI Global Inc., a Princeton, N.J.-based competitor. Barry M. Gosin, CEO of New York-based Newmark Knight Frank, another competitor in commercial real-estate services, added that the move would be good for his firm and others. "There's one less company in the beauty contest."

Trammell Crow dates back to 1948, when Mr. Crow built his first commercial development, a warehouse near downtown Dallas. Making deals on a handshake, Mr. Crow soon became the largest builder in Dallas's Trinity Industrial District. By the late 1950s, he was making his mark across the burgeoning Sunbelt city, developing the Dallas Market Center and the Dallas Apparel Mart.

Trammell Crow established its first offices outside Texas in 1968 in San Francisco, developing Embarcadero Center there and later other signature projects such as Atlanta's Peachtree Center. By the early 1980s, it was one of the nation's largest real-estate developers, focusing on office and industrial property and shopping centers.

After the oil bust coupled with the savings and loan crisis dealt the Texas developers a heavy blow, Trammell Crow responded in part by diversifying into real-estate services. Trammell Crow CEO Robert Sulentic said in an interview that the new company will benefit even more from its "global footprint and sheer scope of services."

Mr. Crow's daughter, Lucy Billingsley, said she was pleased the Trammell Crow name will live on. "That's where his heart lies," she said of her father, now 92 years old.

Google Buys JotSpot To Expand Online Document-Sharing Service By KEVIN J. DELANEY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Google Inc. said it acquired closely held start-up JotSpot for an undisclosed sum, a move that could strengthen Google's expanding services for users to create and share documents online.

JotSpot, exploiting a technology called wikis, provides free and paid services that allow individuals to jointly work on Web-based information such as spreadsheets, photo albums, calendars and contact lists. Google, Mountain View, Calif., has assembled free online word-processing, spreadsheet, email and calendar services that have some similarities with JotSpot's offerings. Such services could win away some of the consumers Microsoft Corp. is targeting with its Office software.

JotSpot Chief Executive Joe Kraus said his company was happy to join Google because "it's really clear they are focusing on letting people collaborate and share and work together online." Google executives are also trying to streamline the number of products the company has, and Mr. Kraus said JotSpot would focus on how to integrate with Google's existing services.

JotSpot, Palo Alto, Calif., has about 30,000 paying corporate customers at about 2,000 companies. Roughly 300,000 people use JotSpot's free service, which carries some storage and other restrictions. The company, which received funding from the Mayfield Fund and Redpoint Ventures venture-capital firms, has 27 employees.

Colo. City To Vote On 'carbon Tax' (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, November 1, 2006

DENVER — Voters in Boulder, Colo., will decide Tuesday whether the city will become the first in the nation to impose a "carbon tax" on homeowners and businesses to fund efforts to reduce emissions that cause global warming.

If approved, the ballot measure would tax electricity usage and add about $16-$20 a year to the average residential electric bill. Businesses would pay an additional $46 a year on average, and industries an extra $3,226, according to Yael Gichon of Boulder's environmental affairs office. The tax could raise $860,000 in the first year.

Gichon and Matt Baker, director of Environment Colorado, a Denver-based environmental group, say that if the measure passes, it will mark the first time a U.S. city has voted in favor of a carbon tax to combat global warming.

The levy is called a carbon tax because most electricity in the USA is produced by burning coal and natural gas, which emit carbon dioxide that contributes to global warming.

Climate Smart, a local group that supports the tax, estimates the average monthly residential electric bill of $63 would increase $1.38, or 2.2%. A medium-size office building would rise $33, or 0.6%.

Boulder, one of the state's most liberal communities, has a long history of environmental activism, such as preserving open space, recycling and encouraging use of public transit. The town of about 92,000 residents is home to the University of Colorado and the National Center for Atmospheric Research. "We have probably more climate scientists living in Boulder than any other city in the world," Mayor Mark Ruzzin says.

The City Council authorized the ballot measure to fund a city plan to reduce greenhouse emissions 7% below 1990 levels. To accomplish that, Boulder would have to cut emissions 24% by 2012. About half of the city's emissions are attributed to burning fossil fuels for electricity.

Four years ago, the city adopted emission targets set by the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement the United States has not ratified, to reduce greenhouse gases such as carbon dioxide.

"There is a strong environmental ethic in Boulder," Ruzzin says. "People are looking to do the right thing, and the climate action plan gets us down that road."

No group has organized in the city to oppose the tax measure, and even the Boulder Chamber of Commerce has endorsed it. Climate Smart expects to spend about $8,000 on yard signs and "a few newspaper ads," volunteer Ken Regelson says.

Gichon says the tax would fund efforts to increase energy efficiency, spur the use of renewable energy such as wind and solar power, and encourage residents to drive less. The tax also would fund city-sponsored energy audits for residences, and educational programs on utility-sponsored rebates for installing energy-efficient appliances, light fixtures and insulation.

Many states have mandated special charges on electric bills to fund energy-efficiency and renewable-energy programs. And some city-owned utilities, including Fort Collins, Colo., have raised rates to pay for renewable-energy programs.

Big Ethanol (WSJ)

By HOLMAN W. JENKINS, JR.

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

There'd likely be no alternative energy proposition on the California ballot if one guy, Stephen Bing, hadn't put up $50 million to place it there.

The media is kind to call Mr. Bing a "movie producer"; his fortune was inherited from his grandfather and his dabbling in the film business has been desultory. His misadventures with starlets and models have proved a more lasting claim to notoriety. In fact, he has little record of sustained commitment to anything, which perhaps explains the economic incoherence of the ballot proposal.

You would never say the same about his most visible ally, Vinod Khosla, a highly reputable Silicon Valley venture capitalist, a founder of Sun Microsystems, and now an avid investor in ethanol ventures. Mr. Khosla says what grabs the public's attention is not "facts" but "stories," and he has lustily lent his voice to telling stories about gouging oil companies, the urgent need for energy independence, and other media-ready tropes useful in selling the proposition to California voters.

Under Prop. 87, as the measure is called, California-produced oil would be taxed to fund alternative energy projects. By making domestic energy more expensive, it would increase, not decrease, the clout of foreign suppliers. But never mind. It also includes an absurd and unenforceable mandate that the cost of the tax not be reflected in the price of gasoline.

Even the reliably middle-of-the-road Los Angeles Times calls the proposition economic quackery. What's really going on here?

Let's begin by noticing that there's been no shortage of capital for alternative energy ventures. By one count, 140 ethanol plants are in the works around the world. Everyone from Goldman Sachs and Warren Buffett to Monsanto and the Carlyle Group has been jumping in.

Nor is there an obvious call for government planners to help investors sort out the winning technologies. Even amid the ethanol frenzy, BP and DuPont are placing a contrarian bet on butanol, another crop-derived fuel, with higher energy content and better compatibility with the gasoline distribution system.

But here's where you should really start paying attention. Virtually everyone agrees an ethanol glut is coming as the new plants come online. This year's boom was sparked by a sudden shift in federal policy and a short-lived gasoline spike. The price of ethanol is expected to fall dramatically.

When he's not stumping for the California initiative, Mr. Khosla has been in Washington proselytizing for a package of subsidies and mandates to prop up the ethanol industry, one of which is a "cheap oil tax" to kick in whenever the price of oil sinks below $40 a barrel. A slide show he gave so enthralled Nancy Pelosi that she had him repeat it for her Democratic colleagues.

One "story" Mr. Khosla enjoys telling at these events is of an oil executive supposedly confiding the industry's plan to push down the price of oil to drive the ethanol industry under. Mr. Khosla is an economic sophisticate. He knows oil's price will go to whatever level is required for the commodity to sell. He also knows that the same technological progress being applied to turn crop material into automotive fuel is also working to turn the world's still-large inventory of stored hydrocarbons into automotive fuel.

The "stone age didn't end for lack of stones," he told TV interviewer Charlie Rose. His stated view, probably well founded, is that gasoline will have no long-term difficulty defending its place in the transportation market on price.

His real concern, to the extent that he has offered a coherent one, is global warming. Now this at least could be the subject of an intelligent debate -- about whether climate concerns justify putting a heavy government finger on the scale to help biofuel investors in their competition with gasoline. But the public would have to be told that part of the plan is higher gas prices.

Voters would then be expected to inquire into the costs and benefits of such a shift. They might notice that U.S. transportation represents just 8% of the world's carbon output. They might notice that even if the whole world joined us on the automotive biofuel bandwagon, this would merely slow, not halt, the buildup of CO_2 in the atmosphere.

And even if the rest of the world could be persuaded to foreswear a commodity as useful as oil, how long would this change take under democratic institutions? Over the relevant period, we might not gain a significantly better understanding of carbon's role in climate change, but we would have witnessed whether the climate has changed. Voters, if they then decided the problem calls for a solution, would certainly wish to spend their bucks on something with greater bang -- say, carbon capture and sequestration, or attacking coal use, or projects to influence the earth's temperature directly.

Mr. Khosla may be right that stories rather than facts are what sway voters, but it leaves open the question of what he really believes. Or maybe it doesn't matter. The California proposition is expected to lose handily, but for his modest contribution (a reported $1 million), Mr. Khosla has reaped an untold bonanza of propaganda for his energy investments.

Already Congress is hurriedly putting together an expansion of the ethanol mandate in last year's energy bill in hopes of soaking up the excess supply stimulated by previous government actions. Earth's atmosphere might not notice the difference, but Mr. Khosla's portfolio certainly will.

Police Arrest Man For Other Blazes As Fifth Ca. Firefighter Dies (AP)

By Andrew Glazer

AP, November 1, 2006

BEAUMONT, Calif. - Authorities on Tuesday arrested a 37-year-old man suspected of igniting two wildfires this summer and who is considered a "person of interest" in the Esperanza blaze, which killed five firefighters.

Word of the arrest came an hour after a somber news conference at which officials announced the death of a horribly burned firefighter who survived five days on life support.

Raymond Lee Oyler of Beaumont was arrested at 3 p.m. on two counts of arson related to wildfires in June, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said in a statement posted on its Web site late Tuesday. Oyler was not named as a suspect in the Esperanza wildfire, which roared across more than 60 square miles last week before being contained Monday.

Four U.S. Forest Service firefighters died shortly after the blaze began Thursday when flames overran them as they tried to protect a home in the San Jacinto Mountains of Riverside County, about 90 miles east of Los Angeles.

Investigators interviewed Oyler on Friday and then searched his home Monday, the sheriff's department said. Federal agents have been assisting in the investigation. A spokesman offered no further details.

Firefighter Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley died at 5:08 p.m. at Arrowhead Regional Medical Center in Colton, after his family decided to take him off life support.

The fifth death made it the greatest loss of firefighters in a single incident while battling a wildfire since 14 were killed in July 1994 during a blaze known as the South Canyon or Storm King Mountain Fire near Glenwood Springs, Colo., according to the National Interagency Fire Center statistics.

"He was a great fighter," said Dr. Dev Gnanadev, who spoke to reporters outside the hospital. "In the end we did talk to the family and gave them an option of taking him to the operating room again for further surgeries knowing his prognosis is very very poor and they decided to let Pablo go."

A group of U.S. Forest Service firefighters attended the evening news conference, with tears in their eyes.

"I felt the faith and hope for Pablo's recovery and actually felt a miracle might be possible," said Jeanne Wade Evans, the San Bernardino National Forest supervisor. "Today more sadness is added to our almost unbearable grief."

Cerda was burned over 90 percent of his body. Three other members of Engine 57 died at the scene, and Cerda's captain died soon after at a hospital.

Cerda was in just his second year of fighting fires for the Forest Service. He had planned to begin studying to become a paramedic.

The other victims were the engine captain, Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; Jason McKay, 27, of Apple Valley; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

"All of us from the forest and all those from the fire service deeply mourn the loss of these brave men. In my mind there's no greater calling than to help those in need," Evans said.

As part of the investigation, authorities said they sifted through hundreds of tips and interviewed previously convicted arsonists who live in the Cabazon area. Assisting in the investigation were the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The reward for information leading to an arrest had topped $500,000.

DOJ_NMG_0089612

The blaze started early Thursday and scorched 40,200 acres, or more than 60 square miles, of forest and brush before being fully contained Monday. It destroyed 34 homes and 20 outbuildings. A portion of Highway 243 in the fire area remained under indefinite closure for repair of the two-lane road.

Firefighting costs reached $9.9 million, the California Department of Forestry said.

Authorities said the fire was deliberately set at the base of a slope in Cabazon, west of Palm Springs, as fierce Santa Ana winds hit Southern California. Residents said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire began.

At the crime scene, investigators had planted blue, red and yellow flags attached to wire stakes in the ground to mark the location of possible evidence. Part of the hillside was marked by a grid made of pegs and string.

A public memorial service for the dead firefighters was scheduled for 1 p.m. Sunday at the Hyundai Pavilion in Devore. Individual firefighter funerals will be private, officials said.

Fifth Firefighter Dies Of Burns (LAT)

By Maeve Reston, Sara Lin And Jonathan Abrams, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

Pablo Cerda was the last of the crew overrun in the Esperanza fire. A Beaumont man is held as 'a person of interest.'

Hours after firefighter Pablo Cerda on Tuesday became the fifth and final member of a U.S. Forest Service crew to die after they were overrun by an out-of-control wildfire near Palm Springs, authorities said they arrested a suspect in connection with previous blazes in the San Gorgonio Pass area, and named him a "person of interest" in last week's deadly fire.

Cerda, 23, fought to survive for six days at Arrowhead Regional Medical Center in Colton before succumbing at 5:08 p.m. to burns over 90% of his body. He lived in Fountain Valley, where he cared for his father, and was in his second season with the Forest Service.

"Today more sadness is added to our almost unbearable grief in the hearts of the Forest Service and all the fire service community," Jeanne Wade-Evans, San Bernardino National Forest supervisor, said Tuesday night.

Investigators continued working with more than 300 tips called in to an arson hotline since the fire began early Thursday.

Authorities said they had questioned several people about the cause of the deadly Riverside County wildfire, known as the Esperanza fire, and that they had identified at least "two persons of interest."

Authorities disclosed the name of only one: Raymond Lee Oyler, 37, a Beaumont resident, who was arrested at 3 p.m. Tuesday by the Riverside County Sheriff's Department on two counts of arson in connection with wildfires in June in the San Gorgonio Pass area.

In a terse news release issued Tuesday night, sheriff's officials said they interviewed Oyler on Friday and served a search warrant on his home Monday.

A sheriff's spokesman said no other information would be released Tuesday.

Although authorities didn't indicate which fires Oyler was charged with setting, Riverside and San Bernardino counties were hit with a rash of more than 40 small, suspicious fires in May and the first half of June. One such fire in mid-June broke out in Cabazon, burning 10 acres near the intersection of Esperanza Avenue and Broadway, not far from the Esperanza blaze.

Oyler could not be reached for comment.

The current, wind-fed Esperanza wildfire raced through the dry foothills, killing five firefighters and charring more than 40,000 acres at the base of the San Jacinto Mountains before being contained Monday. The blaze destroyed 34 homes.

A Cabazon man who lives a quarter-mile from where the fire began told The Times on Tuesday that authorities had questioned him, but that he was "100% innocent."

William "Billy" Hutson, 28, said that during questioning Monday, investigators accused him of setting the fire. Police also have searched his home, confiscating his computer, he said.

Hutson served jail time in Texas for a 1998 arson conviction for burning a neighbor's mobile home, according to records from the Texas Department of Public Safety and a spokesman for the Vidor, Texas, Police Department.

"I was young and stupid," Hutson said in an interview at a restaurant near his house. "I was a kid. I was young. Every kid likes to see the fire. I messed up — yeah — and I've paid my debt to society."

The night the Esperanza fire began, Hutson said, he was with friends at his house and then went for a drive before dropping off a friend in Banning.

The fire was already racing up the mountainside as the group drove home on the freeway, Hutson said.

Hutson said he failed several polygraph tests administered by federal agents during questioning Monday. He said he had become nervous thinking about his criminal record, and has volunteered to take another test.

"When I get worked up, it's real hard," he said. "I get real shaky."

DOJ_NMG_0089613

On Tuesday, television news crews camped outside Hutson's modest pink house in Cabazon, and he said his family from Texas called to say they had seen him on national television.

More than 50 investigators from the Sheriff's Department, California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, U.S. Forest Service and Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives are working on the case.

Those include two BATF profilers and a polygraph examiner, said bureau spokeswoman Susan Rachel.

Sheriff's spokesman Sgt. Earl Quinata emphasized that no arrests had been made for the Esperanza fire, and that the investigation was ongoing.

Veteran arson investigator Brad Hamil called arson "about the hardest crime there is to crack in a whole system of crimes."

"It's against the law to carry, say, tools that would be used in a burglary. But it certainly isn't against the law to carry a cigarette lighter or a box of matches," said Hamil, who investigated arson fires for 25 years for the San Bernardino City Fire Department and is not involved in the Esperanza fire case.

What might give investigators an edge on the Esperanza fire is the $550,000 reward being offered for information leading to an arrest and conviction, he said.

"Money really makes the difference," Hamil said. "If anybody thinks their brother did it, you're going to get a call. Everybody's fishing."

Along with Cerda, the U.S. Forest Service firefighters killed in the blaze were Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, the team's captain; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

Cerda realized he wanted to be a firefighter while a student at Los Amigos High School in Fountain Valley, teachers and neighbors said last week. After graduating from high school, Cerda attended the Riverside Community College Fire Academy.

Dev Gnadeve, medical director and chief of surgery for the Arrowhead Regional Medical Center, said the family declined to have additional surgery performed on Cerda, who had been on life support since he suffered the burns Thursday.

They were by Cerda's bedside when he died, Gnadeve said.

"He was a great fighter," Gnadeve said. "But even if Pablo had a very small chance of making it, we weren't sure of what kind of quality of life he was going to have."

Seven Forest Service firefighters stood in front of a lime green firetruck outside the medical center with their eyes glistening and hands crossed as the death was announced.

"It doesn't matter what station you worked in," said firefighter Travis Thogmartin, 28. "At Forest Service, we are all brothers."

A public memorial service for the fallen firefighters is scheduled for 1 p.m. Sunday at the Hyundai Pavilion in Devore.

Fire officials will hold a community meeting with fire victims from Twin Pines and Poppet Flats near Banning today to provide information on county, state and federal relief efforts. The meeting begins at 7 p.m. at the Silent Valley Club, 48305 Poppet Flats Road.

Police Charge 17 As Gang Members (MJS)

By Gina Barton

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 1, 2006

15 in custody; 200 officers help in raid

Seventeen people affiliated with a gang that authorities say has been distributing cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana on Milwaukee's north side for about 15 years have been charged with conspiracy and other drug offenses in federal court in Milwaukee, according to an indictment made public Tuesday.

Ten members of the gang, known as the First and Keefe Vice Lords, were arrested in early morning raids Tuesday, according to the FBI. Two hundred law enforcement officers from the FBI, Milwaukee Police Department, state Department of Justice and other state and local agencies rounded up the defendants in the culmination of a two-year investigation, said Linda Krieg, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Milwaukee office.

Swat teams from the FBI's Milwaukee and Chicago offices both were involved in the arrests because the suspects were considered armed and dangerous, Krieg said. The 10 arrests were made without incident, she said.

Five other defendants already were in state custody Tuesday, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Two remained at large Tuesday evening.

The First and Keefe Vice Lords formed in the late 1980s and early 1990s, and the gang consists of members who had moved to Milwaukee from Chicago, authorities said. The group has two subsets, known as the SOC Vice Lords and the MOB Vice Lords.

The indictment charges 15 people with conspiring to distribute at least 5 kilograms of powder cocaine and at least 50 grams of crack cocaine, as well as marijuana.

The conspiracy count carries a mandatory minimum penalty of 10 years and a maximum penalty of life. The indictment also charges the individuals named in the conspiracy with individual drug trafficking counts, which carry prison terms of five years to life.

The two others are charged with operating a drug house at their residence in the 6400 block of N. 42nd St., which could yield them up to 20 years in prison.

The government also is seeking forfeiture of a shotgun, a rifle and $31,225 in cash seized from the home.

The investigation was the result of a local, state and federal task force that has been operating in the city over the past several years, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Over the past four years, similar charges have been leveled against the Latin Kings, Cherry Street Mob, Laotian Crips, 2-4s and 2-6s, as well as a different subset of Vice Lords.

In May 2005, authorities arrested 21 people charged as being part of the 2-6 Vice Lords, and seized more than $400,000 in cash and almost 10 pounds of crack cocaine.

"It's all part of our joint plan to find the most dangerous criminals and put them behind bars," said Milwaukee Mayor Tom Barrett. "This sends a strong message that if you're dealing in these drugs, we're coming after you."

Pot Sale Penalty Protest Grows (SLT)

Former top Justice Department officials and several judges have asked the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the appeal of a Utah man sentenced to serve 55 years in prison for selling pot - a sentence decried by a judge who said the law forced his hand.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver in January rejected an argument that the sentence handed down to record producer Weldon Angelos was cruel and unusual punishment that was disproportionate to his crime.

But a friend of the court brief filed with the high court by 145 people -including former U.S. Attorneys General Griffin Bell, Benjamin Civiletti, Nicholas Katzenbach and Janet Reno; other former high ranking Justice Department officials and former federal judges - urges the high court to take the case.

Angelos, 26, the founder of Extravagant Records, was accused of selling 8 ounces of marijuana to a police informant three times in May and June 2002. At one sale, he had a gun strapped to his ankle, according to court records. At the other drug buys, there were firearms in the vicinity.

A federal grand jury originally indicted Angelos in November 2002 on one gun possession count, three counts of marijuana distribution and two lesser charges. After Angelos rejected a plea bargain that would have sent him to prison for 16 years, authorities obtained a new indictment with 20 charges.

When Angelos asked to reopen negotiations, prosecutors said it was too late. In December 2001, a jury convicted him of 16 counts.

U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell reluctantly sentenced Angelos to a mandatory 55 years in prison, five years for the first gun-possession conviction and 25 years each for the next two, to be served one after the other. For 13 drug and money laundering counts, the judge imposed one additional day behind bars. Cassell said the prison term was "unjust and cruel and even irrational."

So did defense attorneys, who appealed and gained the support of many in the legal field who say the sentence was excessive. However, the U.S. Attorney's Office stuck to its contention that Angelos is the kind of offender Congress had in mind when it enacted tough penalties for criminals who carry a firearm while committing a felony.

Man Gets 20 Years In Federal Prison (FREDNP)

Frederick News Post, November 1, 2006

Sentence for 2005 arrest on drug, firearm charges

GREENBELT -- A Frederick man caught in an undercover operation headed by the Drug Enforcement Administration was sentenced Monday to 20 years in federal prison, according to U.S. Attorney for Maryland Rod J. Rosenstein.

Winfred Gregg Travis' sentence stems from his conviction for distributing crack cocaine and possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, Mr. Rosenstein stated in a news release. Travis, 37, pleaded guilty June 15 in U.S. District Court.

DOJ_NMG_0089615

Early in the investigation, DEA agents watched as a person working with law enforcement agents obtained 133 grams of crack from Travis on Nov. 9, 2005, the U.S. attorney said.

More than two months later, on Jan. 18, Montgomery County Police stopped Travis for a traffic violation and found 492 grams of cocaine in his vehicle.

The day of the traffic stop, DEA agents asked Frederick County law enforcement to obtain a search warrant for Travis' residence, said Frederick County Deputy State's Attorney Charlie Smith.

Later that day, Frederick County narcotics officers searched Travis' residence and seized 148 grams of crack, a gram of marijuana, $19,269, a Llama Max .45-caliber handgun, a box of Winchester .45-caliber bullets and drug paraphernalia, Mr. Rosenstein said.

The DEA asked county law enforcement to file local charges to hold him until he could be indicted federally, Mr. Smith said.

"It was definitely a cooperative effort," he said.

U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow gave Travis a tough sentence after finding that he has a lengthy criminal history, Mr. Rosenstein said.

Since 1991, Travis has been charged in Frederick and Montgomery counties 10 times, primarily with drug crimes, but also with breaking and entering, battery and disorderly conduct, according to court records.

After his release from prison, Travis will serve 10 years of supervised release. He was ordered to forfeit the $19,269 found during the search and the Llama Max.

Mr. Rosenstein thanked the DEA, the Montgomery County Police and narcotics officers from Frederick County who participated in the investigation.

Eighth Member Of Drug Ring Is Sentenced (MAUIN)

Maui News, November 1, 2006

HONOLULU – The eighth member of a methamphetamine trafficking ring was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Court Judge J. Michael Seabright to nearly 24 years in prison, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Leandro Gomez III, 30, of Las Vegas, was one of 10 defendants to plead guilty to charges of taking part in a large-scale organization that imported methamphetamine from Las Vegas to Maui.

"Gomez was the Las Vegas supplier of the methamphetamine, which was transported to Maui either by couriers or mail shipment," a Justice Department news release says.

In Las Vegas, he had been assisted by co-defendants Timothy James Sullivan and Gilbert Gomez Jr., federal officials said. And, on Maui, "Nathaniel Russell and Pamela Mahealani Newton (husband and wife) oversaw an extensive distribution network involving co-defendants John Corniel Jr., Charles R.K. Farren, Roger Manu Bates, Cyrinah L. Aken and Reed Kaleookalani Aken."

The investigation of the drug ring resulted in the recovery of 616.8 grams (1.4 pounds) of methamphetamine from Bates in early May 2005 on Maui, according to Justice Department officials.

"Other information produced in connection with the case reflected that the Maui group was purchasing up to 7 pounds of methamphetamine from Gomez in late May 2005," the news release says. "Law enforcement officers intercepted approximately 921.1 grams (2 pounds) of methamphetamine discovered on Reed Aken's person at Los Angeles International Airport in late May 2005, and 1,809 grams (4 pounds) of methamphetamine in a parcel Gomez sent to Maui in early June 2005."

So far, seven other defendants have been sentenced to between 48 and 198 months in prison for their participation in the drug ring. Their sentences were: Bates, 34, 198 months in prison; Corniel, 42, 168 months; Farren, 38, 126 months; Gilbert Gomez, 37, 96 months; Cyrinah Aken, 38, 87 months; Sullivan, 35, 82 months; and Reed Aken, 37, 48 months.

Russell and Newton are scheduled for sentencing Nov. 20 and Jan. 8, respectively.

'Ice' Supplier Gets Prison Term (HSB)

By Leila Fujimori

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, November 1, 2006

The 30-year-old Las Vegas supplier of a large-scale trafficking organization bringing "ice" to Maui in 2005 was sentenced in federal court yesterday to 23 years and eight months in prison.

U.S. District Judge J. Michael Seabright sentenced Leandro Gomez III, who pleaded guilty to methamphetamine-trafficking charges along with nine others.

Gomez supplied multi-pound amounts of methamphetamine to Maui carried by couriers or shipped by mail from Las Vegas, the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a news release.

DOJ_NMG_0089616

"For Maui Police Department, it was rather a significant case, and they devoted a lot of resources to it," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Kawahara, who prosecuted the case.

Kawahara said efforts by Maui police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and other law enforcement agencies in this and other cases have "stemmed the flow of drugs to Hawaii," and the prosecution of these kinds of cases serves as a deterrence.

He said that strenuous law enforcement efforts have done much to curb the supply of methamphetamine to Hawaii.

Nathaniel "Bobo" Russell and his wife, Pamela Mahelani Russell, oversaw the Maui distribution network, and will be the last of the 10 to be sentenced Nov. 20 and Jan. 8, respectively.

Others previously sentenced include former Maui police officer Reed Kaleookalani Aken Sr., 37. He served as a courier for the money to Las Vegas and drugs to Maui and was sentenced to four years.

Also on the Maui end of the drug ring and their sentences are: John Corniel Jr., 42, 14 years; Charles R.K. Farren, 38, 10 1/2 years; Roger Manu Bates, 34, 16 1/2 years; and Cyrinah L. Aken, 38, 7 1/4 years.

Those who assisted Gomez in Las Vegas were Timothy James Sullivan, 37, who received six years, 10 months, and Gilbert Gomez Jr., 37, eight years.

Law enforcement agents recovered in early May 2005 1.4 pounds of ice from Bates on Maui, intercepted 2 pounds of the drug on Reed Aken at Los Angeles International Airport in late May and 4 pounds of meth sent by Gomez to Maui in June 2005. The investigation revealed the Maui group was buying up to seven pounds of methamphetamine from Gomez in late May 2005.

U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo commended the "superlative joint investigation" conducted by DEA and Maui police assisted by Los Angeles International Airport narcotics agents.

Vegas Man Gets 23 Years For Role In Maui Ice Ring (HONADV)

Honolulu Advertiser, November 1, 2006

A 30-year-old Las Vegas man was sentenced to 23 2/3 years in federal prison yesterday for his part in a methamphetamine conspiracy that delivered ice from Nevada to Maui.

Leandro Gomez III, who pleaded guilty to ice-trafficking charges, was described by federal authorities as the supplier who sold up to seven pounds of the drug to Maui defendants in May last year.

U.S. District Judge Michael Seabright sentenced Gomez to 284 months in prison.

Federal prosecutors called the drug ring a "large-scale organization" which shipped multipound quantities of ice by mail or by couriers to Maui.

The case against Gomez and nine others involved cell-phone taps, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Kawahara.

The 10 include two other Las Vegas residents and seven Maui residents. All 10 have pleaded guilty to ice-trafficking counts. All but two have been sentenced, according to federal prosecutors.

Gomez has been given the stiffest sentence so far. The other seven received terms ranging from four years to 16 1/2 years. Among them is Reed Kaleookalani Aken Sr., 37, a former Maui police officer who prosecutors say left the force before his involvement in the drug ring. Aken received a four-year term.

Drug Supplier Gets Help In Appeal (GRPRESS)

By John Agar, The Grand Rapids Press

Grand Rapids Press (MI), November 1, 2006

GRANDVILLE -- A federal appeals court ruling could shorten the 25-year prison term for a man who provided heroin to a friend and failed to call 911 as she was dying in his Grandville home.

Kevin Obi, 23, pleaded guilty to providing heroin that killed Nora Lares, 21, in 2004.

At Obi's sentencing last year, U.S. District Judge Richard Enslen ruled Obi's lies to investigators soon after her death constituted obstruction of justice, and thus, increased the possible sentence.

But the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals said recently the prosecution failed to show Obi's false statements significantly hurt the investigation. The court ordered the case returned to U.S. District Court for resentencing.

Without the obstruction of justice enhancement, Obi, who received 300 months, would have faced 210 to 262 months.

Gina Lares, the victim's mother, is disgusted with a move that could end in an earlier release for the man she considers her daughter's killer.

"The guy is sick, and he is a criminal," Lares said. "It's very frustrating that Nora is dead and she has no rights and no voice, yet he can do whatever he wants."

DOJ_NMG_0089617

Obi and his friend, Terry Ensing, went to a bar on Sept. 3, 2004, to meet Nora Lares and her friend. After the bar closed, they went to Obi's basement, where Obi, Ensing and Lares snorted heroin, while Lares' friend passed out. A little later, Obi told his friend that Lares stopped breathing, but she seemed to be snoring.

Ensing then told Obi that she was not breathing, court records showed. They took her to a closed medical center. Obi then called 911.

The prosecution says Obi tampered with evidence on the victim's body and told police they had not used drugs.

Police then went to his house and revived the young woman who had passed out. They conducted a "cursory" search of the house but found no evidence of drugs. Four days later, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officers used a search warrant to again look through the house, but Obi's mother had "thoroughly cleaned the residence, discarding the bedding and trash," records said.

She told police her son's grief counselor recommended she clean the basement. Police said they found hidden heroin-related paraphernalia.

The government argued Obi's false statements led police to initially consider the crime scene to be the vehicle, rather than his basement, which resulted in a loss of possible evidence. But, the court noted, Obi told police that Lares' friend was still at his house, and police went there.

The appeals court said it was only speculation that police could have found additional evidence at Obi's house if they were immediately aware it was the crime scene.

Ensing is serving three years in prison for his role in Lares' death.

Merriman Drops Appeal Of 4-Game Suspension (NYT)

By Michael S. Schmidt

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman yesterday dropped his appeal of a four-game suspension for violating the National Football League's policy on banned substances, and he blamed his positive drug test on a supplement he took before the season to boost his energy for workouts.

Merriman said his lawyer, David Cornwell, was considering legal action against the supplement maker because its product contained a precursor to the steroid nandrolone. Dietary supplement makers are prohibited from including nandrolone's precursors in their products.

The N.F.L. has certified several dietary supplements that it said would not result in a positive drug test. Merriman said he was not taking one of those supplements, adding that he believed more then 75 percent of the players were taking supplements that were not certified by the N.F.L.

Merriman said he took the supplement to increase his energy so he could work out at least two times a day before the preseason started. He refused to name the supplement, saying it might hurt his complaint against the manufacturer.

"It's a brutal sport, but a lot of guys need to maximize our workouts," Merriman said in a telephone interview.

Merriman said he had taken the supplement since he entered the league last season, when he was the N.F.L.'s defensive rookie of the year, and he had no problems with it. He estimated that he was tested seven or eight times before and during the season. He said he stopped taking the supplement this summer just before the preseason began.

On Aug. 2, a few days into training camp, Merriman took his first drug test this season. He said he learned about Sept. 12 that the result was positive. Merriman said he had taken three tests since the Aug. 2 test and all three came back negative.

He said nothing on the supplement's list of ingredients indicated that it contained a steroid. Merriman said he stopped using all six of the vitamins and supplements he was taking as soon as he found out about the positive test.

"My health is more important than missing four games," he said.

Merriman said the supplement was shipped to him at the end of last season, but he did not use it until he began to get into shape for this season.

He added: "I have taken full responsibility for what happened to me and what has gone on. I came up clean plenty of times before and gained confidence in the supplement, and then all of a sudden it popped up that I was doing something wrong."

Although Merriman dropped his appeal, the league allowed him to visit the team's practice facility today, because he wanted to address his teammates before the suspension began. Players are normally barred from team facilities for the entire time of their suspensions.

"The league has given me an exception and I really appreciate that," Merriman said. The Chargers (5-2) are tied with the Denver Broncos for first place in the American Football Conference West.

On Sunday, Merriman tied a career high with three sacks as the Chargers defeated the St. Louis Rams, 38-24. He is tied for the league lead in sacks with 8½.

DOJ_NMG_0089618

Merriman will be able to return to practice on Nov. 27 and would be available to play against the Buffalo Bills on Dec. 3 and the Broncos on Dec. 10.

Merriman Decides To Drop Suspension Appeal (SDUT)

By By Kevin Acee, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 31, 2006

Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman had been leaning toward this decision for days, weighing the likelihood he could win a reversal of his suspension versus the desire to clear his name along with the question of what would be best for his team.

The NFL's co-sack leader will miss four games for violating the league's drug policy, another blow to a defense that has had its share of challenges – the Steve Foley shooting, injuries – all season.

PHILIP RIVERS

The first-year starter at quarterback has matured quickly, allowing the offense to develop.

REINFORCEMENTS

Igor Olshansky: The defensive end, who has missed much of the season with knee problems, expects to play against Cleveland on Sunday.

Shaun Phillips: The linebacker, who missed the last game with a strained calf, is about 80 percent healthy and hopes to play Sunday.

In the end, he decided Tuesday to drop the appeal of his four-game suspension for a positive drug test.

The NFL's leader in sacks with 8½, Merriman will not play Sunday against Cleveland, Nov. 12 at Cincinnati, Nov. 19 at Denver or Nov. 26 against Oakland. His first game back will be Dec. 3 at Buffalo.

"My whole life has been made of speed bumps," Merriman said. "People have always told me if you want to be great at something you're going to have to endure more than anybody else.

"It really digs deep inside. It really hurts. This is what I love to do. This is a part of me. This will be the first time I've missed any game in any sport in my whole life – ever. It really saddens me."

Merriman tested positive Aug. 2 for the banned steroid nandrolone. He maintains he was the victim of a tainted supplement, but he knew he was unlikely to win his appeal based on the NFL's clearly stated policy that players are responsible for what they put in their body.

Merriman's appeal was scheduled to be heard Nov. 7, two days after the Cleveland game.

Merriman will forfeit almost $73,000 of his $310,000 salary during the four weeks he is gone. During that time, he will not be allowed at the Chargers' facility or to be on the sideline during games.

Merriman had to decide by today whether to drop the appeal or go ahead with the Nov. 7 hearing. He was able to work out a deal with the NFL that will allow him to address his teammates Wednesday before he is banned from the team's facilities for the remainder of the four weeks.

Advertisement

"I know my responsibilities and how much I mean to the team," he said. "It's important to me to talk to them."

Merriman was confident his teammates would step up in his absence.

"Look at how (Steve) Foley went down and Shaun Phillips stepped up," he said. "Shaun Phillips went down, and we still got it done. That's what I'm going to say to the guys.

"This is a big stumbling block for myself and for the team. But we're going to win games. I'm mad I can't be there. But we're not the Shawne Merriman Chargers."

Merriman Drops Appeal, Will Miss 4 Games (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman dropped his appeal of his four-game suspension imposed by the league for a positive test under the NFL's steroid-testing program.

Merriman, who's tied for the NFL lead with 8 1/2 sacks, is scheduled to begin serving his suspension immediately and will miss the Chargers' next four games, beginning Sunday against the Cleveland Browns.

The appeal was to have been heard Nov. 7, and Merriman had been eligible to play in the meantime.

Merriman's attorney, David Cornwell, has said that Merriman likely tested positive for the banned substance nandrolone that was contained in a supplement that Merriman was taking. But under the league's policy, a player is responsible for what's in his body even if he unwittingly takes a banned substance contained in a supplement. The NFL Players Association has a program to test supplements and clear those that don't contain banned substances, but a player's participation in that program is voluntary.Simms to Injured Reserve?

The Tampa Bay Buccaneers could place quarterback Chris Simms on the injured reserve list soon, a move that would end his season. Simms and the Buccaneers did not rule out the possibility of him playing again this season after he underwent emergency surgery last month to have his spleen removed.

But all of the involved parties acknowledged from the outset there was a good chance that Simms's season was over, and the Buccaneers soon might need a roster spot to activate quarterback Luke McCown. He's on the physically unable to perform list after undergoing surgery for a torn knee ligament suffered during an offseason minicamp. . . .

The New York Jets have delayed a decision until next week about whether to allow tailback Curtis Martin to begin practicing. If Martin, who has an ailing knee and currently is on the physically unable to perform list, does not practice next week, the Jets must place him on the injured reserve list, ending his season. Martin has said he'd like to play again but doesn't know if that will be possible. The Newark Star-Ledger reported yesterday that Martin won't play this season and likely will retire, but Coach Eric Mangini told reporters that no decisions on Martin's playing status had been made.

Merriman Begins Suspension (SEATIMES)

The Seattle Times, November 1, 2006

SAN DIEGO — The San Diego Chargers must play their next four games without outside linebacker Shawne Merriman, one of the league's top young players.

Merriman, 22, decided Tuesday not to appeal his suspension for testing positive for steroids.

Merriman's suspension is another blow to one of the league's toughest defenses, which has been hit by injuries and off-field trouble since before the season started. Nicknamed "Lights Out" because of his punishing hits, Merriman will be shut down for games at home against Cleveland, at Cincinnati, at Denver and at home against Oakland.

Merriman, who is tied for the league lead with 8 ½ sacks, and his attorney have blamed a tainted supplement for the player's positive test for the steroid nandrolone.

The suspension won't officially begin until after Merriman addresses teammates today. After that, he will be barred from the team's headquarters until he is eligible to return Nov. 27.

The Chargers vowed to press on without Merriman, a Pro Bowl starter.

"He's upset because he let his team down, but we're OK," outside linebacker Shaun Phillips said. "We're behind him 100 percent. We know he's not that kind of guy, that he wouldn't do anything to boost his performance."

Phillips moved into the starting lineup after Steve Foley was shot by an off-duty police officer on Sept. 3. Phillips missed Sunday's 38-24 win over St. Louis with a calf injury and has a 50 percent chance of playing Sunday.

Had Merriman gone through with the appeal and lost, there was the chance he would miss both games against Denver, which is tied with San Diego atop the AFC West at 5-2.

Notes

· Pittsburgh running back Verron Haynes and linebacker Arnold Harrison were placed on injured reserve with torn knee ligaments and are done for the season.

· New Orleans quarterback Drew Brees told his mother he wants her to stop using his picture in TV commercials touting her candidacy for a Texas appeals court. In commercials running on Austin stations, Mina Brees had been using a picture of her son in the uniform of his former team, the Chargers, to emphasize her ties to football.

"I think the major point here is that my mother is using me in a campaign, and I've made it known many times I don't want to be involved," Brees said.

Mina Brees, an Austin attorney, is running as a Democrat for a spot on Texas' 3rd Court of Appeals. Drew Brees said his agent sent Mina Brees a letter Oct. 20 threatening legal action. Brees called his relationship with his mother "nonexistent" after it crumbled about six years ago when he declined to hire her as his agent.

· Will Peterson, 27, has a new team and a new name. The former cornerback for the New York Giants signed a one-year contract with Philadelphia. He also dropped his last name, and is going by William James.

· San Francisco signed cornerback Donald Strickland, 25, with hopes the fourth-year cornerback will strengthen a secondary that has struggled. He was released by Philadelphia before the start of the season.

· The New York Jets insist Curtis Martin, 33, has not yet decided to end his season, despite a published report the league's No. 4 career rusher has told members of the team he won't return this year.

"There has been no decision," coach Eric Mangini said when addressing the story in The Star-Ledger of Newark, N.J.

Spain Nabs Major Drug Trafficker (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0089620

By The Associated Press
The New York Times, November 1, 2006
Filed at 8:45 p.m. ET

MADRID, Spain (AP) -- Spanish police said Tuesday they arrested a leading member of one of Colombia's most feared drug-trafficking cartels.

Orlando Sabogal Zuluaga, 40, was arrested last Thursday in a shopping center on the outskirts of Madrid, the Civil Guard police force said in a statement posted on the Interior Ministry's Web site.

Police said Sabogal Zuluaga was a right-hand man to the former head of the Norte del Valle cartel, Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamente, who himself was captured in Cuba in 2004.

The Civil Guard statement said the group was blamed for hundreds of killings in Colombia and suspected of controlling much of the world's cocaine trafficking.

Spanish police began searching for Sabogal following a request from the U.S. embassy in Spain. The Norte del Valle cartel is suspected of having shipped 500 tons of cocaine into the United States during the past decade, police said.

Sabogal, who was traveling using a fake Venezuelan passport, is wanted for his suspected role in several killings, narcotics trafficking and money laundering, the statement said. U.S. authorities had offered compensation of $5 million for information leading to his arrest, it added.

According to Colombian anti-narcotics police, Sabogal is wanted for extradition to the U.S. to face charges of drug-trafficking and money-laundering.

Ad Campaign Accuses European Coke Snorters Of Funding Colombia's Civil War (SDUT/AP)

By Joshua Goodman, Associated Press
The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 1, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia – Colombia's vice president is taking a hard-hitting anti-drug message to Europe, complaining about cocaine-snorting celebrities who he says are financing the drug-fueled civil conflict bleeding this South American nation.

Vice President Francisco Santos spoke of supermodel Kate Moss, although she doesn't appear in the ads that he planned to unveil Wednesday in London along with 13 European anti-drug czars.

Santos called Moss a perfect example of liberal European attitudes toward drug use because she is enjoying a career comeback after a British tabloid last year published photos of her apparently snorting cocaine.

“To me its baffling that somebody who helps cause so much pain in Colombia is doing better than ever and winning more contracts than ever,” the vice president told The Associated Press.

Moss's modeling agency in London, Storm, did not return a phone call and e-mail seeking comment about the comments.

Moss lost contracts after the photos were published, but her career resumed after she spent time at a clinic in Arizona. She apologized to “all the people I have let down” over the incident, but was never charged with any drug offense.

“Cocaine not only destroys you, it also destroys a country” is the theme of the advertising campaign designed to change attitudes among Europeans about their booming cocaine habit in the same way that “Just Say No” did in the United States.

Santos spoke of what cocaine consumption does to Colombia, where drug-financed armed groups murder hundreds of people each year and force thousands to abandon their homes. Gangs, rebel groups and right-wing militias all traffic in the drug.

“We need to tell Europeans that that line of coke they snort is tainted in blood,” Santos said.

One ad in the “cocaine curse” campaign depicts a pinstriped “coke head” – with an oversized nose – laying land mines in a coca field. Colombia now ranks first in the world in land-mine casualties, averaging four a day.

Colombia, the world's largest producer of cocaine, hopes European governments will fund placement of the ads on billboards, television and even bathrooms of trendy dance clubs

It has also launched an English-language Web site, www.sharedresponsibility.gov.co, to highlight its efforts in the U.S.-sponsored war on drugs, including aerial eradication of more than 1.5 million acres of coca, the base ingredient of cocaine, since 2002.

Colombia is also seeking more European aid for projects to help peasant farmers switch from coca to legal crops like tropical fruits, coffee and rubber.

According to the European Monitoring Center for Drugs and Drug Addiction, cocaine use among young adults in Spain and Britain has doubled over the past decade, reaching levels similar to those in the United States, where 5 percent of people have reported recent usage.

The center, based in Lisbon, Portugal, says surveys in Denmark, Italy, Hungary, the Netherlands and Austria also show a rise in cocaine use among young adults.

DOJ_NMG_0089621

Santos noted findings by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy that cocaine consumption has declined 50 percent in the United States over the past two decades.

Op-Ed: NRA Won't Take Fall For Violent Crime (AJC)

By Bob Barr

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 1, 2006

Atlanta suffers from a rate of violent crime about four times the national average; murders take place in the city at a rate about five times the nation's average. The reasons Atlanta's crime statistics remain stubbornly high are many and persistent, but criminologists and law enforcement experts know that none of them is the fault of the National Rifle Association.

Yet last week, Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington was at the National Press Club in Washington offering sound bites and photo ops with the anti-gun lobby organization, the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence, blaming the city's sorry crime statistics on the NRA.

Taking potshots at the NRA has become a time-worn practice of big city mayors such as New York's Michael Bloomberg. While one expects liberal politicians in northeastern cities to curry favor by leveling broadsides at the NRA, it is surprising to find their ranks joined by a police chief from Atlanta, the capital of a state with a long and positive relationship with the NRA.

In fact, just a month ago Gov. Sonny Perdue proudly received NRA's endorsement. Officeholders and aspirants across Georgia's 159 counties eagerly vie for NRA's endorsement every election cycle. In a state with significant numbers of hunters and sports shooters — a state that boasts innumerable law enforcement officers who have benefited directly from NRA-sponsored firearms training — why has Atlanta's police chief jumped in bed with the national anti-gun lobby?

Politics and political agendas are always difficult to discern, and I don't pretend to know those that motivate Pennington. I also know that, despite Atlanta's less-than-stellar crime statistics, Pennington has, since being appointed in July 2002, made real strides redirecting police resources to areas in the city to increase their impact.

Whatever his motives for taking up with the national anti-firearms lobby, the material Pennington's new-found friends at the Brady Center are pushing is simply political pap of the sort the center has been espousing every election cycle for more than a decade.

For example, the Brady Center blasts the NRA for supporting legislation pending before the Congress that would reform the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and strengthen privacy protections for individuals' firearms purchase records.

The Brady Center and its cheerleaders mischaracterize these pending legislative efforts as "tying the hands" of the ATF and other law enforcement agencies, but the actual terms of the legislation show otherwise. The ATF reform bill modernizes the agency's ability to address infractions of the myriad federal firearms regulations governing firearms retailers. To be sure, the legislation contains measures to guard against regulatory abuses by ATF such as were detailed in a public congressional hearing earlier this year. However, it also aims to more effectively focus and prioritize the agency's efforts against true violations of firearms, explosives and arson laws.

While Pennington has bought into the Brady Center's resistance to ATF reform and blames the NRA for violent crime in Atlanta, a significant majority of Georgia's congressional delegation — including Democrats John Barrow, Sanford Bishop and Jim Marshall — voted "aye" (along with 274 others) on the legislation. It defies reason to conclude, as Pennington apparently has, that all these Democrats and Republicans are conspiring against him and coddling violent offenders.

Another part of the firearms legislative package backed by the NRA and with which Pennington takes umbrage would strengthen protections against improper release of citizens' firearms purchase records. Important, but contrary to the Brady Center's rhetoric, the legislation still allows full access by law enforcement to obtain firearms records for any legitimate investigations. This bill, too, enjoys broad bipartisan support, including among the Georgia delegation.

Of course, those echoing the Brady Center's anti-NRA diatribe have little to offer the debate other than boilerplate sound bites, when confronted with hard statistics, such as those released in September by the FBI, showing the nation's violent crime rate in 2005 — despite an uptick for the year — was nearly 40 percent below that in 1991 when it hit an all-time high, even as the number of privately owned firearms during that period increased significantly.

Thus, while the evidence clearly shows that broader civilian ownership of firearms translates into less, not more, violent crime in America, and even as members of Congress of both political parties support efforts to reform and streamline federal firearms regulatory efforts, the anti-firearms crowd that apparently now includes Atlanta's police chief prefers hollow rhetoric to cooperative action.

Los Angeles ATF Agents Measure — And Get — Results (FEDTIMES)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, November 1, 2006

Defendants referred for prosecution — up 23 percent over the previous year.

Convictions — also up 23 percent.

Gang cases referred for prosecution — up 86 percent.John Torres, special agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' Los Angeles field division, said these numbers, a comparison between fiscal 2005 and fiscal 2006, are proof positive that its performance measurement process is working. COMPSTAT, short for comparative statistics, is a public event where arrest, conviction and other statistics are reviewed and dissected. Officials in charge are held accountable for meeting goals and the numbers help determine where funds are allocated.

"We saw that the system works and if we're paying attention to where we're dedicating our resources we're going to have an impact on violent crime," Torres said. "That's the bottom line."

COMPSTAT began in the 1990s in New York City where the police department would hold regular meetings to set goals for law enforcement and publicly hold officers accountable for their results. Torres began holding COMPSTAT meetings for the Los Angeles ATF on a quarterly basis in October 2005.

The most recent COMPSTAT was held Oct. 24. The event is open to the public and often attended by representatives from other law enforcement agencies. Agents are asked to report their statistics. Depending on how these numbers match goals from the previous COMPSTAT, they're asked on the spot to explain what went wrong or what went right.

"We're not out for, 'gotcha,' " Torres said. "It's for people to share their success stories. We want people to talk to each other. It's a good tool to encourage communication."

Torres said his interest in COMPSTAT has its roots in the administration's overall push to measure results governmentwide. He recommends other federal law enforcement agencies and other agencies in generalconsider adopting the process, though he said different approaches would be necessary depending on the outcome they're trying to achieve.

"It's not a cookie-cutter approach. Every agency needs to figure out how to make performance measurement part of what they do so the general public can have confidence their tax dollars are being spent wisely," Torres said.

Kim Newman, a program examiner at the Office of Management and Budget, attended the Los Angeles ATF's third-quarter COMPSTAT in August. She said she was struck by how aggressively participants zeroed in on whether the results matched the goals.

"The [agents] realized when they fall short, they better have a good explanation for the results. By the same token, people were recognized if they exceeded goals for the quarter," Newman said.

She said it was clear that the event was meant as a learning process.

Before COMPSTAT, Torres said, his office didn't publicly measure performance, and systems within the department for sharing statistical information were spotty.

He said implementing COMPSTAT has meant changing culture.

"It requires a different mindset," Torres said, a shift that hasn't been easy to convince everyone to buy into. Ultimately, though, he said most agents have appreciated the need for greater accountability and the benefits of a public process.

Kathrene Hansen, executive director of the Greater Los Angeles Federal Executive Board attended the fourth-quarter COMPSTAT earlier this month. Though the process was transparent, she said no one got defensive.

"It seemed like a team effort, a peer review process" she said. "You could see that people wanted to get their numbers up."

Hansen said it appeared to be a good way for agents and the ATF to get buy-in for the resources they need.

OMB's Newman agreed.

"To me, it was great to see that resources could be targeted so quickly and be responsive to what's happening in the field," she said.

While many state and local law enforcement agencies have adopted the process, Torres said as far as he knows, the Los Angeles ATF is the only federal law enforcement agency using COMPSTAT. He said having the support of his supervisors in Washington has been critical.

"I hope ATF doing it opens eyes," he said. "You need to keep score in public."

Newman said whether this process would work at other agencies would depend on the special agent in charge.

"If there are law enforcement organizations out there that are willing to delegate that flexibility and responsibility to their supervisors, I think it would be a very effective tool. I could see it working in other law enforcement agencies in the federal government."

Hansen agreed COMPSTAT could be applied more widely.

"What I liked most about it was the transparency and the willingness to invite all of the stakeholders to the meeting, she said. "The willingness to expose all of your strengths and weaknesses out of your individual domain takes courage as a leader."

Leader Of Aryan Prison Gang Gets 19 Years (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, November 1, 2006

A leader of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang with an extensive criminal record was resentenced to more than 19 years behind bars Monday for a weapons violation, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Bruce Foy Lowry, 52, was convicted by a jury after his 2003 arrest by federal marshals who tracked him down on a fugitive warrant. At the time, Lowry was wanted for failure to appear in a drive-by shooting case where he was accused of firing a gun at a mother, father and child who followed him from the scene of a hit-and-run accident.

According to a recorded conversation played during the sentencing, Lowry told a friend that he would have gotten into a gun battle with marshals if he'd had the opportunity. "If I could have drawn I would have," he said. "I couldn't even draw."

Lowry, known as "Boss Hog," appealed his case in 2004 to the Ninth Circuit Court, which remanded it back to the U.S. District Court in Arizona. On Monday, Judge David Campbell ordered Lowery to serve 235 months in prison for possessing ammunition in violation of the Armed Career Criminal Act.

Prosecutors stressed Lowry's extensive history of violent crimes, including seven felony convictions dating to 1974. The list of offenses includes armed robberies and two Aryan Brotherhood knife attack on an inmate. Lowry and a half-dozen other assailants left the knife in their victim's heart, prosecutors said, but surgeons managed to remove the weapon and save the inmate's life.

IMMIGRATION:

Agent Indicted In Smuggling Of Cuban Ballplayers To USA (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 1, 2006

A baseball agent who has represented Cuban defectors was indicted by a Miami grand jury on Tuesday for allegedly smuggling ballplayers and other Cuban nationals into the USA.

Gustavo "Gus" Dominguez, vice president of Total Sports International in Encino, Calif., is charged as part of a 53-count indictment related to two operations in 2004.

Geoffrey Rodrigues, Robert Yosvany Hernandez, Ramon Batista and Guillermo Valdez, allegedly hired by Dominguez to transport the Cubans by speedboat to the USA, also were indicted.

Dominguez has represented several Cuban defectors, including Andy Morales, who was signed by the New York Yankees and later the Boston Red Sox. Dominguez did not return a phone message left at his office.

The indictment says Rodrigues traveled in a 28-foot speedboat on July 28, 2004, from the Florida Keys to Cuba, where he picked up 22 people.

The U.S. Coast Guard intercepted them at sea as they attempted to return to Florida, the indictment says.

A second smuggling operation on Aug. 22 succeeded, the indictment said. The smugglers reached the Florida Keys with 19 Cubans, including five baseball players.

Once the Cubans reached land, two other associates drove the players in two rental vans from Miami to Los Angeles, according to the indictment.

Dominguez and his associates rented apartments and provided food for players Osmany Masso-Arredondo, Allen Guevara-Perez, Francisely Bueno-Trueba, Osbek Castillo-Perez, and Yoankis Turino-Montalno so they could begin training, the indictment says.

Castillo-Perez, 25, of Havana, is listed as a pitcher on the roster of the Missoula Ospreys, a minor league affiliate of the Arizona Diamondbacks in the Pioneer League. Osprey general manager and vice president Matt Ellis did not return a phone message left at his office Tuesday afternoon.

Bueno-Trueba, 25, of Havana, is listed as a left-handed pitcher on the roster of the Mississippi Braves, a Southern League affiliate of the Atlanta Braves. The Braves office in Pearl, Miss., had closed for the day.

Julie Myers, an assistant secretary of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said in a statement that "Though this case involves a Beverly Hills sports agent and talented baseball players, it is remarkably similar to the human smuggling operations that ICE encounters every day. The ringleaders put the lives of illegal immigrants at risk and sought to profit from their labor."

U.S. Government Indicts Agent For Illegally Smuggling Cuban Baseball Players (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Sedensky, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - MIAMI-An agent for baseball players illegally smuggled Cuban players into the United States, eventually shipping them to California in hopes that they would be signed by Major League Baseball teams, U.S. immigration officials said Tuesday.

The agent, Gustavo "Gus" Dominguez, is charged with paying four aides to transport the athletes and other Cubans to the U.S. in two trips from the island nation. Dominguez, of California-based Total Sports International, has represented several Cuban baseball defectors, including Andy Morales, who was signed by the New York Yankees and later the Boston Red Sox after fleeing Cuba six years ago.

Also charged in the 53-count federal indictment were Geoffrey Rodrigues, Robert Yosvany Hernandez, Ramon Batista and Guillermo Valdez.

"Though this case involves a Beverly Hills sports agent and talented baseball players, it is remarkably similar to the human smuggling operations that ICE encounters every day," Julie Myers, an assistant secretary of the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said in a statement. "The ringleaders put the lives of illegal immigrants at risk and sought to profit from their labor."

Dominguez's assistant, who would not give his full name, said Total Sports would not comment and he wouldn't clarify the relationship of the four other defendants or whether they worked for the company. A message left on Dominguez's voicemail was not immediately returned.

It was not known whether any of the defendants had obtained lawyers.

Prosecutors say Rodrigues and Dominguez traveled by boat to Cuba on July 28, 2004, and loaded 22 Cubans aboard, but were intercepted by U.S. authorities at sea. Less than a month later, on Aug. 22, 2004, authorities say the two men successfully brought 19 Cubans into the country.

According to the indictment, the defendants transported the athletes to Los Angeles by van, rented an apartment for them, provided them with food and clothing and began training them. It could not be immediately determined if any of the Cubans have been signed by MLB teams.

All five men are charged with conspiracy to bring immigrants illegally into the United States, transporting them in violation of the law and concealing and harboring them from detection.

Dominguez, Rodrigues and Hernandez are also charged with immigrant smuggling; Dominguez, Batista and Valdez face a charge of transporting, concealing and harboring from detection illegal immigrants; and Rodrigues is accused of assaulting ICE agents when his boat was intercepted.

Lawsuit Challenges Illegal Immigrant Crackdown In US (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - ALLENTOWN, Pennsylvania-Hispanic groups and the American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit against a small U.S. city that has sparked national attention over its immigration policies, setting the stage for a legal battle over its crackdown on illegal immigrants.

The ordinance, approved by the Hazleton City Council last month, imposes fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and denies business permits to companies that give them jobs. The law empowers the city to investigate written complaints about a person's immigration status, using a database operated by the federal government.

Lawyers for the ACLU and other groups planned to ask a federal judge for a temporary restraining order to prevent enforcement of the law, set to begin Wednesday.

"Immigration reform is an important issue but if every little town like Hazleton across the 50 states makes up their own rules about immigration, we're going to be left with an even bigger mess," Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, said Monday.

Hazleton's ordinance has spurred dozens of copycat versions in small towns around the United States, as the illegal immigration issue has become a key campaign debate as the country heads into congressional elections next week. Some states and communities are accusing the government of inaction.

President George W. Bush signed last week a law that approves partitioning 700 miles (1,125 kilometers) of the U.S. from Mexico. Bush wants a guest worker program, but he has been met with tough resistance from his own Republican Party.

DOJ_NMG_0089625

A bill passed by the U.S. Senate would have allowed immigrants to remain and eventually become citizens after working, paying fines and back taxes and learning English. The House of Representatives approved a separate bill that focused on enforcement measures such as subjecting those in the U.S. illegally to felony prosecution.

The House and Senate did not meet to negotiate a compromise before recessing for the elections. The legislation Bush signed was a small portion of the House version.

In its lawsuit, the ACLU said the Hazleton ordinance and a companion measure violate the Constitution because they step on the federal government's exclusive power to regulate immigration.

Mayor Lou Barletta, disagreed, saying, "We are not regulating immigration in any way."

Barletta, who spearheaded the town law, contends illegal immigrants have brought drugs, crime and gangs to the city, overwhelming police and municipal budgets. He announced the crackdown in June, a month after two illegal immigrants from the Dominican Republic were charged with shooting and killing a 29-year-old man.

Barletta said he is convinced the law will be upheld by the courts and the city has assembled a legal team to defend it.

"Hazleton is prepared to fight and we will take this challenge to the highest court in the United States if that's what it takes to protect our legal citizens and quality of life," he said.

Hazleton, a city of about 31,000 residents, is about 80 miles (130 kilometers) from Philadelphia.

Houses Of Worship Fear Wrath Of IRS During Election Season (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - Scores of houses of worship nationwide are re-examining how they conduct get-out-the-vote programs and other election activities as the Internal Revenue Service investigates religious institutions for illegal campaign activity.

Churches grew more nervous when the IRS launched an investigation of the liberal All Saints Episcopal Church in Pasadena, Calif. after a former rector delivered a sermon that was critical of the Bush administration and the Iraq war shortly before the 2004 presidential election. The church last month said it would fight the IRS in court.

With congressional elections on Tuesday, several religious and voting rights groups are schooling churches, synagogues, and other religious institutions about what they can and cannot do politically under IRS regulations.

Religious institutions and other charitable organizations that violate the rules risk fines and losing their federal tax-exempt status. Fear of IRS investigations has made clergy across religious faiths reluctant to be politically active during this election cycle.

"I think there's a chill," said the Rev. Rick Scarborough, the president of Vision America, a politically active conservative Christian group that promotes civic involvement by the faithful. "I've had pastors come up and tell me their congregations have told them not to mention politics because it's illegal. It's not."

Scarborough said that Christian evangelical leaders, whom Republicans hoped to make part of an enduring GOP majority, have discussed increased IRS scrutiny during rallies and seminars.

To ease concern among its 185,000 members, the Interfaith Alliance, an 185,000-member organization that was formed "to challenge the radical religious right," conducted a conference call on the IRS regulations with ministers two weeks ago.

The Religious Action Center for Reform Judaism, which represents some 900 congregations across the country, held a similar call three weeks ago.

"It's become a very serious issue with congregations, especially African-American congregations," said Rep. Emanuel Cleaver II, D-Mo., the pastor of Kansas City's St. James United Methodist Church. "There's mass paranoia about (churches) being politically involved."

Some Muslim religious leaders said they've had few, if any, discussions about political activity in mosques because they don't usually mount aggressive get-out-the-vote efforts.

"What we do is just generally encourage participation in the election process and stress the importance of people's presence in politics," said Imam Mohammad Ali Elahi, founder and director of the Islamic House of Wisdom in Dearborn, Mich., which has a large Arab-American population.

IRS officials say that religious institutions are under greater scrutiny because the agency is receiving more complaints about them from private citizens, watchdog groups, and other organizations.

During the 2004 election cycle, the IRS investigated 110 cases of alleged illegal political activity by churches, charities and nonprofit organizations. They substantiated illegal political activity in 64 of the cases; 48 involved churches.

DOJ_NMG_0089626

So far this year, the agency has received 116 complaints, 50 of which were referred for further investigation. Of the 50, 11 involved churches. IRS officials say they expect to receive more complaints about churches before the Nov. 7 elections.

Houses of worship and charitable groups can run afoul of the IRS by violating a tax law that prohibits political intervention by tax-exempt organizations called 501(c)3s. That subsection of the Internal Revenue Code says that churches and organizations cannot "participate in, or intervene in (including the publishing or distributing of statements) any political campaign on behalf of (or in opposition to) any candidate for public office," according to the IRS Web site.

However, religious institutions and charities may conduct certain voter education activities, including presenting public forums and publishing nonpartisan voter education guides. Religious institutions may invite candidates to address their congregations as long as opposing candidates are invited, too.

The law allows churches, synagogues and other places of worship to take positions on public policy issues, including issues that divide candidates in an election. But they must take care to avoid making their advocacy on the issue seem like advocacy for a given candidate, a sometimes murky distinction.

Several religious organizations and leaders have criticized the rules, saying they stifle religious free speech. They contend that individuals or organizations opposed to a particular religious group's ideology or participation in the political process use the law as a weapon by complaining to the IRS and triggering investigations.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State fired a warning shot last month when it sent 117,000 letters to pastors and churches in 11 states where the conservative Christian Coalition is politically active. The letter reminded the ministers about IRS regulations and warned that violating them could cost their churches their tax-exempt status.

Some clergy from liberal and African-American churches said the IRS focuses on their ministries and seems to let other Christian and evangelical groups do whatever they want.

"One would think the IRS is totally nonpartisan, but that is not the case," said former Rep. Floyd Flake, D-N.Y., the senior pastor of the Greater Allen African Methodist Episcopal Church in New York City. The IRS investigated and cleared his church of political wrongdoing after Vice President Al Gore addressed the congregation during the 2000 presidential campaign.

Christian evangelical groups also complain about being unfairly investigated by the IRS.

"I think the evangelical community is being targeted," Scarborough said. "But there are too many moral issues that are making the church and pastors get involved and overcome the terror of the state, the threat of the IRS."

IRS spokeswoman Nancy Mathis said the IRS doesn't get involved in politics when it investigates alleged tax-code violators.

"There's a team of career employees that investigates these cases," she said. "Politics plays no role whatsoever."

GAO Urges Closer Oversight Of Private Tax Collectors (WP)

By Jim Abrams

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

The Internal Revenue Service must improve oversight of a new program that uses private agencies to collect back taxes before it expands the effort, congressional investigators say.

A Government Accountability Office report commended the IRS for addressing some important factors for the success of the program, such as proper training of collection-agency employees, ensuring that taxpayers are treated properly and that taxpayer information is secure.

But it said the agency has not completed critical work on setting goals and determining costs.

The IRS lacks criteria to assess "whether the program performance warrants expanding the number of private collection agencies and turning over more cases to them," the report says.

Critics of the program said yesterday that the GAO report supported arguments that the tax agency was moving quickly to incorporate an unworkable program.

"I've been concerned all along about the use of private contractors to collect federal taxes," said Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee. Baucus and committee chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) requested the GAO study.

"Tax collection is an inherent government function, and the IRS ought to take care of it in house," Baucus said.

The IRS, responding to legislation, initiated the private debt collection program in September, contracting with three companies. The IRS plans to expand the program to up to 12 private agencies, with a goal of collecting $1.4 billion in back taxes over the next decade.

The report cited preliminary IRS data showing that the three companies expected to collect $56 million to $92 million through the end of next year, at a cost of $61 million. Under the program, the private agencies are entitled to up to 24 percent of the tax money they collect.

DOJ_NMG_0089627

The IRS program, said Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, "is a direct handout to the private sector, which won't generate an appreciable return to the Treasury and will cost taxpayers money."

IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson, in a statement responding to the GAO report, said he agreed with the recommendations to set more concrete guidelines for the program and said that the agency had begun to carry out those recommendations.

As part of the effort to prevent scams, taxpayers first receive a letter from the IRS that includes the name of the company that will be contacting them about the debt. The firms receive basic background information on the taxpayer but do not have access to tax returns.

Initial Costs Hit IRS Plan To Recover Delinquent Taxes (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, November 1, 2006

The IRS could lose money or break even in the first phase of its program to turn some tax debts over to private collection agencies, newly released agency data show.

Fiscal projections in a Government Accountability Office report show the IRS expects to collect $55.8 million to $92 million in the recently started first phase of the private collection effort.

The report shows the IRS estimates initial program costs at nearly $61.2 million — which raises the possibility the agency could lose money by the scheduled December 2008 conclusion of the program's initial phase.

However, the IRS data also project collection revenue of $1.4 billion, dwarfing federal costs of nearly $77.6 million, during a 10-year span of private collections.

The data offer one of the first fiscal looks at this year's selection of three private firms to collect taxes from taxpayers who owe less than $25,000 and have not contested the debts. The firms began contacting an initial group of 12,500 taxpayers in September. They are eventually scheduled to handle about 158,000 cases, according to the IRS. The IRS cost data include the companies' fees; up to 24% of what they collect in overdue taxes.

The program, slated for expansion to as many as nine additional collection companies in 2008, has been repeatedly criticized by some members of Congress and the National Treasury Employees Union, the bargaining unit that represents IRS workers.

Citing the new IRS revenue and cost projections, NTEU President Colleen Kelley said Tuesday, “It is only appropriate that the GAO study is in the news on Oct. 31, since it is so scary for taxpayers.”

“But for the contractors, it reveals a program that is much more like Christmas than Halloween,” Kelley said.

The IRS acknowledged that the upfront cost of technology and implementation could result in an initial budget loss. But the agency stressed that IRS budget projections also forecast a long-term profit for the program.

The GAO report also said the IRS had not adequately developed performance measures to gauge the success or failure of the private collection effort and determine whether it should be expanded.

In response, the IRS said it would continually evaluate its own resources and the performance of the private collection firms as it decides whether to expand the effort.

Harvest Those Stock Losses But Beware Of Common Pitfalls (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

With stock prices posting healthy gains this year, here's a tax tip for millions of investors: This is a good time to consider selling your losers and using those losses to save taxes.

But before pulling the trigger, watch out for nasty tax-law potholes that can jolt even the best-laid plans.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average has gained about 13% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index is up about 7% this year but still is about 53% below its peak in 2000. Many investors still are sitting on painful losses in high-technology issues and other former high fliers purchased during the late 1990s.

Dumping losers now could be a smart strategy for investors in taxable accounts for several reasons. First, losses can be used to offset realized capital gains on a dollar-for-dollar basis. Next, if your capital losses exceed your capital gains, you typically can deduct a net loss of as much as $3,000 a year from your wages and other ordinary income. (For those who are married and filing separately from their spouse, the net-loss limit is $1,500 a year.) Losses above the limit are carried over into future years.

Here's an example: Suppose you file jointly with your spouse and sold stocks earlier this year for a capital gain of $50,000. Now, you sell other stocks you've owned for years at a $53,000 loss. That loss would erase your entire gain and leave you with a net loss of $3,000, which would be deducted from your ordinary income.

Ordinary income is taxed at federal rates as high as 35%, far above the top rate of only 15% on long-term capital gains on stocks, bonds and other securities. "Long-term" refers to gains on securities held more than one year. Short-term gains are taxed as ordinary income.

"You should definitely harvest your tax losses before the end of the year," says M. Holly Isdale, a managing director at Lehman Brothers and head of wealth advisory services. But, she says, be sure to avoid painful tax traps.

For example, watch out for the tricky "wash-sale" rule, which can ensnare even veteran investors who aren't paying attention. A wash sale typically occurs when you sell or trade stock or securities at a loss and buy the same thing, or something "substantially identical," within 30 days. It's important to note that the rule means 30 days before or after the sale.

If you violate the rule, you can't deduct your loss on the sale, the Internal Revenue Service says. Instead, add the disallowed loss to the cost of the new stock or securities, and the result is your basis in the new stock or securities, the IRS says. (For details, see IRS Publication 550.)

To avoid trouble, invest in something different during the specified time period. Or wait until afterward to buy the same stock, or something substantially the same, as the one you sold.

However, it isn't always quite so simple. For example, it isn't entirely clear what the IRS means by "substantially identical." Lawyers long have debated this issue. It's also unclear whether you would be violating the wash-sale rule if you sell a stock at a loss in a taxable account and then buy the same stock shortly thereafter for your Individual Retirement Account. The IRS hasn't issued a formal ruling. But, to be on the safe side, don't do it, several tax advisers say.

Separately, keep in mind another rule of thumb: Don't donate a stock to charity that is selling for less than you paid for it, says Ms. Isdale of Lehman Brothers. Instead, sell that stock at a loss, use the loss to reduce your taxes, and give the proceeds to charity. * * *

THE IRS HAS IMPROVED efforts to check up on taxpayers in partnerships, trusts and S corporations, a report says.

That's a significant change from just a few years ago, when the IRS drew heavy criticism from a congressional investigative agency and some lawmakers for embarrassing blunders in its efforts to combat tax evasion in this area. Since then, the IRS has done a better job but still needs to do more, says a report by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration.

The IRS program involves "document-matching," which means comparing information that people report on their tax returns against what is reported separately to the agency on "Schedule K-1."

That form is supposed to show a taxpayer's share of an enterprise's income, losses, deductions and credits. * * *

BRIEFS: Paul B. Jones, a senior vice president at Time Warner Telecom in Littleton, Colo., is the new chairman of the IRS Oversight Board, succeeding Raymond T. Wagner Jr., whose term as chairman expired but whose term as a board member won't expire until 2009. ... CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Democrats Propose More Spending For Military And Education (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

As part of their midterm election push, House Democrats are promoting a wide-ranging legislative agenda that would add tens of billions of dollars a year to the federal budget for the military, homeland security and education yet still impose a new budget restraint that would make it harder to widen the annual deficit.

Republicans and budget experts doubt that Democrats could do both simultaneously. When price tags are attached to their six-pronged agenda -- named Six for '06 -- critics say the Democrats will be forced to choose between keeping their pledge of fiscal rectitude and their promises of federal largess.

"There's a trade-off that's being left unspoken here," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a nonpartisan opponent of deficits. "To pay for their new spending, they would have to cut programs, raise taxes or be unable to do what they want."

Republicans also scoff at the plan. ""It's schizophrenia in '06 is what it is," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.), a member of the Budget Committee. "You cannot balance the budget by vastly increasing spending."

DOJ_NMG_0089629

This week, President Bush blistered Democratic policies and argued that voters would be better off if they kept Republicans in charge of Congress. He charged in a series of speeches that the Democrats would undermine America's fight against terrorism and would raise taxes if they won congressional majorities on Nov. 7.

Democratic leaders dispute the accusation and have been talking up Six for '06. The plan would allocate billions of dollars to build up the military, subsidize student loans and bolster port security. It would raise the minimum wage, make college tuition payments tax-deductible, repeal oil-company tax breaks and expand incentives for personal savings accounts, among many other provisions.

The program would prohibit the House from approving new spending or tax measures that widen the budget deficit. It would do that by restoring budget rules requiring that all future spending increases and tax cuts be offset by equivalent tax hikes or spending cuts.

"It's a road map to how Democrats would govern" if they win a majority in the House, said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.).

The agenda represents a consensus between the House Democrats' disparate factions. The final plan came together this summer after numerous meetings among Pelosi, other Democratic leaders and Democrats from the liberal, conservative and business-oriented factions of the party, as well as the Congressional Black Caucus and Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

In putting the agenda together, Democrats dropped several proposals that proved too controversial or costly, such as broad and expensive relief from the alternative minimum tax, which threatens to raise taxes on middle-income earners; filling a major gap, or "doughnut hole," in prescription-drug coverage under Medicare, which would cost $427 billion over 10 years; and rolling back Bush's tax cuts for wealthy Americans.

The final product contains plenty of pricey measures, including a commitment to "rebuild a state-of-the-art military capable of projecting power wherever necessary." The plan would also double the size of the military's special forces.

No dollar value is assigned to the provisions. But if Special Forces double through additions to the military and not through a reshuffling of personnel, that would mean 35,000 new active-duty troops and 15,000 reservists, at a minimum cost of about $5.8 billion a year, said Steven M. Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

To fortify the Army, several Democrats have proposed increasing troop levels by 40,000 at a five-year cost of $20 billion, the Congressional Budget Office said.

On the home front, House Democrats would tighten border and port security by screening all containers that enter the country -- a multi-billion-dollar project. The plan would also step up training and equipping National Guard forces and first responders.

A 2004 study by the Council on Foreign Relations estimated that covering the budgetary shortfall for first responders alone would take a fivefold increase in funds, to $25 billion from $5.4 billion a year.

The Democrats' plan would boost federal spending on college education. It would allow some families to write off their children's college tuition payments (up to $3,000 per student), a now-expired tax break that cost the government $4.7 billion in revenue last year.

Democrats also hope to expand federal assistance for needy students under the Pell Grant program and to cut in half interest rates for federal student loans. House Budget Committee Republicans have put the cost of the interest rate cut at $60 billion over five years. Democrats said the cost would be lower, but not by much.

Other pieces of the agenda appear to be paid for, and Democrats are proposing policy changes that would raise substantial revenue. They would couple a minimum-wage increase to ending tax breaks that they say reward companies for sending jobs overseas. Under a plan set out by Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry in 2004, U.S.-based companies would be forced to pay taxes immediately on virtually all foreign profits that are not taxed by another country, raising $12 billion a year.

The Six for '06 plan would promote renewable energy sources and would fund the effort by cutting tax subsidies to oil and gas companies. According to Bush's budget, $1.83 billion in tax breaks will go to oil and gas companies next year to subsidize energy exploration and development.

The biggest savings in the Democrats' plan would be a pledge to give the federal government the authority to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) have estimated that Medicare could save $190 billion over the next decade if the seniors' program adopted the price-negotiating model of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

To finance any remaining budget shortfall created by the agenda, Crider said Democrats would tap the vast amount of tax revenue owed to, but uncollected by, the government -- the "tax gap," which has been projected at $300 billion a year. Crider was not specific about how that money would be brought in except to say that the Internal Revenue Service would be given more manpower.

DOJ_NMG_0089630

In his last budget, Bush also recommended closing the tax gap, but nothing came of his suggestion.

Some Democrats acknowledge that compromises are likely to be needed on the spending side of Six for '06 to make good on its pledge to restore strict budget rules -- the "pay as you go," or "paygo," requirement for offsetting tax cuts or spending hikes.

"The Blue Dogs are very strong on paygo," said John S. Tanner (Tenn.), a leader of the conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats. "If you have to cut spending, you have to cut spending."

Specter Of Tax Man Haunts Democrats (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The Next Congress

Third of five parts

Repealing President Bush's tax cuts and boosting social-welfare spending have been the meat and potatoes of the Democrats' campaigns since the 2002 election, and they would be in a position to attempt both if they win control of Congress next week.

Mr. Bush has been warning in campaign speeches across the country that the Democrats "will raise your taxes" if voters put them in power, and Republican leaders have been making similar charges as Election Day draws closer.

Democrats have an outside chance of taking complete control of Congress, but a better chance of winning one chamber, and in this series, The Washington Times will look at how such a transfer of power will affect U.S. policy and politics.

House Minority Leader "Nancy Pelosi and congressional Democrats want the president's tax-relief measures to expire, raising taxes on millions of Americans," House Republican Whip Roy Blunt said last week.

Fearing Mr. Bush's warnings about higher taxes could drive more people to vote Republican next week, Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, released a statement Friday saying: "Nothing could be further from the truth. Democrats have a long history of supporting targeted relief for middle-income families."

Mr. Rangel would be in line to run the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win a majority in the House.

Recent polls show that most Americans expect Democrats to raise their taxes and increase spending for new big-ticket programs such as health care for the uninsured.

A USA Today/Gallup Poll reported last week that 63 percent of Americans surveyed think Democrats are likely to "increase federal income taxes" if they win control of Congress -- though 74 percent said they disapprove of it.

Past the rhetoric

Mr. Rangel, a fierce critic of the Bush tax cuts, said one of his priorities will be "to close tax shelters and eliminate benefits for companies that move jobs overseas," moves that businesses fear would raise their taxes and reduce profits.

He also said that 2010, when the bulk of the tax cuts expire, is "light-years away from the debate before us, and we have no way of knowing what the economy or even our country's leadership will look like at that time."

Despite Mr. Rangel's promise that Democrats would reach out to Republicans and the White House "to find common ground," Republican tax-cutters point out that he told Bloomberg News several weeks ago that he could not think of one of Mr. Bush's tax cuts that deserved to be extended

But Democratic policy advisers say that despite their campaign rhetoric, many of the Bush tax cuts are supported by Democrats, including the $1,000 child tax credit, marriage penalty relief and lower tax rates for middle-income families.

One of the changes in the tax rates that Mr. Bush enacted was a lower 10 percent tax rate for workers at the bottom of the income scale, a tax-cut provision that the Democrats "would not want to eliminate," a House Democratic staffer said.

"I can't see Democrats opposing the rates that are being paid at the bottom two-thirds of the tax code. Democrats are for taxing the super-rich, though it is yet to be defined where super-richdom begins," said Robert Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, a nonpartisan economic and social policy research group.

Still, Republicans who have worked with Mr. Rangel in the House say they are a little suspicious of his ultimate goals.

"He's a master politician, but when he talks about everything on the table and tax cuts for the middle class, my eyes begin to widen. When you start targeting tax cuts to a class of people, you are entering the arena of redistribution of wealth," said former Rep. Jack Kemp, a tax-cut crusader who was the architect of the Reagan tax cuts in the 1980s.

Checks and balances

Senior Democratic advisers say that whatever Mr. Rangel might be planning, major tax and spending changes are unlikely to happen because of a number of institutional obstacles that would be extremely hard for the Democrats to overcome, especially in what is likely to remain a narrowly divided Congress.

"I don't see any dramatic changes in taxes or dramatic increases in spending if you want to know the truth. A lot of this fear talk is part of the campaign," said Leon Panetta, former House Budget Committee chairman and Clinton chief of staff.

"Everybody is saying that all of these things will happen, but there will be checks in the system. The fact is that Bush is still going to be president, with his veto, and the Senate, which could be split 50-50, will act as a barrier as well," Mr. Panetta said.

With his veto power, Mr. Bush would be the biggest obstacle to rolling back any part of the tax cuts, and it would be very difficult for Democrats to win the two-thirds vote needed to override a veto in a narrowly divided House or Senate, former congressional officials said. The Senate filibuster, which requires 60 votes to break, is another big political hurdle that conservative Republicans say would be used to block Democratic tax-and-spend proposals.

Nevertheless, the power structure on Capitol Hill would shift dramatically from right to far left under Democratic rule if veteran liberal lawmakers take over the chairmanships of committees that would write the tax and spending bills the House and Senate would consider.

How the coming tax-and-spend battle plays out will depend upon "how the White House intends to play its cards" and how much Democrats are prepared to fight for their agenda, said Mr. Reischauer, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office (CBO).

"If push comes to shove, we are going to end up with some significant part of the tax cuts extended. We are not going to revert to the 2000 tax code before Bush. Neither is it likely that we will extend all of the tax cuts that have been enacted since 2000," he said.

Pricey plans

But Republicans such as former House Majority Leader Dick Armey of Texas said that if the Democrats take over, "they will try to find some way to raise taxes to finance their spending programs."

Democrats gave voters a peek into the kind of spending proposals they want to enact in their election agenda titled "A New Direction For America." The campaign agenda does not say how much their proposals would cost, but an analysis by the National Taxpayers Union based in part on CBO estimates puts the price tag at more than $79 billion a year.

These legislative proposals include $16.2 billion a year for lower-interest college loans, nearly $1 billion more per year for scientific research, $4 billion in additional Pell Grants for college students and $28.8 billion more for health care, including increased subsidies for the Medicare prescription-drug program for the elderly.

Perhaps one of the biggest spending initiatives in the Democrats' agenda is a program called "AmeriSave," under which the government will match the first $1,000 contributed to an IRA, 401(k) or other investment retirement account. The program would cost taxpayers $37.5 billion in the first five years.

Another measurement of spending increases a Democratic Congress would seek can be found in amendments they have offered in the Senate in the past two years. According to an analysis by the Senate Republican Policy Committee, Senate Democrats proposed $95.2 billion in increased spending for fiscal 2006 and $74 billion for fiscal 2007.

Mr. Panetta blames both Republicans and Democrats for the sizable budget deficits of the past six years and does not see that changing dramatically anytime soon, despite this year's sharp decline in the deficits as a result of unexpectedly stronger federal tax revenues.

"This Congress has been the worst on borrowing and spending that I've seen in my lifetime, with record deficits. Responsibility for that rests with both parties. My theory is that they will continue to borrow and spend in the future," he said.

Rangel Says No Animosity To Cheney (AP-Y)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, November 1, 2006

Rep. Charles Rangel feels bad — but not too bad — about directing a curse word at Vice President Dick Cheney.

Rangel, a Harlem Democrat who regularly exchanges verbal volleys with the vice president, called Cheney a "son of a b...." on Monday when asked by the New York Post about comments Cheney made about him in a television interview.

He repeated his comments in an interview with The Associated Press on Tuesday, but added, "I shouldn't have said it."

"I thought that he should be flattered, there's certainly no animosity in it," said Rangel, saying he had been making an observation about Cheney. "Some people just have that as part of their personality."

Cheney's spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride declined to address Rangel's off-color language.

"The vice president is going to continue to talk about the clear record on taxes — Republicans voting to lower taxes ... and he's also going to continue to talk about the Democrats' position on taxes," said McBride.

DOJ_NMG_0089632

Rangel's name is invoked regularly by Republicans seeking to retain control of the House of Representatives in next week's midterm elections. If Democrats gain 15 seats to become the majority party, Rangel would become chairman of the powerful tax-writing Ways & Means Committee.

GOP leaders contend a Rangel-led committee would immediately move to undo the Bush administration tax cuts now set to expire in 2010.

Rangel said the charge is ridiculous, and he has not made any decisions about it.

"They can't get me to say I'm going to extend it. I say that just makes good economic sense to see what the status is of our economy before we start projecting what tax cuts we'll have in the future," said Rangel, dean of New York's congressional delegation.

In televised interviews Monday, Cheney told CNBC that Rangel wouldn't keep "a single one" of Bush's tax cuts, and he later told Fox News Channel: "Charlie doesn't understand how the economy works."

More than a year ago, Rangel said he would like to think Cheney is "sick rather than just mean and evil," prompting Cheney to answer: "Charlie is losing it, I guess."

Appeals Court Hears Taped-call Dispute (AP-Y)

By Matthew Daly

AP, November 1, 2006

A lawyer for Democratic Rep. Jim McDermott told a federal appeals court Tuesday that McDermott should not be punished for giving reporters access to an illegally taped telephone call involving House Republican leaders.

In arguments that evoked the Pentagon Papers and other press freedom cases, lawyer Christopher Landau said McDermott had merely received the tape from a Florida couple and therefore had done nothing wrong.

A finding against McDermott could chill the news media's ability to gather information on important public issues, Landau said.

"It's hard to overstate the impact of the case on the media," he said.

Lawyers for 18 news organizations — including ABC, NBC, CBS, CNN, The Associated Press, The New York Times and The Washington Post — have filed a brief backing McDermott, a Democrat from Washington state who gave reporters a recording of a 1996 call involving then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled against McDermott in March. The 2-1 opinion upheld a lower court ruling that McDermott had violated the rights of Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, who was heard on the 1996 call. Boehner was then a Gingrich lieutenant and is now House majority leader.

The full nine-member appeals court vacated the ruling this spring and heard new arguments in the case on Tuesday. A ruling is expected next year.

Boehner's lawyer, Michael Carvin, told the court that McDermott's actions were clearly illegal. He compared McDermott to a "fence" who received stolen goods and then sold them.

McDermott's actions were especially egregious because he received the tape in his capacity as a House ethics committee member who was sworn to confidentiality, Carvin said.

Judge David S. Tatel said that under Carvin's interpretation, the New York Times and other newspapers that published the contents of the tape could be held liable.

"The argument to extend it to the New York Times is quite powerful," Tatel said.

"I'm not representing the New York Times," Carvin retorted. "I'm perfectly happy to throw them overboard."

But Landau said a ruling against McDermott would be disastrous for a free press.

"You are basically saying Congress can indict the media if it is deemed they knew the information was unlawfully obtained," he said.

The case is Boehner v. McDermott, 04-7203.

Background Checks Take Too Much Time, GAO Says (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

The Bush administration appears at risk of missing a deadline set by Congress aimed at shortening the time it takes to investigate federal employees and contractors for security clearances and determine whether they can be trusted with classified information.

DOJ_NMG_0089633

The 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act requires that 80 percent of all security clearances be completed in an average of 120 days. The law's goals include improved analytical methods at national security agencies, an effort that requires timely processing of security clearances to expand the workforces at 16 intelligence agencies.

But a report issued by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional watchdog agency, suggests that the administration could miss the Dec. 17 deadline for timely processing of security clearances stipulated in the 2004 law.

For its study, the GAO looked at a small but important group of people seeking security clearances -- government contract employees applying for top-secret clearances. The private-sector employees waited more than a year on average to receive their top-secret clearances, the GAO found.

The GAO examined 2,259 cases of industry personnel granted top-secret clearances in January and February of this year. The clearance process took an average of 446 days for an initial clearance and 545 days for a clearance update, the GAO said.

About 90 percent of the government's background investigations are conducted by the Office of Personnel Management. The Defense Department uses information from the background checks to grant about 80 percent of security clearances, including those for contract workers at Defense and 23 other federal agencies.

The ranks of contractors in the defense and intelligence communities have grown since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as agencies have moved to strengthen homeland security. As of May, contract workers held about 34 percent of the 2.5 million clearances granted by the Defense Department, the GAO noted.

Linda M. Springer , director of the OPM, faulted the GAO report, calling it "based on outdated information." She said the handling of many of the cases covered in the report had been slowed by a 2005 agreement with the Pentagon to consolidate personnel security investigations at the OPM. "The GAO's critical findings do not accurately reflect the current state of affairs," Springer said.

The cases examined by the GAO turned up problems that may be continuing, however. The GAO found that the OPM's "current methods do not fully capture and portray the time required to obtain a clearance."

The OPM, which has scrambled to increase its staff to keep pace with requests for background checks on government workers, relies on "an inexperienced investigative workforce" and cannot always use technology to shorten processing time because some data must be entered into computer systems from paper applications, the GAO said.

Background checks also are delayed because OPM investigators have problems getting access to some criminal and employment records at state and local levels, the GAO said.

In its review, the GAO turned up troubling signs that some top-secret clearances are based on incomplete investigative reports. A study of 50 investigative reports found 47 were missing data required by federal rules, the GAO said.

One person under investigation acknowledged having extramarital affairs, but the GAO found no documentation showing that the affairs had been investigated. Investigators also found that the person had defaulted on a loan worth several thousand dollars but did not explore the issue further, the GAO said.

Other background reports lacked information on where applicants worked and lived, their overseas trips, and their personal conduct, the GAO said.

"The use of incomplete investigations and adjudications in the granting of top secret clearance eligibility increases the risk of unauthorized disclosure of classified information," the GAO said.

Clay Johnson III , deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, said in a letter to the GAO that he will convene a working group to study the issue. The quality of background investigations, he wrote, "is of paramount importance."

Pelosi's Unintelligent Choice (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

If Democrats win control of the House next week, Nancy Pelosi's first test as speaker will arrive long before the 110th Congress convenes. Her choice to head the House intelligence committee -- unlike other House committees, this one is left entirely up to the party leadership -- will speak volumes about whether a Speaker Pelosi will be able to resist a return to paint-by-numbers Democratic Party interest-group politics as usual.

Pelosi is in a box of her own devising. The panel's ranking Democrat is her fellow Californian Jane Harman -- smart and hardworking but also abrasive, ambitious and, in Pelosi's estimation, insufficiently partisan on the committee. So Pelosi, once the intelligence panel's ranking Democrat herself, has made clear that she doesn't intend to name Harman to the chairmanship.

The wrong decision, in my view, but one that's magnified by the unfortunate fact that next in line is Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings. In 1989, after being acquitted in a criminal trial, Hastings was stripped of his position as a federal judge -- impeached by the House in which he now serves and convicted by the Senate -- for conspiring to extort a $150,000 bribe in a case before him, repeatedly lying about it under oath and manufacturing evidence at his trial.

Ordinarily, that might doom Hastings's chances, but the situation is further inflamed by racial politics: Hastings is African American, and the Congressional Black Caucus has made it clear that it will not tolerate his rejection. Another black lawmaker, Georgia's Sanford Bishop, was passed over to accommodate Harman, who reclaimed her seniority when she returned to Congress in 2000 after a gubernatorial run. And the black caucus is still smarting over Pelosi's move to oust Louisiana's William J. Jefferson from the Ways and Means Committee after the FBI found a freezerful of cash in Jefferson's home.

Pelosi has floated the notion of naming the intelligence committee's third-ranking Democrat, Texan Silvestre Reyes, who is Hispanic, but that's not flying with the black caucus. "The CBC would not look kindly on that," caucus spokeswoman Myra Dandridge told The Post's Jonathan Weisman. "The first order of business of the CBC chairman would be to protect his members, and Alcee Hastings has the seniority, the knowledge and the experience to be chairman of the intelligence committee."

True -- and still he shouldn't get the job.

The events occurred so long ago (the alleged conspiracy took place in 1981), the facts are so complex and the outcomes so antithetical (the jury acquitted Hastings; the judicial panel that investigated him, the House and the Senate concluded the opposite) that it's tempting to simply let bygones be bygones. After all, Hastings has been in Congress since 1992, on the intelligence committee since 1999. I don't worry that as chairman he'd suddenly be up for sale: If he could be entrusted with national security secrets as a committee member, why not as chairman?

But this was no ordinary crime, and Intelligence is no ordinary committee.

"My goodness gracious, when does it end? When does it end?" Hastings asked me yesterday in a long telephone interview. "It's no way that I can prove a negative. I can't go back and try to establish for everybody alive my bona fides. I've earned my stripes and I suffered through 9 3/4 years that would have crushed the average person, and fortunately for me I was not the kind of person that was crushed."

It's impossible not to like Hastings. But as someone who covered his impeachment and Senate trial, I can't get past the facts of the case, which convince me that Hastings did indeed agree to conspire with a close friend, a prominent Washington lawyer named William A. Borders Jr., to solicit the bribe. Borders was convicted of the bribery scheme in a separate trial, and he served additional time for contempt rather than testify in the congressional proceedings.

The evidence against Hastings is circumstantial, but it's too much to explain away: a suspicious pattern of telephone calls between Hastings and Borders at key moments in the case; Borders's apparent insider knowledge of developments in the criminal case; Hastings's appearance at a Miami hotel, as promised by Borders as a signal that the judge had agreed to the payoff; a cryptic telephone conversation between the two men that appears to be a coded discussion of the bribe arrangement.

Consider: Hastings, a federal judge, gets word from Borders's lawyer that Borders has been arrested for conspiring to bribe him and that the FBI wants to interview him. Instead of calling the FBI agents whose names and numbers he's been given, Hastings leaves his hotel without checking out and heads to the airport outside Baltimore instead of National, where there's an earlier flight. At BWI, Hastings calls his girlfriend, has her call him back at a different pay phone, then asks her to leave the house to call him from a pay phone, then calls her back from a different pay phone. He doesn't speak to the FBI until they track him down at the girlfriend's house later that night.

College Aid Cutbacks (NYT)

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

Pell Grants are one of the largest sources of federal help for low-income college students, and the most valuable form of aid, because the money doesn't have to be paid back. But the level of aid is increasingly out of sync with the level of need.

Last week, the College Board reported that Pell Grants fell last year, for the first time in six years. The cuts were about $100 a year per recipient, on average, and came on top of other miserliness. It's been four years since Congress last increased the maximum annual Pell Grant — by a mere $50 — bringing the top grant for a student who has no parental support to $4,050. Meanwhile, college costs are up 35 percent from five years ago. Tuition and fees at a typical four-year public university are closing in on $6,000 this year.

The recent cutbacks were set in motion in 2004, when the Department of Education reduced the number of students deemed eligible for Pell Grants and the amounts they were qualified to receive. Pell Grants now cover about a third of the average costs at a four-year public school, compared with 42 percent five years ago.

Government loans also have not kept pace with rising costs. Subsidized loans accounted for only 55 percent of student borrowing in the most recent academic year, down from 69 percent 10 years earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0089635

Bush administration officials have said repeatedly that the solution to the nation's growing income inequality is more education. That's a gross oversimplification, but if they really believed it — and cared about a remedy — would federal college aid be declining? As things stand, privatization of college lending is the administration goal that is being advanced. As government aid has declined, loans from banks and other private lenders have soared, climbing to 20 percent of all education borrowing last year, up from 12 percent five years earlier.

The result is towering debt. The same bachelor's degree will cost a student borrower far more than a student who can afford to pay. That's not a path to greater equality.

The Amazing Hubble Telescope (NYT)

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

The space agency's finest scientific instrument escaped a death sentence yesterday when Michael Griffin, the NASA administrator, approved a shuttle mission to service and upgrade the Hubble Space Telescope. It was a brave call, since repairing the Hubble will put the shuttle at greater risk than a typical mission to the International Space Station. It was also a welcome sign that NASA is willing to go the extra orbital mile to support superb science, even while it squanders large sums on completing the space station to perform research that can't begin to compare with the Hubble's in importance.

For a decade and a half, the Hubble has made discoveries that have helped revolutionize our understanding of the universe. Its typical role is to pick up a hint from ground-based telescopes and then use its unparalleled vantage point above the atmosphere to probe deeply into some puzzling phenomenon. The Hubble has peered farther into space and farther back in time than any other instrument. It has discovered more than 500 proto-galaxies that emitted light when the universe was in its formative stages, confirmed the jaw-dropping discovery that the expansion of the universe is accelerating, and helped establish the rate of expansion and the age of the universe.

A panel of distinguished astronomers judged that the Hubble "has arguably had a greater impact on astronomy than any instrument since the original astronomical telescope of Galileo." And what made all of this possible was NASA's willingness to refurbish the Hubble every few years to replace depleted batteries and gyroscopes and install new equipment. Many experts believe that when the Hubble gets two state-of-the-art instruments on the next servicing mission in 2008 it will be more capable than ever, ready to peer farther back into a time when galaxies were forming and the universe was emerging from darkness into light.

The threat to the Hubble's future came unexpectedly from NASA itself in early 2004. In a decision that can only be described as myopic, Sean O'Keefe, the administrator at the time, unexpectedly canceled the next servicing mission, ostensibly because of safety concerns after the Columbia disaster. But the underlying reason was almost certainly that a Hubble mission would be a diversion from the administration's priorities to complete the space station and then send astronauts back to the Moon and eventually Mars. Only intervention by Congress and the National Academy of Sciences kept the death sentence at bay.

Now Mr. Griffin has concluded that the mission can be conducted safely, especially since NASA has developed new inspection and orbital repair techniques, and that the mission will not interfere with other space priorities. A Hubble mission may be marginally more risky than a flight to the space station, but that risk is surely worth taking for the scientific payoff.

Ailing Hubble Gains New Life As Manned Missions Sputter (USAT)

USA Today, November 1, 2006

No mission of NASA's shuttle has been more exciting or successful than the one in 1993, when astronauts repaired the Hubble Space Telescope. After 11 days in orbit and a record five spacewalks, the crew of Endeavour replaced flawed components that had rendered Hubble's pictures blurry.

In so doing they made the telescope all it was supposed to be: a spectacularly powerful window on the universe that could deliver crisp and breathtaking images of far-off galaxies.

Astronauts have been back to the Hubble three more times. But the most important trip since 1993 will likely come in 2008. On Tuesday, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin announced a final service call to Hubble, reversing a decision by his predecessor, Sean O'Keefe, who had opted to let the space telescope die within the next few years rather than approve a mission that was seen as particularly risky after the Columbia disaster. This new mission will upgrade key parts and extend Hubble's life to about 2013.

Griffin made the right call. This mission poses more risks than most, but preserving one of NASA's most successful programs warrants it. The shuttle, moreover, has no other major duties besides completing the International Space Station, a program that faces an iffy future.

The shuttle's relationship with Hubble underscores a powerful irony. The shuttle never succeeded in its mission of dramatically increasing the human presence in space. That is because human space flight was, is, and likely will remain extraordinarily expensive and dangerous. But the shuttle has done one thing fabulously well: nurture one of NASA's most popular robotic programs.

Robotic missions were once secondary to the more glamorous manned missions. Now programs such as Hubble, and the Spirit and Opportunity rovers exploring Mars, are the stars while human space flight is in a prolonged identity crisis.

The shuttle is slated to die in 2010, largely unloved. Griffin said last year in a meeting with USA TODAY's editorial board that it had been a mistake. The space station has failed to deliver much science or enthusiasm and has been orphaned by the Bush administration. The current plan, to send astronauts back to the moon and on to Mars, is based on the dubious premise that it can rekindle interest in human space flight by retracing small steps and giant leaps made more than 30 years ago.

If future Congresses or presidents pull the plug on this program, there may still be a role for astronauts — as cosmic repairmen.

Consumer Confidence Data Soften Rally (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, November 1, 2006

More hand-wringing over the health of consumer spending caused another lackluster day for stocks Tuesday.

A weaker-than-expected Conference Board report on consumer confidence prompted some investors to lose their gusto for the October stock market rally. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 5.77 points to 12,080.73. Even so, the Dow is still up 12.7% for the year.

The two other major market indexes eked out small gains. The Nasdaq composite index added 2.94 points to 2366.71, pushing it up 7.3% this year.

And helped mainly by stocks in the construction materials, photo products and aluminum industries, the Standard & Poor's 500 rose 0.01 points to 1377.94. The S&P is up 10.4% this year.

Some worry too many investors were jumping on the market rally and losing sight of the fact that there are still some risks facing stocks and the economy. “The market got too saturated with buyers a few weeks ago,” says Chris Johnson at Schaeffer's Investment Research. He is concerned stocks in some leading industry groups, such as semiconductors, have been stalling. But he's not calling for big trouble yet. “I'm cautiously optimistic,” he says.

Gary Tapp, director of quantitative analysis at SunTrust Robinson Humphrey, says a pullback was overdue. “There's no question that the market got a little extended,” he says.

The rally was justified, Tapp says, due to a 22% decline in the price of oil and the Federal Reserve pausing its short-term interest rate increases. But a pullback, of about 3%, would be appropriate. “It went up too fast,” he says.

Highlights:

Trammel Crow, a commercial real estate company, jumped $9.65 to $48.75 after rival CB Richard Ellis agreed to buy it for $49.51 a share.

·Amerigroup, a managed health care company, fell $5.45 to $29.96. A federal jury determined the company should pay $144 million in damages for allegedly discouraging pregnant women from enrolling for coverage.

·Sirna Therapeutics, a biotech firm, jumped $6.18 to $12.63. The company said late Monday is was being acquired by Merck for $13 a share.

·Avanir Pharmaceuticals, a developer of disease treatments, tanked $3.42, or 46.2%, to $3.98. The company received an “approvable letter” from the Food and Drug Administration for its Zenvia treatment for emotional disorders. The letter was a disappointment to investors who were expecting the company to get an approval.

Dow Industrials Ease But Still Post Best Monthly Gain In Nearly A Year (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Stocks fell in the morning on more worries about consumer spending, then recovered in the afternoon as end-of-month buying kicked in. The result was little change for the day -- but a big gain for October.

DOJ_NMG_0089637

Amid continued hopes for low interest rates and moderate economic growth, the Dow Jones Industrial Average ended with a monthly gain of 3.4% -- the best monthly gain since November 2005. The Dow average has risen for four straight months, and was up in eight of 10 months this year.

For the day, the Dow industrials fell 5.77 points, or 0.05%, to 12080.73, still up 12.7% for 2006, and within sight of the record 12163.66 close reached last week.

Early in the day, investors learned that the Conference Board's measure of consumer confidence unexpectedly declined in October, raising fresh fears of lackluster holiday spending. A measure of manufacturing growth in the Chicago area also came in weaker than expected.

But as the Dow industrials neared the 12000 level during the day, stocks bounced back. Part of the reason was a belief that the economy is headed for the much-desired "Goldilocks" scenario -- with inflation not too hot and growth not too cold. That would support sustained growth and profits, and might even lead the Federal Reserve to cut interest rates, investors hope.

Mutual-fund companies, meanwhile, reached the end of their fiscal years. Some money managers were required by internal guidelines to be fully invested, and some used the Dow average's fall toward 12000 as an opportunity to buy stocks cheaply. That helped the market recover.

With third-quarter earnings season nearing an end, investors are wondering what the next driver will be for stock prices. "People know that interest rates aren't going higher, so the next driver is the economy," said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at New York brokerage firm Cowen & Co. "Slow growth isn't bad -- so the market could continue to move higher," he said, as long as the economy doesn't go in a ditch.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished virtually unchanged -- up 0.01 point -- at 1377.94, strengthening by 3.2% for the month and 10.4% in 2006. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 2.94 points, or 0.12%, to 2366.71, advancing 4.8% in October and 7.3% this year. Neither is near its record finish, both of which date from 2000.

Small stocks outpaced large ones in October, with the Russell 2000 small-stock index up 5.7%. It eased 0.46% yesterday, to 766.84, but is up 13.9% in 2006.

Stocks were helped last month by falling oil and gasoline prices, which took pressure off consumers and businesses. Crude-oil futures fell 6.6% in October and are off 3.8% in 2006, although they rose 37 cents to $58.73 a barrel yesterday.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 1.77 points, or 0.78%, to 228.60.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 1,682 stocks rose and 1,622 fell.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note gained 16/32, or $5 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.610%. The 30-year bond rose 31/32 to yield 4.721%.

The dollar weakened. Late in New York, it traded at 116.96 yen, down from 117.40 yen, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2763 from $1.2730.

Employment Costs Rise Faster, Adding To Inflation Concerns (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Employment costs gained in the third quarter at their fastest pace in more than two years, a development likely to keep Federal Reserve officials on edge about inflationary risks to the economy.

The employment-cost index rose 1% during the quarter after gaining 0.9% in the second quarter, the Labor Department reported. Employment costs were 3.3% higher than a year earlier, up from a 3% increase the previous quarter.

Since labor is the biggest expense for many businesses, the report suggests rising labor costs have the potential to keep underlying inflation high despite the recent drop in energy prices. "Labor costs remain a thorn in the side of the Fed's forecast for easing inflation pressures," wrote Gina Martin, an economist at Wachovia Corp., in a research note.

The Fed has kept its target for short-term interest rates unchanged at 5.25% for its past three meetings but has kept a bias toward higher rates should inflation persist.

Despite the upward pressure on prices apparent in yesterday's report, many economists expect the Fed to hold rates steady into 2007. "I think this Fed is committed to the current levels of rates because they think it'll slow the economy enough that over time it will ease inflationary pressures," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisers. "They need at least six more months to get a picture on whether their policy is working."

The pickup in employment costs, the fastest quarterly rise since the second quarter of 2004, was driven largely by compensation gains for state- and local-government workers. Private-sector employers have reduced their health-care and retirement obligations more aggressively than has the public sector. Benefit costs for state and local governments in the third quarter were 5.2% higher than a year earlier, while private-sector employers saw a smaller 2.8% rise.

Separately, the Conference Board, a private research group in New York, said its measure of consumer confidence fell slightly to 105.4 in October from 105.9 in September. Lynn Franco, the group's director of consumer research, said a mixed assessment of business conditions and a less favorable view of the job market caused the modest decline in overall sentiment.

Consumers' view of the current economic situation dimmed, and the proportion of consumers expecting their incomes to increase in the months ahead fell. The share of consumers saying jobs are "plentiful" declined, while the proportion saying jobs are "hard to get" rose.

Other gauges of consumer confidence advanced in October, and the Conference Board's measure of future economic conditions rose to its highest level in nearly a year.

As Vote Nears, Stances On War Set Off Sparks (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 31 — For at least a few hours on Tuesday, President Bush had a chance to relive his victorious campaign of 2004, taking a break from a bleak Republican campaign season as he attacked Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts over the war in Iraq.

Mr. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was Mr. Bush's opponent in 2004, is not running for office this year. But the president seized on what he said were Mr. Kerry's disparaging remarks about the troops — and what Mr. Kerry insisted was a botched joke aimed at Mr. Bush — as he sought to make Mr. Kerry the face of the Democratic Party this fall.

In the process, Mr. Bush brought renewed attention to the war in Iraq, which he defended with vigor while campaigning in Georgia, at the very moment that a number of Republican Congressional candidates, following the advice of party strategists, were stepping up their efforts to distance themselves from the White House on the war as the campaign enters its final days.

"President Bush isn't getting our frustrations — it's time to be decisive, beat the terrorists," Mike McGavick, the Republican candidate for Senate in Washington, said in an advertisement that began running this week. "Partition the country if we have to and get our troops home in victory."

In Rhode Island on Tuesday, Senator Lincoln Chafee, a Republican struggling against a challenge from Sheldon Whitehouse, an antiwar Democrat, began a new television advertisement reminding Rhode Island voters, "I stood against the Senate and president and voted no" on the war.

In a debate a day earlier, Mr. Chafee indicated he would be willing to call on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to step down; Mr. Whitehouse has been pressing Mr. Chafee to do just that in his television advertisements. In Tennessee, Bob Corker, a Republican candidate for Senate, said it was time for a new plan and a change in leadership at the Pentagon.

In New Jersey, Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican challenging Senator Robert Menendez, has started a new advertisement that says he wants to "change the course in Iraq; Replace Rumsfeld." In Indiana, John Hostettler, a Republican congressman, reminds voters in his latest advertisement that he voted against the invasion of Iraq because "the intelligence did not support the claim that there were weapons of mass destruction there."

To date, none of the Republicans who have spoken out have called for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, and some had expressed previous reservations about the war or opposed it initially. But their willingness to break so publicly with the White House in the closing days of the campaign — in some cases, with the active encouragement of the some of the party's own strategists — is evidence of the extent to which they view the war in Iraq as a lethal issue this fall.

It is especially striking because Mr. Bush has defended the war, and attacked Democrats over it, with increasing force in the last several days.

The mounting death toll in Iraq over the last month and apparent differences between the United States and the Iraqi government over how to proceed have given Democrats new opportunities to criticize Mr. Bush's handling of the conflict and make the case that electing a Democratic Congress is the first step toward finding a solution.

Across the country, Democrats are broadcasting television advertisements that feature battle scenes and photographs of their Republican opponent with Mr. Bush as they call for sharp changes in the Iraq strategy.

"We have certainly advised candidates to not appear that they are marching in lock step with the administration in terms of how the Iraq war is being conducted," a senior Republican Party Senate strategist said, insisting on anonymity in exchange for disclosing political advice being given to candidates. "If you aren't speaking out against the way that this war has been conducted, you are dead in the water."

"The candidates have been in a tough position for some time," this party official said. "The way that has been enunciated before — stay the course versus cut and run — any changes to that are certainly welcome."

DOJ_NMG_0089639

In attacking Mr. Kerry and defending the war, the White House clearly made the calculation that achieving what has been its main strategic goal this year — firing up a dispirited conservative base — would outweigh any risk that might come in spotlighting a war that Republican Party officials said had become a huge burden for its candidates. The White House took the unusual step of releasing advance excerpts of Mr. Bush's attacks.

In his remarks in California on Monday, Mr. Kerry said: "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Mr. Kerry said that he botched a joke that his aides said had been prepared as follows: "Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush."

Mr. Bush, speaking to a cheering crowd at a campaign rally late Tuesday afternoon in a half-empty arena at the Georgia National Fairgrounds in Perry, said Mr. Kerry had insulted the intelligence of Americans troops.

"The senator's suggestion that the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated is insulting, and it is shameful," he said. "The members of the United States military are plenty smart and they are plenty brave, and the senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology."

Mention of Senator Kerry's name drew boos, which were amplified after Mr. Bush quoted his remarks.

Mr. Kerry, a Vietnam veteran, called a news conference in which he accused Mr. Bush of twisting his words for political gain. "The White House's attempt to distort my true statement is a remarkable testament to their abject failure in making America safe," he said. "It's a stunning statement about their willingness to reduce anything in America to raw politics."

Some Democrats were quick to distance themselves from the man who had been their standard-bearer just two years ago.

"This is an example of politics at its worst," said Scott Kleeb, a Democratic candidate for Congress in Nebraska. "Many of us have serious concerns over the current situation in Iraq, but no one should question the intelligence and dedication of our troops. Senator Kerry's remark was disrespectful and insulting."

Still, at least some of the students who attended Mr. Kerry's speech at Pasadena City College said they did not think the senator was belittling troops.

"I don't think he was saying our soldiers are dummies," said Natalie Courtney, 21, the student body president, who said she was an independent. "I think he was saying you have to protect yourself. The current government does not have our best interest in mind. Don't let the government lie to you."

But Charles Huang, 19, a sophomore who described himself as one of the few conservatives at the college, said he was offended by the comment and thought Mr. Kerry did owe American troops an apology.

"I was kind of offended that someone would say that," Mr. Huang said. "I think he was trying to crack a joke, but it was inappropriate."

The contrast of Republican candidates distancing themselves from the White House even as Mr. Bush defended his policy again on Tuesday — "We will fight in Iraq and we will win in Iraq," he said to cheers in Georgia — reflects what Republican Party officials said was a pragmatic message they were sending to candidates: do whatever it takes to win.

In one sign of the deteriorating situation for Republicans, Mr. Bush is now expected to fly to Kansas this weekend to campaign on behalf of a Republican incumbent, Jim Ryun, who just a month ago was not considered endangered.

"Whatever they feel they've got to do to move their numbers, they have got to do," said one senior Republican Party official, who spoke on condition of anonymity in exchange for talking about party strategy. The official added that the White House believed it was better to have Republican candidates complaining than to have to deal with a Democratic Congress in January.

But asked about the advertisement by Mr. McGavick, the Republican candidate for Senate in Washington, a senior White House official, who requested anonymity to discuss political strategy, said, "That's not the message we'd be running."

Elliott Bundy, a spokesman for Mr. McGavick, said that the White House had not complained about the advertisement and that Mr. McGavick had to address Iraq head-on, given the public opposition to the war. "Iraq is the No. 1 issue, and you are fooling yourself if you think it isn't," Mr. Bundy said. "Even Republicans who think the mission is worthwhile, they're frustrated and the president doesn't seem to get it all the time."

On Tuesday, one week before Election Day, millions of dollars were being injected into the most competitive races in the country. Both sides were carefully tracking the day-by-day spending of their rivals and outside groups.

With a flurry of polls as their guide, Republicans redirected resources on Tuesday, pulling back on races in Colorado, Ohio and Pennsylvania in hopes of shoring up seats elsewhere. The largest infusion of money was reported in Missouri, Montana, Tennessee and Virginia.

White House, Kerry Exchange Accusations (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0089640

By Jennifer Loven
AP, November 1, 2006

The White House and Sen. John Kerry traded their harshest accusations since the 2004 presidential race on Tuesday, with President Bush accusing the Democrat of troop-bashing and Kerry calling the president's men hacks who are "willing to lie."

The war of words, tough even for this hard-fought campaign season, came after Kerry told a group of California students on Monday that those unable to navigate the country's education system "get stuck in Iraq."

The two parties are searching for any edge amid indications Democrats could take back the House and possibly win control of the Senate in next week's midterm elections. Though neither Bush nor Kerry is on any ballot, the bitterness with which they fought each other as 2004 rivals spilled over as both campaign hard for their parties in a race shaped in large measure by public doubts about the Iraq war.

White House press secretary Tony Snow was asked about Kerry's comment at his regular briefing with reporters, and had clearly come prepared with a lengthy attack. He said the quote "fits a pattern" of negative remarks about U.S. soldiers from the decorated Vietnam veteran and suggested that whether Democratic candidates — particularly those running on their military service backgrounds — agree with their 2004 standard-bearer should be a campaign litmus test.

Bush, campaigning later in Georgia, said Kerry's statement was "insulting and it is shameful."

"The members of the United States military are plenty smart and they are plenty brave and the senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology," Bush said during an appearance for a former GOP congressman, Mac Collins, who is trying to oust Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall. There were boos at the mention of Kerry's name and cheers at Bush's call for an apology.

Kerry, who is considering another run for the White House in 2008, angrily fired back.

At a hastily arranged news conference in Seattle, Kerry said: "I apologize to no one for my criticism of the president and of his broken policy."

Kerry said the comment in question was "a botched joke about the president and the president's people, not about the troops ... and they know that's what I was talking about."

It came during a campaign rally for California Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides. Kerry opened his speech at Pasadena City College with several one-liners, saying at one point that Bush had lived in Texas but now "lives in a state of denial."

He then said: "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

That, Kerry said, was meant as a reference to Bush, not troops. Kerry said it is the president who owes U.S. soldiers an apology — for "a Katrina foreign policy" that misled the country into war in Iraq, failed to adequately study and plan for the aftermath, has not properly equipped troops and has expanded the terrorist threat.

"I'm sick and tired of a bunch of despicable Republicans who will not debate real policy, who won't take responsibility for their own mistakes, standing up and trying to make other people the butt of those mistakes," he said. "It disgusts me that a bunch of these Republican hacks who've never worn the uniform of our country are willing to lie about those who did."

Unsubstantiated allegations about Kerry's Vietnam War heroism from a group called Swift Boat Veterans for Truth figured prominently in the 2004 Kerry-Bush race.

Other Republicans issued demands for an apology from Kerry.

GOP Sen. John McCain, like Kerry a decorated Vietnam veteran and a potential 2008 rival, said while campaigning for Republican candidates in Indiana that "the suggestion that only the least educated Americans would agree to serve in the military and fight in Iraq is an insult to every soldier serving in combat today."

Added House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., struggling to keep his party in control of Congress: "Our soldiers risk their lives in the face of grave dangers on the battlefield, and no one who chooses to courageously and selflessly defend our country can be considered 'uneducated.' "

Kerry Says He "botched Joke" And Lashes Out At GOP (BOS)

By Andrew Ryan
The Boston Globe, October 31, 2006

An angry Senator John F. Kerry castigated Republicans at a nationally televised press conference this afternoon, accusing conservatives of twisting his words of a "botched joke" to suggest that students who do poorly in school will end up as soldiers serving in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0089641

"My statement yesterday, and the White House knows this full well, was a botched joke about the President and the President's people not about the troops," Kerry said at a press conference in Seattle. "The White Houses attempt to distort my true statement is a remarkable testament to their abject failure making America safe.

Kerry continued: "I'm sick and tired of a whole bunch of Republican attacks, most of which come from people who never wore the uniform and never had the courage to stand up and go to war themselves."

The Democratic senator and 2004 presidential nominee has been under fire since he spoke Monday at campaign rally in California. According to the Pasadena Star-News: "Kerry then told the students that if they were able to navigate the education system, they could get comfortable jobs - "If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq," he said to a mixture of laughter and gasps."

Conservative pundits have accused Kerry of suggesting that if students don't do well in school, they could end up in Iraq. White House Spokesman Tony Snow and Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney both called on Kerry to apologize.

"I apologize to no one for my criticism of the President and of his broken policy," Kerry said this afternoon. "If anyone owes our troops in the fields an apology it is the President and his failed team and a Republican majority of the Congress that has been willing to stamp, rubber stamp, policies that have done injury to our troops and to their families."

Before Kerry's press conference, Romney issued a statement through his spokesman while he campaign from Republican gubernatorial candidates in Idaho and Oregon.

"Senator Kerry owes an apology to the thousands of men and women serving in Iraq, particularly the many patriotic soldiers from Massachusetts who come from all backgrounds to defend our freedoms," Romney said.

Kerry Draws Republican Fire Over Iraq Gaffe (FT)

By Edward Luce And Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

The Republican Party on Tuesday gained a late burst of energy in its flagging midterm election campaign following remarks by John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, in which he said college students could “get stuck in Iraq” if they do not study hard.

While campaigning in California, the Massachusetts senator told a college crowd on Monday: “You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don’t, you get stuck in Iraq.”

George W. Bush on Tuesday seized on Mr Kerry’s remarks: “The senator’s suggestion that the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated is insulting and shameful,” said the US president at an election rally in Georgia. “The men and women who serve in our all-volunteer Armed Forces are plenty smart – Senator Kerry owes them an apology.”

John McCain, the leading Republican contender for the 2008 presidential nomination and - like Mr Kerry - a veteran of the Vietnam war, also responded strongly: “The suggestion that only the least educated Americans would agree to serve in the military and fight in Iraq is an insult to every soldier serving in combat.”

Republican strategists, who have been watching helplessly as opinion polls have turned against them in the last six weeks, on Tuesday drew renewed purpose from a gaffe that many believe could help motivate the party’s demoralised supporters to turn out to vote at the polls next Tuesday.

Meanwhile some Democratic strategists worried about Mr Kerry’s response to the Republican Party’s criticism of his comments, which appeared to deepen the controversy. Mr Kerry referred to Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, as a “stuffed suit” and said that his remarks had been directed at Mr Bush rather than at US soldiers serving in Iraq.

“It disgusts me that these Republican hacks, who have never worn the uniform of our country, lie and distort so blatantly and carelessly about those who have,” said Mr Kerry. “If anyone thinks a veteran would criticise the more than 140,000 heroes serving in Iraq and not the president who got us stuck there, they’re crazy.”

Mr Kerry’s ebullient response was in sharp contrast to the way he handled the 2004 presidential campaign, in which his campaign team waited more than a week before responding to the negative advertisements put out by the “Swift Boat” veterans questioning the senator’s war record.

“This was a slip of the tongue and the American people are not going to let this sway them over the important issues facing them in this election, which includes the Iraq war,” said Simon Rosenberg head of the New Democratic Network, a centrist group in Washington.

However, some Democrats suggested Mr Kerry’s remarks would almost certainly damage his presidential hopes. “Senator Kerry botched his remarks – as he has in the past,” said James Carville, campaign manager for Bill Clinton in the 1990s. “But Mr Bush has botched the war in Iraq.”

Bush Calls Kerry Remarks Insulting To U.S. Troops (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0089642

By Jim VandeHei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

President Bush last night accused Sen. John F. Kerry of disparaging U.S. troops in Iraq, echoing the 2004 strategy of ridiculing the Massachusetts senator to raise anew questions about Democratic leaders and their commitment to the troops. The highly coordinated White House effort came as Republicans sought to shift the focus away from an unpopular war and GOP scandals that are putting their congressional majorities at risk.

The controversy erupted after Kerry told a California audience on Monday: "Education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. And if you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Yesterday, Bush, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the American Legion and many GOP candidates pounced on the comment from the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee to accuse him of insulting U.S. troops. The president said Kerry owes service members an apology -- echoing a parade of prominent Republicans who criticized the Massachusetts Democrat throughout the day.

After reading Kerry's comments to a GOP audience in Georgia, Bush said Kerry's statement was "insulting and it is shameful. The members of the United States military are plenty smart and they are plenty brave, and the senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology." The White House tipped off the networks to when Bush would attack Kerry, so the comments could be carried live and make the evening news.

In his defense, Kerry said that his comment was a "botched joke" and that he was referring to Bush's intellect, not that of American military personnel serving in Iraq.

In a statement released only moments after Bush spoke, Kerry said: "I make apologies to no one about my criticism of the President and his broken policy that kills and maims our heroes in Iraq every single day. This pathetic attempt to distort a botched joke about President Bush is a shameful effort to distract from a botched war."

The unusual back-and-forth that has little to do with the 2006 midterm elections comes as Democrats are planning to end the campaign by bashing Bush and GOP candidates for supporting the U.S. war policy. A senior Democratic strategist said the party will run Iraq-focused ads in at least 15 of the most competitive House races between now and Election Day.

The strategist, who would not discuss internal strategy on the record, said the Kerry comments are an unnecessary distraction but would soon be forgotten. Democrats, who faulted Kerry for failing to respond forcefully enough two years ago, said the senator fell into a GOP trap of debating Democratic support for the troops instead of Bush's management of the war.

With less than one week until the elections, Democrats are trying to expand the number of competitive House races by running ads in districts that are normally reliably Republican. The list includes the districts of several GOP incumbents, including Rep. Ron Lewis (Ky.), who won in 2004 with more than 60 percent of the vote. It is not just Democrats who see the House playing field expanding. The Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan handicapper of races, added the races of several Republicans to its chart of highly competitive contests, including the one for Rep. Jim Ryun's Kansas seat, for which Democrats started running ads over the weekend.

All these numbers and rankings show that Democrats have successfully expanded the playing field beyond the traditional 20 to 30 competitive races the parties have fought over for the past several cycles. As a result, Democrats no longer have to win 80 percent of the tossup races to win the 15 seats they need for the majority. They have built in some room for error and, by doing so, have improved their chances of taking control on Nov. 7.

Republicans -- whose endgame strategy is to limit losses -- are trimming spending for open seats in Colorado and Ohio, which they expect to lose, to help protect endangered GOP incumbents in the final days. They plan to end the campaign by warning that a Democratic Congress would raises taxes and liberalize social policy.

Some candidates are also playing up the economy, with a Washington Post-ABC News survey finding consumer confidence at a three-year high. Republicans said some races that looked bleak a few weeks ago appear more competitive, citing the contest for the Texas seat vacated by former House majority leader Tom DeLay.

In the Senate races, Democratic strategists said that, based on their internal polls, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) now appears more vulnerable than Sen. James M. Talent (R-Mo.). Several public polls released over the past few days show former Navy secretary James Webb (D-Va.) leading Allen.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee plans to spend an additional $1 million to prop up Allen. Republicans also intend to spend more money than originally planned to assist Sen. Conrad Burns (Mont.) in a race that many GOP strategists had written off a few weeks ago. Democrats need to pick up six seats to win control of the Senate.

Kerry, White House Exchange Words Over Iraq 'Bad Joke' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 1, 2006

A bitter dispute about Iraq that dominated the 2004 campaign between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry resurfaced Tuesday as they traded barbs a week before voters decide control of Congress.

Kerry told a college crowd Monday: "You know education, if you make the most of it, and you study hard, and you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Bush said Kerry's comments were "insulting" and "shameful" to U.S. troops. "The members of the United States military are plenty smart, and they are plenty brave, and the senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology," the president said Tuesday at a rally in Georgia.

Kerry, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, said his comments at Pasadena City College in Southern California were distorted by "assorted right-wing nut jobs." He said he was trying to make a joke about Bush and his team's preparations for the Iraq war.

The dust-up came a day after Rep. Charles Rangel called Vice President Dick Cheney "a son of a bitch" for saying the New York Democrat doesn't know how the economy works.

Stephen Wayne, a government professor at Georgetown University, said the barbs foreshadow "two years of strident, partisan rhetoric" regardless of who controls Congress after Nov. 7.

Polls show Democrats are in a position to win control of the House of Representatives and possibly even the Senate.

"It does not facilitate compromise," Wayne said. "It does not facilitate legislative output."

Thomas Mann, co-author of The Broken Branch, a book on Congress, said Kerry gave Republicans "a target" just days before the election, the outcome of which will affect the remainder of Bush's presidency. He's not sure, however, if the Bush-Kerry flap will have a long-term impact.

"These things have a shelf life of about a half-hour," he said.

The Cheney-Rangel spat began with the vice president's warnings about a Democrat-controlled House. If Democrats pick up 15 seats, Rangel is in line to lead the House Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax laws.

In two TV interviews Monday, Cheney cited Rangel's objections to Bush's tax cuts and predicted Rangel would block efforts to renew them. "I think Charlie doesn't understand how the economy works," Cheney said on Fox News.

Rangel responded, when asked by the New York Post, that Cheney is "such a real son of a bitch, he just enjoys a confrontation."

On Tuesday, White House press secretary Tony Snow said Cheney did not take Rangel's comments personally and "had a big hearty laugh" when told of them.

Rangel expressed regret in an interview with USA TODAY but did not back down. "It's not the first time the vice president has taken a cheap shot at me," he said. "I should have just ignored it."

A year ago, Cheney said Rangel might be "losing it" after the New York Democrat compared Bush to Bull Connor, the segregationist Alabama official who resisted civil rights in the 1960s. Rangel, a Korean War veteran, has also accused Cheney of "sending other people's kids to war." Cheney did not serve in the military.

Rangel said he tends not to deal with Cheney on policy issues and prefers to work on fiscal matters with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, whom he has praised.

While not predicting the results of Election Day, Rangel said Americans are tired of all the political bickering: "Republicans and Democrats are going to have to work together if we don't want gridlock."

Bush, Kerry Clash As Campaigns Heat Up (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- On a day of heated coast-to-coast campaign confrontations, highlighted by a confrontation between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry, a flurry of surveys showed the battle for a Senate majority heading for a photo finish that could hinge on a tight contest in Missouri.

Tuesday's rapid fire developments included the sharp collision between familiar antagonists -- the White House and Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who lost to Bush in the 2004 presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0089644

Kerry and Republicans, led by Bush, exchanged fire long-distance over whether the senator disparaged American troops in Iraq during a Monday rally for California Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides.

After urging students to make the most of their educational opportunities, Kerry had said, "If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Late Tuesday afternoon, Bush told a cheering throng in Georgia that Kerry's remarks were "insulting" and "shameful," and he called on him to apologize to U.S. troops.

Earlier in the day, Kerry had rejected similar calls from other Republicans. At a hastily arranged news conference in Seattle, Kerry said his comment was "a botched joke about the president and the president's people, not about the troops," and he renewed his attacks on what he termed Bush's "broken policy" in Iraq.

Later, responding directly to Bush in a statement, Kerry said: "This pathetic attempt to distort a botched joke about President Bush is a shameful effort to distract from a botched war."

The pointed criticism of Kerry made clear that the GOP believed he had provided an opening to press its case that Democrats could not be trusted to safeguard America's national security -- an argument Republicans hoped would turn voters to their side in a number of Tuesday's House and Senate races.

Also Tuesday, a new controversy erupted in one of the key, and nastiest, Senate campaigns -- the re-election bid by Republican George Allen of Virginia.

Allen faced criticism from Democrats over taped footage showing his supporters tackling a student who approached him at an event in Charlottesville, Va., and accused him of spitting on his first wife.

The furor over Kerry and the new flap surrounding Allen reflected the intensity of a crucial midterm campaign now in its final days. The series of new polls released in the last two days showed Democrats edging closer to the net gain of six seats they need to control the Senate majority -- even as national Republicans launched new campaign advertisements in states they believe they are gaining ground.

Phil Singer, communications director for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee said of his party's prospects: "You can see the light, but it's hardly a done deal."

Brian Nick, his counterpart at the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said that in his view, the polling underscored that control of the Senate would be determined by get-out-the-vote operations. The GOP generally is considered more adept at these efforts, based on its performance in recent elections.

With the outcome of the battle for the Senate in doubt, Democrats remain confident that they are on track to win the 15 seats they need to control the House. But again, Republicans -- while expecting to lose seats -- predict their organizational prowess will help them hang onto a majority in the chamber.

At his stop in Georgia, campaigning for a GOP challenger to a Democratic House member, the president said, "You may not agree with Republicans on every issue, but you should also realize what voting Democrat in this election would mean for the war on terror."

Focusing on Kerry's comment, Bush said, "The senator's suggestion that the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated is insulting and it is shameful."

Saying that U.S. troops "are plenty smart and they are plenty brave, Bush added that Kerry "owes them an apology."

In his statement released after Bush's speech, Kerry said, "I make apologies to no one about my criticism of the president and his broken policy that kills and maims our heroes in Iraq every single day. ... President Bush owes an apology to our troops and to their families for his disaster in Iraq."

Before Bush took him to task, Kerry was harshly criticized by White House press secretary Tony Snow, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and other leading Republicans -- al of whom said the Democrat's comment impugned the intelligence of those in the military.

In his statement, as he did so often during his presidential campaign, Kerry referred to his highly decorated military service in Vietnam to rebut that charge. "As a combat veteran, I know the dedication, integrity, and commitment of American troops," he said. "I've lived it."

He also noted -- again as he did frequently during his White House quest -- that neither Bush nor Vice President Dick Cheney had been in combat.

The incident involving Allen occurred when Mike Stark, a University of Virginia law student who operates a liberal blog, approached the senator and loudly asked "Why did you spit at your first wife, George?" according to The Associated Press.

Allen was married to Anne Waddell from 1980 to 1984; after their divorce, he remarried.

Three men wearing Allen stickers grabbed Stark, removed him from the hall and threw him to the ground.

The Democratic Senate Campaign Committee quickly distributed via e-mail a video clip of the encounter from a local television station.

DOJ_NMG_0089645

Allen's campaign did not return calls seeking comment about the incident. But Nick, the NRSC official, dismissed the Democratic criticism. "Obviously this is a United States Senator and you have to be concerned about someone's safety," he said.

The new surveys showed Democrats holding clear advantages against two of their top targets. In Pennsylvania, separate polls released this week by the Philadelphia Inquirer and a local radio station showed Democrat Bob Casey Jr. maintaining a double-digit advantage over Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

In Ohio, a CNN survey released Tuesday showed Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown leading Republican Sen. Mike DeWine by 54 percent to 43 percent among likely voters.

The CNN surveys released Tuesday also showed Democrat Sen. Bob Menendez holding a 51 percent to 44 percent lead over Republican Thomas Kean Jr. in New Jersey. Four statewide surveys released over the past week have showed Menendez re-establishing a lead of five to seven percentage points.

The most recent public polls have also shown Democratic challengers leading Republican incumbents Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Conrad Burns in Montana. But GOP strategists say they believe both states are still within reach, especially Montana, where President Bush is scheduled to campaign Thursday.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee launched a new advertising buy Tuesday to support Burns, who trailed State Sen. Jon Tester by 46 percent to 43 percent in the last major public poll..

The NRSC also launched a new advertising buy in Maryland, where Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, who is black, is opposing Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin for the seat being vacated by Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes.

Democrats dismiss the GOP optimism, pointing to a Washington Post survey released last weekend that showed Cardin leading Steele by 54 percent to 43 percent among likely voters.

If Democrats maintained the survey leads they now hold in all six of those races, and no other surprises emerge, the party would win a Senate majority if they can capture at least two of the three contests in Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri.

Another CNN survey, completed before Tuesday's incident involving the law student, showed Webb advancing to a 50 percent to 46 percent lead over Allen. Though that advantage was within the poll's margin of error, it tracked with a new Democratic poll and a Times/Bloomberg survey last week that showed Webb overtaking Allen, who had narrowly lead in most polls until recently.

In Tennessee, another CNN survey released Tuesday showed Corker leading Ford by 52 percent to 44 percent among likely voters, and by 47 percent to 45 percent among all registered voters.

Finally, the new polls confirm Missouri's status as the nation's closest race -- and the contest that could tip the Senate.

CNN showed Republican Sen. Jim Talent and Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill, the state auditor, tied at 49 percent among likely voters, though McCaskill held an eight percentage point lead among all registered voters. In the last ten statewide polls compiled on the Website RealClearPolitics.com, neither Talent nor McCaskill has ever held a lead of more than three percentage points.

"This is a classic 51-49 race," said Del Ali, the president of Research 2000, an independent company that polls in the state. "Regardless of who wins, it is going to be disputed."

Iraq War Dominates Election's Final Days (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

In early October, voters in a rural Pennsylvania congressional district received a political mailing that accused the front-runner in the race of using erroneous intelligence to help sell the Iraq war.

The language in the campaign brochure -- which told voters the candidate "failed the nation once" and urged them not to give him "a chance to fail us again" -- wasn't unusual in the home stretch of an election dominated by the war. The surprising part was who issued it.

Although the flier included standard Democratic talking points criticizing the administration's rationale for the war in Iraq, it was sent by the Republican Federal Committee of Pennsylvania, the state party working to protect the incumbent, Rep. Don Sherwood. Mr. Sherwood is facing a challenge by Democrat Chris Carney, a Navy veteran who served in a Pentagon intelligence unit in the run-up to the war.

With many polls showing the challenger ahead, the Republicans accused Mr. Carney of leading the nation to war by arguing there was a relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda -- in effect tying Mr. Carney to a pivotal part of the administration's prewar rationale for the invasion.

"I was stunned when I saw the mailing," Mr. Carney says in an interview. "The audacity of accusing someone of starting the war is itself ridiculous. And to impugn someone's military service smacks of desperation."

The fireworks in the Pennsylvania contest highlight a dynamic emerging in the final days before next week's midterm elections. With polls showing that the Iraq war could cost Republicans control of at least one house of Congress, some Republican candidates throughout the country are playing down their past support for the war and beginning to sound like their Democratic opponents when discussing the conflict.

After years of ceding the national security issue to the Republicans, Democrats recruited a slate of military veterans as candidates and are challenging Republicans over Iraq and the party's strategy in the broader war on terror. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) told a New Hampshire newspaper last week Republican candidates should get voters to "focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

Iraq is a vexing issue for both parties, and Democrats are struggling with the war. Leading figures within the party have failed to coalesce around a single strategy for reducing the violence there, and Democratic leaders have offered diverging strategies for Iraq that range from beginning a troop withdrawal before the end of the year to splitting the country into three ethnic regions.

Democrats also are struggling to find a way of criticizing the administration's handling of Iraq without appearing to denigrate the U.S. military personnel serving there. The difficulty of striking such a balance was apparent this week when White House spokesman Tony Snow accused Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts of troop-bashing after Mr. Kerry told students in California that those who don't do well in school "get stuck in Iraq." Mr. Kerry said the comment was a reference to Mr. Bush.

Republicans are facing the bigger problem, as Iraq dominates the public mood before Election Day. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found 37% of registered voters believe the war has been worth its financial and human cost, the lowest level recorded to date in the survey. The poll found that anger over the war in Iraq continues to be the biggest single issue bringing voters to the polls.

Shifting Republican rhetoric on the war is notable for a party that has hewed to the administration's Iraq policies and been reluctant to directly criticize the war effort there. The White House itself last week dropped its "stay the course" language after increasing numbers of Republican lawmakers made clear that they wanted to see a change of plan in Iraq.

Some Republicans have gone further. In Montana, Republican Sen. Conrad Burns raised eyebrows at a debate with Democratic opponent Jon Tester, when he seemed to suggest the White House had a secret plan for ending the war in Iraq. "If you want to go out and spar for a fight, are you going to tell your enemy what your plan is? I don't think so," Mr. Burns said to Mr. Tester. "There is a plan. We're not going to tell you, Jon."

Jason Klindt, a spokesman for the Burns campaign, said the senator "misspoke" during the debate and wasn't "claiming access to any secret" White House or Pentagon deliberations about Iraq. "He used the word 'plan,' but he had meant to talk about 'tactics' and 'benchmarks,'" Mr. Klindt said. "He was saying that you never give away your tactics to your enemy."

In Connecticut -- a state where support for the war is lower than the national average -- Republican incumbent Rep. Chris Shays said at a debate late last month that the U.S. "should have gone in sooner but not for weapons of mass destruction." Mr. Shays is in a tight race against Democratic challenger Diane Farrell, who has been hammering her opponent for continuing to support the Iraq war.

Mr. Shays's campaign manager, Michael Sohn, says the comment was a reference to the lawmaker's belief that the U.S. should have invaded Iraq when former ruler Saddam Hussein launched a crackdown on Shiite and Kurdish guerrillas during the early 1990s.

In Pennsylvania, the Sherwood-Carney race is shaping up as one of the nastiest in the country. The Republican ran unopposed in 2004, but has seen his electoral prospects deteriorate after a former mistress accused him of trying to choke her. Mr. Sherwood has admitted to the extramarital affair, and apologized for it, but denied the choking allegations.

The state Republican Party is targeting Mr. Carney for his prewar work in a small Pentagon office called the Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group, which helped prepare intelligence reports -- later discounted -- that accused Iraq of having ties to al Qaeda.

The Republican mailing cites a report in Mother Jones, a liberal magazine, which specifically mentions Mr. Carney's Pentagon intelligence unit, and a quote from Mr. Carney criticizing the Iraq war. "Chris Carney attacks the same war he helped start," the brochure says. The New York Sun reported earlier about the mailing.

Matt Burns, a spokesman for the state Republican Party, says the mailing was meant to underscore Mr. Carney's "hypocrisy" about Iraq. "This is a conservative district, and when Carney talks to people here he likes to point out the fact that he worked as a Pentagon intelligence analyst. But when he has Democrats like Charlie Rangel come in and fund-raise for him, he denounces the war," Mr. Burns says, referring to the veteran New York Democratic congressman.

Mr. Sherwood's campaign didn't return requests for comment yesterday.

In a race that includes some Republican campaign ads that read as if they were written by Democrats, it is perhaps no surprise that Mr. Carney occasionally sounds like a Republican. The Democratic challenger says he remains convinced that there were ties between Iraq and al Qaeda.

"On a scale from one to 10, where zero is no relationship and 10 is complete operational unity, it was a 2.5," he says.

Mr. Carney says the invasion itself may have been justified by what he sees as evidence of a relationship between Mr. Hussein and Osama bin Laden's terror group. Still, he says, "if you make that decision to go to war, you damn well better be prepared, and they weren't. That's what my race is all about."

October 31, 2006, 6:40 pm Iraq Worries Boost Dems, WSJ/NBC News Poll Finds

President Bush is getting improved marks for his handling of the economy, a new WSJ/NBC News poll finds, but fellow Republicans aren't benefiting as voters focus on Iraq. By a 15-point margin, voters want Democrats rather than Republicans to control Congress. Also, a 54% majority of the electorate now says removing Saddam Hussein from power wasn't worth the human and financial costs, the poll finds.

The national telephone survey of 1,010 voters, conducted Oct 28-30, doesn't account for the vagaries of races for individual Senate seats or House districts; the margin for error is 3.1 percentage points. In the House, Republicans are counting on several factors to withstand the hostile national winds: the political strengths of embattled incumbents, district boundaries drawn after each census to protect them, and Republicans' proven turnout operations.

But the poll's overall findings track the assessments of key strategists in both parties that Democrats have a strong chance of achieving at least the 15-seat gain they need to recapture control of the House. The outcome is cloudier in the Senate, where Democrats must gain six seats to reach a majority. Read the full article. – John Harwood and Jackie Calmes

October 31, 2006, 4:43 pm November Surprise?

President Bush will hold no public events of any kind on Wednesday, an exceptionally light schedule this close to next Tuesday's midterm elections. That sparked questions about whether Bush has a "November surprise" in store. This is, after all, a president who has twice managed to sneak away to Iraq.

At the White House morning briefing, a reporter observed that the light schedule made it sound "like something is cooking there." Spokesman Tony Snow replied, "No, not really."

That left some Democratic political operatives wondering just what Bush and his political guru, Karl Rove, might be up to. Despite polls showing Democrats poised to take control of the House and possibly the Senate, many Democrats remain fearful Rove will pull something out of his hat–disclosing the death or capture of Osama bin Laden, for instance–that will help Republican snatch victory from the jaws of defeat.

If so, Snow is keeping on his poker face. Bush has "some meetings with senior advisers and a Rush Limbaugh interview," Snow said in an email. "No blockbusters." –Yochi J. Dreazen

Foley Mark Foley isn't checking out of rehab just yet, the Palm Beach Post reports. The former congressman, who quit the House abruptly in late September after being confronted with sexually charged Internet messages to teenage male pages, has been under treatment for alcoholism since Oct. 1 at the Sierra Tucson Treatment Center . The stay, originally planned for 30 days, has been extended indefinitely. "Mark has not left the program," a source told the paper. "His release date has yet to be determined."

October 31, 2006, 3:44 pm CNBC Video: Obama, Kennedy, Frist

Big names made predictions in CNBC appearances today. Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy said that domestic and foreign policy issues make next week's races the most important election of his generation; Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) said efficient health-care will be his primary focus, should the Democrats take control of the Senate next week; Sen. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) said he thinks that people are starting to pay attention to races, with the economy figuring more importantly than past scandals. Also, Meet the Press's Tim Russert outlined key Senate races and said that current surveys show Republicans are likely to lose House and Senate seats in next week's election — the question is how many.

October 31, 2006, 2:41 pm Fight Club Meets Brooks Brothers at Allen Event

Ripples of excitement washed anew through Democratic circles this afternoon, as word began spreading that staffers for Virginia Republican Sen. George Allen roughed up someone at an event at a Charlottesville hotel this morning.

Lo and behold, NBC's affiliate in Charlottesville was on hand for the event and was kind enough to post video from its noon broadcast of the scuffle, which actually isn't as much of a throwdown as we were led to believe.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee immediately sent out an alert about the incident and it got above-the-fold treatment on its Drudge Report parody, the Fudge Report . According to the NBC affiliate, the man was yelling and asking Allen, "Why did you spit on your first wife?"

Blogger W. Michael Stark immediately claimed credit for being the guy in the video, and sent a blast email to political reporters saying he plans to press charges against Allen's staffers this afternoon. "I demand that Senator Allen fire the staffers who beat up a constituent attempting to use his constitutional right to petition his government," he said. "I also want to know why Senator Allen would want his staffers to assault someone asking questions about matters of public record in the heat of a political campaign. Why are his divorce records sealed? Why was he arrested in the 1970s? And why did his campaign batter me when I asked him about these questions?" –Amy Schatz

Chief executives from some of the largest financial service institutions peg "protectionism" as the single biggest threat to continued U.S. economic growth, and they also rank the regulatory environment as a top concern.

Still, a survey by the Financial Services Forum, a group of 20 CEOs from the largest financial institutions, found that most executives expect strong or very strong growth in the U.S. economy over the next year. Their views on the global economy are somewhat tamer, with a majority predicting just "some growth" over the next year.

Paulson

Not surprisingly, the CEOs don't share the concerns of many Democrats in Washington when it comes to China. A majority said they see China as an opportunity for U.S. business, while none labeled it as a threat. The CEOs also predicted that China will fuel global economic growth, with the U.S. just behind the Asian giant.

In the U.S., terrorism, "frivolous" litigation and energy prices are top concerns. Coming in at No. 3 on the list was the "regulatory environment," which is under attack from business in the wake of Sarbanes-Oxley and a crackdown on corporate misbehavior. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who previously chaired the Financial Services Forum, has indicated he, too, has concerns about the regulatory environment and has backed a private-sector effort to recommend regulatory and legal changes. –Deborah Solomon

The lawyer who disclosed President Bush's drunk-driving arrest just before the 2000 election was arrested in South Portland, Maine, after he was spotted on a highway overpass dressed as Osama bin Laden and toting a fake assault rifle, the Associated Press reports.

The costume, according to AP, came equipped with plastic dynamite, plastic grenades, and a plastic replica of an AK-47. Tom Connolly, 49 years old, was charged with criminal threatening, a misdemeanor. Connolly was carrying a sign that read "I love TABOR," (that's the Taxpayer Bill of Rights on the Maine ballot in the Nov. 7 election). But someone who saw it thought it read "I love the Taliban," according to the South Portland Police Chief Ed Googins. "The whole thing is just incredibly bizarre," Googins said.

October 31, 2006, 12:42 pm Where's the Nixon Mask?

It's Halloween and the politicos and partisans are trying to scare us.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt emails a news release: "Nancy Pelosi's 'Liberal Shop of Horrors'; All Tricks, No Treats For America."

"If Nancy Pelosi is elected Speaker, the American people not only have to fear a liberal San Francisco agenda, but the real concern might be what bills she refuses to allow the House to consider in the first place," the Missouri Republican warns. "The president can always veto out-of-the-mainstream legislation, but he can't force the Congress to consider a bill."

If that doesn't send a shiver, he elaborates: "Can the American people trust liberal San Francisco values when it comes to our nation's priorities on immigration reform, tax relief, job creation, and homeland security?"

Seems the Halloween spirit is floating around Missouri today. The National Republican Senatorial Committee takes off after Show-Me State Democrat Claire McCaskill, who is running a close race for the Senate against Republican incumbent Jim Talent. "Halloween Special! Claire McCaskill's Horrifying Record Of Hypocrisy," screams the headline. It quotes NRSC spokesman Brian Walton saying "Claire McCaskill's hypocrisy really is scary, on issue after issue. From failing to protect seniors in nursing homes to hiding behind her husband's money, McCaskill's hypocrisy knows no bounds."

The Democrats apparently caught the fervor early. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee posted a video (complete with pumpkin) on youtube on April 18, highlighting the troubles of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, indicted vice presidential aide Lewis I. "Scooter" Libby and others.

Elsewhere on YouTube, a couple of lighthearted Halloween-themed political videos have popped up. Try "I'm a Democrat", written by John Kramer and directed by Jeff Hadick, or Halloween HamNation from conservative blogger Mary Katharine Ham.

In California, the Republican Party of Orange County takes a Web poll on favorite Halloween costumes: princess, ghost, Dracula, pirate, pumpkin, superhero, witch.

What? No politicians?

Update: The theme has caught on! These just in:

The Rev. Louis P. Sheldon of the Traditional Values Coalition, sends a bloodcurdling email, "Halloween Horror: Federal Court Reform Will Die If Liberals Take Senate." "If we fail," he warns, "the horrors of judicial tyranny will multiply like bodies in a Freddy Krueger movie. Last week, for example, the New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that homosexuals must be granted the same rights and privileges as heterosexual married couples…."

A Democratic National Committee email says, "This Halloween, Republicans in Washington can once again only offer tricks and empty rhetoric to America's hard-working families and seniors, as the GOP saves the treats for their special interest friends." –Mary Lu Carnevale

Another day, another round of polling data released to help track how the handful of competitive Senate races might end up this year.

CNN's polling data, done with Opinion Research, shows Democratic candidates holding onto slim margins in three of five races, including Ohio, Virginia and New Jersey. Republican Bob Corker held a sizable 52%-44% margin in Tennessee over Rep. Harold Ford Jr. And in Missouri, Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill and Republican Sen. Jim Talent were tied at 49% of likely voters. Just 1% of those polled expressed no opinion on the race. The poll has a 4% margin of error.

DOJ_NMG_0089650

Could the New Jersey Senate race be safely in control of the Democrats now? The CNN poll was just one of several released this morning on the race, which is the one seat Democrats have worried they could lose to a Republican challenger. Sen. Bob Menendez is trying to hold onto a seat that he was appointed to by now-Gov. Jon Corzine against Republican Tom Kean. A Strategic Vision poll out this morning shows Mendenez barely ahead of Kean at 43% to 42%, far closer than CNN's 51% to 44%. Meanwhile, a Quinnipiac poll gives Menendez a 5% point advantage.

In the Zogby Battlegrounds poll released late Monday, Menendez was ahead by six points in New Jersey, while Corker led by a little more than a point in Tennessee. Talent was up by a little more than a point in Missouri. –Amy Schatz

October 31, 2006, 10:00 am Alaska's Rep. Young Sees No Lost Seats for GOP

Forget the polls, prognosticators and angsty anonymous quotes from Republican Party insiders, Alaska's only congressman, Republican Don Young, has a prediction of his own: House Republicans won't lose any seats next week.

Arguing that the solidifying convention wisdom that Republicans will lose control of the House next week is a creation of the media, Young told an Associated Press reporter: "I'm predicting we're not going to lose any seats." Young added: "My prediction is as good as anybody else's. The day after the election, we'll see who was right."

One thing there's very little doubt about is that the 16-term congressman will be returning to Washington. But the congressman has apparently been running something of a stealth campaign this year, according to the Anchorage Daily News, which mentioned his less-than-rigorous campaign schedule in a story last week.

Noting it's almost impossible to find his campaign's Web site on a Google search, the paper said: "Asked where someone could go to hear Young speak before Election Day, his campaign manager, Steven Dougherty, said: 'A campaign event? We do not have any campaign event.'"

The story apparently didn't sit well with the congressman, who told AP that his campaigning this year isn't particularly different from those he's run in the past and it's too bad if the Daily News doesn't like it.

"I'm not running the campaign for the Daily Screw," Young told AP. "My job is to hear people, find out what's on their minds." – Amy Schatz

October 31, 2006, 7:44 am Early Turnout May Boost GOP

Down in the polls and with their majorities in Congress at risk, Republicans say they have some good news in early-voting statistics that suggest their voter-turnout machine is providing an edge in some tight races. If the trend holds, it could mean that early voting is growing — and continuing to benefit Republicans, who exploited the practice in the 1990s. Experts say early voters could be a bigger factor this year when overall voter turnout could be lower than in 2004, a presidential-election year.

This year, though, Democrats contend that Republicans are exaggerating their successes so far, by highlighting a few races, while ignoring problems they are having in motivating their troops around the country. Democrats also questioned several specific Republican claims, while noting their own early-voting numbers show they are starting to catch up with their rivals in early get-out-the-vote efforts in battleground states such as Iowa.

In congressional districts from Ohio and Florida to New Mexico and Arizona, Republicans report that their get-out-the-vote organization is gaining traction a week ahead of Election Day. The aim of the effort generally is to maximize turnout among their most loyal and reliable voters. If successful, it could help them to hold down their losses in this election cycle and perhaps even retain their majorities in the House and Senate. Read the full article. – John D. Kerry Cancels Mankato Appearance (MFP)

Mankato Free Press, November 1, 2006

The dueling rallies scheduled for Mankato today on behalf of Republican congressman Gil Gutknecht and Democratic challenger Tim Walz lost some of their pizzaz Tuesday night when Sen. John Kerry pulled out of the Democratic rally.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the front-runner for the 2008 Republican nomination for president, is the star attraction at a rally at the Midwest Wireless Civic Center for Gutknecht and Gov. Tim Pawlenty.

Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee pulled out of the DFL event, which will still be held, as the result of a controversy over comments he made Monday inCalifornia.

DOJ_NMG_0089651

Walz communication director Meredith Salsbery said Kerry canceled his visit to keep the focus on the issues and away from Kerry's comments and McCain's response.

She wouldn't comment on whether Walz asked Kerry not to campaign for him, but said the decision was ultimately the senator's choice.

Both of today's rallies are free and open to the public and are expected to last about an hour. McCain will be in the East Banquet Hall at the Civic Center. The event begins at 10:10 a.m., but people need to arrive by 9:50 a.m. The doors open at 9:15 a.m. No backpacks or other bags are allowed.

Doors open at MSU's Taylor Center at 11 a.m. for the Walz event with music by Martin Zellar beginning at 11:15 a.m. The rally begins at noon. Parking around campus is expected to be very limited, but shuttle buses will run starting at 10:30 a.m. from the Madison East Center.

Braley Asks Kerry Not To Campaign (QCT)

By Ed Tibbetts

Quad City Times, November 1, 2006

BREAKING NEWS: (Updated: 6:06 p.m.) Democratic congressional candidate Bruce Braley has asked John Kerry not to campaign with him Thursday in the Quad-Cities as planned, citing the flap between the White House and the senator over his remarks concerning Iraq.

Jeff Giertz, a campaign spokesman, said Braley cancelled their appearance Tuesday afternoon.

"He's not condoning the partisan bickering," Giertz said of Braley, a lawyer from Waterloo who is running against Bettendorf businessman Mike Whalen for Iowa's 1st District Congressional seat.

The White House harshly criticized Kerry, a senator from Massachusetts and the party's 2004 presidential nominee, on Tuesday for remarks he made Monday in California, where he encouraged people to work hard in school lest they "get stuck in Iraq."

President Bush said Kerry was suggesting "the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated," calling the remark "insulting and shameful."

Kerry said the remark was a botched joke aimed at the president, not the troops, according to CNN. And he said the White House response is proof of its willingness to "reduce anything in America to raw politics."

The Braley campaign had confirmed the appearance with Kerry in the Quad-Cities, but Giertz said Braley, unprompted, asked that Kerry not attend.

Kerry's office could not immediately be reached for comment Tuesday night.

"We're upset with the partisan bickering that's going on between Kerry and the White House," Giertz said, adding that it does not contribute to a solution in Iraq.

He added that Braley thought Kerry's remarks were "inappropriate."

Late in the day, Republicans challenged Braley to repudiate the remarks.

Russ Perisho, a spokesman for Whalen, said this afternoon that the campaign expected to make a comment after Braley and Kerry appeared together Thursday. But after being informed of Braley's decision, Perisho said, "It appears to us Mr. Braley is trying to separate from someone whose views parallel Mr. Braley's right up and down the line."

According to The Associated Press, Kerry, a potential 2008 presidential candidate said Monday: "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." CNN reported today that a Kerry aide said he mangled the remarks in his delivery.

What he meant to say was that if one does not work hard in school, they will "end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq," a remark aimed at the president, not at the troops, CNN reported.

Kerry noted that his words were being characterized as an insult by men whose behavior strips them of the right to respond on behalf of soldiers in a combat zone. Bush couldn't be found to fly the jet aircraft with his name on it, and Cheney had 'priorities' that didn't include military service. The Bush-Cheney claim to the title commanders-in-chief is something of an insult. Finding themselves in Iraq, having volunteered for monthly meetings and two-weeks training every summer, thousands of the troops in Iraq probably have called THEMSELVES names that would be an insult coming from another. Stuck In Nantucket (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Talk show hosts across America knelt down and gave thanks yesterday for the gift of Senator John Kerry, whose cultural condescension keeps on giving. A week before Election Day, his fellow Democrats may have had a different (unprintable) reaction.

The American Legion and various Republicans, including John McCain and President Bush, all criticized Mr. Kerry for his comments a day earlier to a student crowd in California: "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

We didn't always do our homework, but it's hard to come to any conclusion other than that Mr. Kerry was saying that only fools and knaves, not patriots, end up fighting in Iraq. Mr. McCain said the Senator should apologize. But Mr. Kerry instead issued a statement so over the top with invective toward his critics that we wonder if some Republican secretly wrote it to make Mr. Kerry look un-Presidential. Then yesterday Mr. Kerry held a press conference delivering more of the same, and claiming that he was merely attacking Bush policy, not the troops. We don't have space to reprint all of this, but we commend you to OpinionJournal.com for the complete implosion.

For reasons clear only to himself, Mr. Kerry has been acting as if he intends to run for the White House again in 2008. Apparently he thinks he can win. We've long thought that Democratic donors would soon enough convince him otherwise, but his behavior this week may speed up the reckoning. Congratulations, Senator Clinton; another competitor bites the dust.

John Kerry Thinks (WT)

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

When you get right down to it, the thoughtless foot-in-mouth disease of Sen. John Kerry is a strain unique to him. The senator gives elitism a bad name.

DOJ_NMG_0089654

"Education," Mr. Kerry told a rally this week for Phil Angelides, the Democratic candidate for governor of California, "if you make the most of it, if you study hard and you do your homework, and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Stuck in Iraq -- that's what Sen. Kerry thinks happens to people who don't study hard. You end up in the uniform, serving your country and getting shot at. Nice going, Senator Winter Soldier.

In a press conference to explain himself yesterday, Mr. Kerry rejected calls by the White House and Sen. John McCain to apologize to the American soldiers in Iraq. Instead, he repeated his litany of criticism of the Bush administration's handling of the war, accusing Republicans of a political trick to exploit his remarks. He called his remarks "a botched joke." Some joke. Some botch.

We have news for Mr. Kerry, beyond conveying our assessment that this arrogant, incredibly elitist and defeatist and altogether reprehensible statement reminds us why he isn't president and never will be: Patriotism and selflessness are why young Americans readily put themselves in harm's way for their country's sake. This C student is just plain wrong on the facts.

U.S. recruits are better educated than the average American of equivalent age. In fact, 98 percent of U.S. military recruits have a high-school education or G.E.D. Only 75 percent of equivalent-age American youths do. For senators who can't do the math, that's 23 percentage points past just plain wrong. The Heritage Foundation's recent study, "Who are the Recruits?" lays out these numbers and more. Who would compare what 19- and 20-year-olds do in combat to what the typical college sophomore is doing. (Sometimes best not to know.)

We understand that Mr. Kerry's primary aim on Monday was to bomb the White House to get at the commander in chief. The troops were an afterthought. Which, come to think of it, is the point -- just as it was in the 1970s, when Mr. Kerry made a career of smearing American troops as killers on his return from Vietnam.

It's one thing, bad enough, to be an elitist who knows the facts. It's another to be an elitist who doesn't know them. So thank you, Mr. Kerry, for speaking so candidly. People can see clearly who you are.

Democrats Increase Hope Of Winning House (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 1, 2006

After a decade in the political wilderness, Democrats are beginning to predict confidently if quietly that they will win control of the House in next week's elections, and possibly emerge with a relatively robust majority.

The optimism coincides with a Republican retreat Tuesday in three costly, highly competitive races in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Ohio, as well as polls showing continued public dissatisfaction with President Bush and the war in Iraq.

In addition, fundraising is running significantly stronger than two years ago, $104.5 million through Oct. 18. That represents an increase of more than 30 percent, and has allowed Democrats to launch late-campaign television advertising in several districts in recent days in an attempt to maximize their gains on Election Day.

Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster, said in an interview there has never been an election in which a president's approval rating was below 40 percent "and his party has not lost the 15 seats" that Democrats need to gain control this year. Bush's approval ratings hover in the mid- to high 30s.

Despite the developments, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader, and Rep. Rahm Emanuel the head of the campaign committee, have told aides to avoid predictions of victory before the votes are counted.

"Anybody who's been involved in politics for the past 10 years can tell you that a week out you've still got a long week ahead of you," said Bill Burton of the Democratic campaign committee. "And we are absolutely not taking anything for granted."

Republicans, too, say that with a week of campaigning to go, Democrats are ill-advised to celebrate. They note than an extraordinary number of races remain very close, and that their GOP get-out-the-vote operation will help pull enough of their candidates to victory to preserve their majority.

Eager to persuade conservatives to vote, President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Republican leaders attack Democrats steadily as favoring a policy of retreat in Iraq and higher taxes at home.

The White House and several Republican lawmakers criticized Sen. John Kerry during the day for saying that young men and women unable to navigate the country's education system "get stuck in Iraq."

In remarks prepared for delivery in Georgia, Bush called the statement by his 2004 Democratic presidential rival "insulting and shameful," and called on him to apologize. Kerry lashed out at the president's men and said: "I apologize to no one for my criticism of the president and of his broken policy."

Democrats must gain six seats to win control of the Senate next week, but the House is viewed as more within reach.

DOJ_NMG_0089655

Karin Johanson, executive director of the campaign committee, told one group last week that Democrats felt confident they had locked up 10 of the 15 seats they need to prevail, according to participants in the meeting who spoke on condition of anonymity.

But other officials and strategists with long experience in congressional campaigns have turned far more bullish about Democratic chances, and party strategists say no more than two of the party's incumbents who are seeking new terms are in jeopardy of defeat.

In an interview, Mellman said he wasn't counting victories before they occurred. At the same time, he said polls consistently show Democrats with such a large lead on hypothetical ballot tests that they are "outside the realm of historical experience."

"I think if the election were held today we would win," said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic lobbyist who retains close ties with party aides and lawmakers from his days as top aide to Rep. Dick Gephardt, the former House democratic leader.

Recalling disappointments from 1996 and 2000, Elmendorf said, "people are very cautious because we've been up this hill before." He added, "the thing that gives people on our side the most confidence is all our friends on the other (Republican) side think they're going to lose."

Erik Smith, a consultant for Chris Murphy, a House candidate in Connecticut, said, "every day the Democrats' chances of taking the House seem to improve. More races become competitive and races that had been competitive are opening up a little bit."

Strategists involved in key races express even stronger confidence as long as they are free to speak on condition of anonymity. One recently put the party's chances of victory at "100 percent," while another said the only remaining question is the size of the Democratic majority in the Congress that convenes in January.

Mellman said academic models predict Democratic gains of between 14 and 32 seats. Elmendorf said a majority of 15 to 20 seats is possible, indicating gains of 30 to 35 seats on Election Day. Others predicted gains in the same range.

One of the most reliable indicators of competitive seats is party-financed television commercials or other political activity designed to augment a candidate's effort.

By that standard, more than 50 Republican-held seats are competitive, and Democrats have made six-figure investments in television advertisements in many of them. Republicans have done likewise.

Republicans pulled back in three such races during the day, including Rep. Curt Weldon's re-election bid in Pennsylvania and open seats held by Rep. Bob Beauprez, running for governor of Colorado, and Bob Ney of Ohio, who recently pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

In recent days, Democrats have moved into districts long viewed as untouchable. They launched advertisements in a western district in Nebraska; for an Idaho seat; and as a challenge to Rep. Jim Ryun in Republican-heavy Kansas.

At the same time, the overall political environment coupled with the prospect of Democratic landslide victories in New York by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and gubernatorial contender Eliot Spitzer has prompted House Democrats to spend heavily in several districts.

Reports filed with the Federal Election Commission show that as of Monday night, the Democratic campaign committee has spent significant amounts on television advertising on five of the state's nine seats currently in Republican hands.

GOP Reins In Spending In 3 House Races (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 1, 2006

Signaling retreat, House Republicans are scaling back television advertising in three highly contested races, officials said Tuesday, including Rep. Curt Weldon's scandal-tinged bid for re-election in Pennsylvania and open seats in Colorado and Ohio.

Some of the funds will be spent to help other Republicans in races that remain competitive.

In contrast to the Republican strategic retreat, House Democrats are expanding the number of districts where they are advertising, an indication of growing confidence as Election Day approaches. In recent days, the party's campaign committee has moved into districts in New Hampshire, New York, Kansas and Nebraska that have long been in GOP hands.

Democrats must gain 15 seats to win control of the House and six to capture control of the Senate on Nov. 7.

Of the two, the Senate appears a more difficult challenge, and Republicans moved during the day to fortify their position.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee reported it would spend an additional $1 million in the campaign's final days to help Virginia Sen. George Allen in a re-election race that has become far tougher than originally expected.

At the same time, Senate Republicans decided to advertise on behalf of embattled Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana for the first time since August, and beefed up its support for Sen. Lincoln Chafee, trailing in the polls in Rhode Island.

Additionally, the party will begin an independent ad campaign in Michigan for the first time this year, hoping to prevent Sen. Debbie Stabenow from winning a new term.

DOJ_NMG_0089656

The information about the various moves came from public records at the Federal Election Commission as well as experts in both parties who track television advertising and campaign strategy. They spoke on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to discuss confidential matters in public.

Weldon, a 10-term lawmaker who appeared to be cruising to re-election not long ago, has become ensnared in a federal corruption investigation. The government is investigating allegations that he used his influence to help his daughter's lobbying firm secure contracts worth $1 million from foreign clients. The FBI recently raided his daughter's home and office in what Weldon termed a politically motivated inquiry.

It appeared that much of the advertising money the National Republican Congressional Committee had intended for his seat in the campaign's final days would be redirected to help Pennsylvania Reps. Michael Fitzpatrick and Jim Gerlach.

The two other races where Republicans are scaling back advertising include the Ohio district that convicted Rep. Bob Ney has represented, and the one Rep. Bob Beauprez vacated to run for governor of Colorado.

House Republicans have reported spending more than $3 million to hold Ney's seat so far, and it appeared that at least a portion of the money intended for that race will now be spent to help Rep. Deborah Pryce, who is locked in a difficult campaign elsewhere in the state.

The Colorado race pits Democrat Ed Perlmutter against Republican Rick O'Donnell. Perlmutter has led comfortably in recent polls, and Republican strategists apparently concluded the money ticketed for that race could be better spent trying to help re-elect Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, seeking a new term in a different part of Colorado.

In Ohio, Democrat Zack Space is running against State Sen. Joy Padgett. Her campaign has been hindered by Ney's refusal to resign from Congress even though he pleaded guilty to felony corruption charges earlier in the month.

Liberals Keen On Takeover Aid Centrists (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic candidates who oppose abortion, gun control and gay rights have some unusual allies this year: liberal online activists desperate for their party to win control of Congress.

Putting aside their own preferences, the Internet activists are promoting and raising money for moderates in swing districts across the country. Many of the candidates have military, business or law enforcement backgrounds. Some, such as Virginia Senate candidate Jim Webb and House hopeful Eric Massa of New York, are former Republicans.

As of Tuesday, online activists had contributed some $826,000 to Webb, a former Navy secretary, via ActBlue.com, a clearinghouse that has raised $16 million for scores of Democrats. Massa had $377,000.

“There is not a single issue that takes precedent to the Democrats winning back a majority in the U.S. Senate this year,” Jerome Armstrong, founder of MyDD.com, wrote last week.

President Bush's unpopularity, the Iraq war and congressional scandals are making it easier than usual for Democrats to bury their differences for now. The moderate makeup of contested states and congressional districts also helps.

“There's a sense of reality here,” says Rep. Ellen Tauscher, D-Calif., chairman of the centrist, 47-member New Democratic Coalition in the House. She says 30 prominent House challengers are potential members of the group, which favors free trade, strong security and high-tech development.

The Republican counterpart to ActBlue.com is Rightroots.com, a small operation that has raised $274,000 for 21 House and Senate hopefuls. Most are conservatives tagging their opponents as liberals. Three moderates — Senate candidates Tom Kean of New Jersey and Michael Steele of Maryland and House hopeful Ray Meier of New York — had collected nearly $60,000 from Rightroots.com as of Tuesday. Moderate Northeastern incumbents in tight races are not on the group's list of recipients.

Congressional Republicans have proposed bans on gay marriage, flag-burning, human cloning and Internet gambling that could energize conservatives. Republicans say they have not abandoned the center. The GOP is making “a tremendous effort” to help endangered House and Senate moderates in New York, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Rhode Island, strategist Frank Luntz says.

Former GOP chairman Ed Gillespie says “so-called centrist Democrats,” if they win, will end up dragged to the left under pressure from liberal Democrats such as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. She is in line to be speaker if Democrats take control.

Many Democratic bloggers are liberals who don't hesitate to criticize their party. Arianna Huffington and others protested, for instance, when Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine was chosen to respond to Bush's State of the Union Speech. They said he was too conservative.

This week, bloggers reacted angrily when Tauscher told two newspapers Democrats should not run “over the left cliff” if they win a House majority. Self-described progressive Chris Bowers wrote on MyDD.com that he felt “stabbed in the back.” He later added that “now that I have had the chance to vent, I'd like to … return to actually trying to win the elections.”

The results of a spring survey of 1,936 members of MoveOn.org, the liberal online activist group suggest such pragmatism is widespread. Nearly eight in 10 said Democrats should run moderates in conservative and swing districts rather than “truly progressive or liberal candidates” who have little chance of winning.

Democratic leaders aggressively courted moderates this year. Rep. Harold Ford of Tennessee and Pennsylvania Treasurer Bob Casey, both social conservatives, ran unopposed in Senate primaries after rivals were pressured to drop out. Senate leaders publicly backed Webb, a former Navy secretary for Ronald Reagan, in the Virginia primary. They gave backstage help to Montana Senate President Jon Tester, a wheat farmer and custom butcher, in his primary.

Casey and Tester are leading GOP Sens. Rick Santorum and Conrad Burns, respectively. Ford and Webb are in tight races against Republican Bob Corker and Sen. George Allen.

The purest test of blog power this year has been in Connecticut. Senior Democrats backed Sen. Joe Lieberman, a centrist and Iraq war booster, but online activists helped power anti-war candidate Ned Lamont to a primary win. Lieberman is running as an independent and is ahead in polls, despite a recent survey that showed 60% of Connecticut voters oppose the war.

Some observers say Lamont, a politically inexperienced businessman, failed to capitalize on the war's unpopularity. “The distinction between himself and Lieberman became blurred,” says Gary Rose, a political scientist at Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn.

Bloggers, however, point to the party's treatment of Lamont and the Democrats who nominated him. “Total abandonment,” Matt Stoller said on MyDD.com.

Bush Gains Ground On Economy, But Iraq Still Tops Voters' Agenda (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

A week before Election Day, a new poll shows President Bush getting better marks for his handling of the economy -- an issue Republicans are emphasizing in the run-up to Tuesday's vote -- but voters' anxieties about Iraq continue to dominate their concerns.

The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows Mr. Bush, buoyed by a rising stock market and falling gasoline prices, essentially breaking even on the economy, with 46% of voters approving his stewardship and 48% disapproving. That's a gain from 39% approval and 56% disapproval in June.

But as Mr. Bush's party fights to retain control of both houses of Congress, the violence in Baghdad in recent weeks has further darkened Americans' mood about Iraq -- the issue voters say is most important in their election decision-making. The result: Voters want Democrats, rather than Republicans, to control Congress by 52% to 37%, a 15-point margin. The spread matches the widest ever recorded on this question in a Journal/NBC poll.

"Iraq sits in the middle of this election," says Bill McInturff, the Republican pollster who helps conduct the Journal/NBC survey. While Republicans may welcome voters' improving attitudes toward the economy, adds his Democratic counterpart, Peter Hart, "they're getting swamped on the issue of Iraq." (See related article4.)

Indeed, the poll demonstrates how directly voters' attitudes on Iraq translate into ballot choices. A 54% majority of the electorate now says removing Saddam Hussein from power wasn't worth the human and financial costs -- the highest percentage in the Journal/NBC poll since the war began in March 2003. Among those voters, eight in 10 want Democrats to control Congress after the elections.

But among the 37% who say the war has been worthwhile, seven in 10 want Republicans in charge on Capitol Hill. Among all voters, 61% say they feel "less confident" the war will end successfully, while just 27% feel "more confident" about the outcome.

The national telephone survey of 1,010 registered voters, which was conducted Oct. 28-30, doesn't account for the vagaries of races for individual Senate seats or House districts; the margin of error is 3.1 percentage points.

In the House, Republicans are counting on several factors to withstand the electoral headwinds: the political strength of embattled incumbents, district boundaries drawn to protect them and their party's proven get-out-the-vote operations. They could also benefit from an uptick in recent weeks in the number of voters who cite "moral values" as a crucial election issue.

Republican strategists suggest their efforts to boost turnout could add two or three points to a candidate's tally; in both 2002 and 2004, those turnout efforts bested Democrats' less-coordinated programs.

But the poll's overall findings track the assessments of key strategists in both parties that Democrats have a strong chance of achieving at least the 15-seat gain they need to capture control of the House. The outcome is cloudier in the Senate, where Democrats would need to gain six seats to have a majority.

Though Democratic candidates appear to have the advantage in the race for Republican Senate seats in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Montana and Rhode Island, they are locked in tough battles in three key states: Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia.

In all three states, Republicans say, their turnout machine could save the day. Tomorrow, Mr. Bush campaigns in Montana, where Republican hopes are fading for Sen. Conrad Burns, who trails Democratic challenger Jon Tester in polls.

Democrats, meanwhile, cite public and private polls as evidence they will be able to hold on to Senate seats in New Jersey and Maryland, the only two of theirs that have been under threat lately.

Republicans had hoped House races would turn on local issues, such as federally funded projects that incumbents have delivered, in effect protecting their candidates from voters' dismay over Iraq and Republican scandals. But in the campaign's final days, that dismay seems to be overwhelming local messages. A number of Republicans suddenly are considered in greater danger, and in areas of the country long friendly to the party.

Among them are Reps. J.D. Hayworth in suburban Phoenix, Gil Gutknecht in Minnesota, Barbara Cubin in Wyoming and Richard Pombo in California, chairman of the House Resources Committee. Open seats in Nebraska and Colorado, both Republican-leaning states, could fall into Democrats' hands. The developments have expanded Democrats' opportunities beyond the Northeast and Ohio Valley, the regions that have long offered their best chances of making inroads.

As they have since early in the election season, the president and his party are trying to shift voters' focus to two issues more favorable to Republicans: taxes and terrorism.

Late yesterday at a Georgia political rally, Mr. Bush fired off one of his most pointed election attacks to date, suggesting Democratic congressional leaders are potential threats to a successful war against terrorism. He also went after Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, who reportedly told California college students Monday, "You know education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework, and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't you get stuck in Iraq."

After the president called the remarks "insulting" and "shameful" and demanded an apology, Mr. Kerry said Mr. Bush was the one who owes troops an apology, for "policies that have done injury to our troops and their families." The senator said his remarks were "a botched joke" that referred to Mr. Bush, not soldiers.

In the Journal/NBC poll, just 15% of voters named terrorism as one of the most important issues in their vote. That's fewer than half the 36% who named Iraq. Some 22% identify job creation and economic growth as a top voting issue. Lately on the campaign trail, Mr. Bush has charged that Democrats would raise taxes and harm economic growth.

In the two weeks since the previous Journal/NBC poll, the percentage of voters who say issues of moral values will be critical to how they vote jumped five points -- to 18% from 13%. That may be at least in part a reaction to last week's New Jersey Supreme Court decision that same-sex couples should enjoy the same rights and benefits in the state as heterosexual married couples. Christian conservative groups and Republican candidates they support have seized on the court's ruling to fire up potential voters.

Mr. Bush has also assailed the court's decision at rallies since last week. But generally, his efforts to steer the campaign debate to more favorable ground -- whether conservative values, taxes or terrorism -- appear to have been hobbled by the bloodshed in Iraq, where more than 100 U.S. soldiers died last month. In the latest poll, 63% of voters now disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of the war.

That has helped sour assessments of Mr. Bush's job performance overall, and left many voters eager to send him a message. Just 39% of voters approve Mr. Bush's performance while 57% disapprove. By 37% to 22% voters say they will be voting to send a signal of opposition to Mr. Bush rather than support; 38% say their votes won't reflect their feelings about the president.

The Journal/NBC survey suggests that Republicans' closing campaign push has firmed up support among some traditional backers, while pushing others away.

White men, who marginally favored a Democratic-controlled Congress in early October, now marginally favor a Republican-led one. But white women, an important swing vote, have drifted away from Mr. Bush's party; they now favor a Democratic-controlled Congress by 52% to 38%.

Both sides hold the allegiance of nine in 10 of their own partisans. But Republican support in the electorate's center has virtually collapsed. By 49% to 25%, independents want Democrats to control Congress. Suburban voters favor Democratic control by a similar 51%-to-39% margin.

Democrats also retain an edge in excitement among their voters, an advantage that has built all year long. Voters who expressed the highest levels of interest in the election prefer Democrats to control Congress by 55% to 37%.

It's Up To The GOP Base (HILL)

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Can the Republicans win control of Congress? They can if they want to. It is up to the vaunted GOP base.

According to the Zogby poll, Republican fortunes, while improving in early October, have fallen since. On Sept. 22, Democrats led in the generic vote poll (Do you plan to vote for the Democratic or the Republican candidate in your district?) by nine points, 42-33. But by Oct. 11, their margin was only three — 37-34. But by Oct. 24 it was back up to 11 points — 44-33 — enough for the Democrats to take control of the House and probably the Senate.

But if you dig deep into the Zogby poll, you find an astonishing fact — independents are turning to the Republican Party while Republican base voters are leaving it!

Among independents, the percent that plan to vote Republican has risen from 15 percent on Sept. 22 to 23 percent on Oct. 11 to 26 percent on Oct. 24. While independents are still voting for more Democrats, it's only by 38-26 compared with 38-15 last month.

But as the Republican Party has gained among Independents, it is losing its base. Republicans who plan to vote Republican in 2006 have dropped from 75 percent on Sept. 22 to 72 percent on Oct. 11 to 68 percent on Oct. 24! Obviously the impact of the Foley scandal has yet to diminish among the morality-minded Republican base.

Historically, the Republican Party is able to attract much more support from its base than the Democrats have been able to do from theirs'. But now Democrats are more loyal than Republicans. On Sept. 22, Zogby had 82 percent of the Democrats voting Democrats and 75 percent of Republicans voting Republican. By Oct. 11, party loyalty on both sides had dropped and only 76 percent of Democrats voted their candidates and 72 percent of Republicans backed their party. But by Oct. 24, Democrats had come back to their party and 81 percent were voting for its candidates while only 68 percent of Republicans were loyal to their ticket.

GOP problems with their base should be curable since Republicans largely agree with their party on all the major issues. Their disloyalty stems from the failure of the Republican Congress and President Bush to pass their agenda and concerns over financial and morality scandals in Washington.

If talk-radio show hosts, cable news stations, and the White House do what they do best – talk to their base – they should be able to turn the situation around. But so far their efforts have been unavailing.

But the Democrats have their problems too. Despite their huge national edge they are not leading in the key Senate races. For example, in New Jersey, Rasmussen's polls have the race between Republican challenger Tom Kean and Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez tied. But, in the same survey, New Jersey voters want Democratic Party control of the Senate by 54-36. So while the party is winning by 18 points, its candidate can manage no better than a tie!

And despite the national trend toward the Democrats, Missouri Republican Sen. Jim Talent still clings to a 50-48 lead over Democrat Claire McCaskill. Likewise in Tennessee, Rasmussen has Republican Bob Corker leading Democrat Harold Ford by 50-48.

To control the Senate, Democrats must win two of these three: New Jersey, Tennessee and Missouri and so far, they trail in two and are tied in the third.

Why are Democrats trailing so far behind the national party trend? Because Republican negative ads are working so well and the GOP financial advantage is making itself felt in individual races. The Democrats, dragged down by their suicidal decision to install the fundraising challenged Howard Dean as national chairman, are simply finding it hard to compete on the airwaves in key states. Even Clinton crony Harold Ickes's much heralded effort to fund Democratic races has fallen far short of its fund raising goals, having raised only $3 million of the projected $10 million for which he had hoped.

So voters in swing states are saying: "I want the Democrats to win, just not the guy running in my district." It is still too early to tell if the national Democratic trend will assert itself in the end or whether the Republicans can pull out the swing districts. But the key will be whether the GOP base itself genuinely wants a Republican Congress or not.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including Rewriting History, a rebuttal to Living History by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Campaigner In Chief Has Limited Reach (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

DES MOINES -- When President Bush swooped down here late last week, Republican House candidate Jeff Lamberti was happy for the high-level attention -- and the roughly $400,000 in contributions -- the short stopover produced for his campaign. But the man Lamberti is trying to unseat, Rep. Leonard L. Boswell (D), was no less happy to see the president in his district.

DOJ_NMG_0089660

As Bush's entourage was heading for Michigan and another campaign event, Lamberti said he would welcome the president back anytime. He also made it clear he does not want the president to be the issue that decides his fate next week: "I trust the voters to be sophisticated enough to know it's between the two candidates."

Boswell had another view, one that underscored the double-edged impact of a presidential visit this fall. Saying his challenger would be little more than a rubber stamp for the White House if he is elected, Boswell said Bush's visit might give both campaigns a boost. "If it ramps up their troops a little bit, it will ramp ours up, too," he said.

His name is not on any ballot this fall, but George W. Bush is the central issue of campaign 2006. Tuesday's vote will deliver a referendum on six years of Bush's leadership -- bold and principled or radically divisive, depending on one's political ideology -- and the wartime policies he has championed.

Other issues may come into play, congressional scandals and performance among them, but in the end, next week's verdict will be remembered for what it says about this president. With Bush's approval ratings hovering just below 40 percent, Republicans are braced for big losses.

GOP strategists know well that no political party has successfully weathered a midterm election with such an unpopular president in office. Bush's challenge as he campaigns in the final days of the election is to find a way to excite and mobilize a fractured Republican base without triggering an even bigger turnout among Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents that could cost his party the House or Senate.

As Election Day draws near, the president has taken on a new role for his beleaguered party, that of optimist in chief. On the stump, Bush is ebullient, defiant, humorous, partisan and totally focused on bolstering morale, mocking Democrats (and the pundits he says are in their pockets) for dancing in the end zone before they have scored a touchdown.

On the surface, he appears little changed from the confident campaigner of two and four years ago, vowing to take the fight to the terrorists, defending his policies in Iraq and shining a spotlight on a string of positive economic indicators. But almost everything about these final days of the 2006 campaign points to the differences between this and Bush's other national campaigns. The politician who has done more than anyone else over the past decade to build and expand the Republican Party has become a liability to Republicans in many parts of the country.

One GOP strategist, speaking candidly about the president on the condition of anonymity, offered this assessment: "I'd say he's at least 50 percent of the problem." In strongly Republican areas, he said, the president can still rally the party's base, but in more marginal districts, Bush is a drag on GOP candidates. "He's the problem," the strategist said. "He should stay away."

"Every midterm functions as a referendum on the president," said Republican pollster Bill McInturff. "In this case, I do think the Foley scandal and the feelings about Congress have made that story line much more muted and much less true." He added that next week's vote "is not a straight-up, yes-or-no referendum on the president."

In the midterm election four years ago, Bush swept through red and blue states in the final week of the campaign, producing Republican victories in places as disparate as Minnesota and Georgia. This year he has been forced by circumstance to pick his spots more carefully, focusing on areas where sympathy for his presidency is greater and opposition to the Iraq war less intense.

That has taken him twice to Georgia already this week, where there are two Democratic-held House seats that Republicans see as vulnerable. It has taken him to his home state, Texas, to campaign in the district held by former House majority leader Tom DeLay, a seat now in danger of tipping to the Democrats.

Later this week he will be in Montana, where Sen. Conrad Burns (R) has been in an uphill battle all year, and in Nevada, where Republican candidates for governor and the House are running into problems. He will touch down in rural Missouri and western Iowa, where Republican voters are plentiful but less motivated than needed to push Senate and gubernatorial candidates to victory.

But as if to underscore his more limited reach this fall, it was first lady Laura Bush who showed up in Connecticut on Monday to campaign for Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R), one of three vulnerable GOP incumbents in the state. And it was Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) who was there Saturday to campaign for the other two, Reps. Rob Simmons and Christopher Shays.

Opposition to the war has forced Bush to avoid campaigning in these final days in many of the most competitive suburban districts this fall, said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Everywhere he goes, there's this banner above his head -- 'Failed Iraq Policy' -- in these suburban districts," he said.

Republican candidates have welcomed the president in their districts to help raise money for their campaigns, but they have run from him in their television ads. According to officials at the Republican House and Senate campaign committees, just one GOP candidate is using the president in a television commercial, LaVar Christensen in Utah's 2nd District.

Christensen has been running an ad that shows a photograph of him with the president. But the ad never mentions the president. Instead, it opens with a photo of former president Ronald Reagan, with Christensen describing himself as a "conservative, Ronald Reagan Republican."

DOJ_NMG_0089661

That hardly means Bush has been absent from television screens this fall. Democrats by the dozens have featured him in their ads, trying to tie their opponents to the president and his policies. Bill Burton, a DCCC spokesman, said that, as of the beginning of this week, Democratic candidates and the DCCC have run more than 90 ads in 34 districts featuring the president and the Democrats' opponent.

In Pennsylvania's 8th District, the DCCC attacked Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick for standing with Bush on stem cell research. In Colorado's 7th District, a party-sponsored ad shows footage of Republican candidate Rick O'Donnell coming off Air Force One with the president and ends with the announcer saying: "Rick O'Donnell. Radical ideas and another vote for George Bush's agenda."

In New Mexico's 1st District, Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R) comes under attack for "standing with Bush . . . echoing Bush . . . voting with Bush on Iraq." The tagline at the end reads: "Heather Wilson and George Bush. Nothing will change."

Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) came under attack in another ad for working with Bush to pass the prescription drug bill, which Democrats have criticized as a windfall for drug companies. "The drug companies shaped the law," the ad claims. "George Bush backed it, and Clay Shaw helped write it and ram it through."

To save his congressional seat -- in one of the more bizarre twists in this campaign -- Shaw has turned to another president to inoculate himself against attacks that he has marched in lockstep with Bush. Last week he ran a radio ad touting his cooperation with former president Bill Clinton, who was on his way to the state to raise money for Shaw's opponent, Democrat Ron Klein.

"The greatest moments of the Clinton years came when Democrats and Republicans worked together," the ad said. "Like welfare reform. . . . Signed by Bill Clinton and written by our congressman, Clay Shaw."

The ad went on to cite Shaw's work with Clinton to repeal the earnings tax on Social Security and the bill to restore the Everglades. "More than almost anyone else in Congress, Clay Shaw solves problems across party lines," the ad concludes. "So as Palm Beach County welcomes Bill Clinton to town, let's say 'thank you' to Clay Shaw. He's independent and effective."

With his approval rating just below 40 percent, Bush approaches Election Day less popular than all but two presidents in the post-World War II era. Only Harry S. Truman in 1946 and Richard M. Nixon, who had resigned three months before the 1974 midterms, were lower. Even presidents going into midterm elections with higher approval ratings than Bush's -- Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1958, Lyndon B. Johnson in 1966, Ronald Reagan in 1982 and Bill Clinton in 1994 -- have seen their parties suffer major losses.

The best any president has done with an approval rating below 50 percent was in 1978, when Jimmy Carter was at 49 percent. That year, Republicans picked up 15 House seats, exactly the number Democrats need this year to take control of that chamber.

Bush is less unpopular in states whose Senate races are likely to determine whether Republicans retain their majority. With most voters likely to vote Republican or Democratic based on their perceptions of his performance, those differences are enough to affect the outcome of those close races. That has prompted the president to put Missouri on his campaign schedule for Friday.

Bush also will return to Iowa on Friday. David Roederer, who was Bush's Iowa chairman in 2004, said Republicans wanted the president to add a late stop in heavily Republican western Iowa to help Rep. Jim Nussle (R), a gubernatorial candidate who is trailing Democratic Secretary of State Chet Culver -- in part because he is losing in his own congressional district in eastern Iowa.

"We need to have a good turnout in the west," Roederer said.

In past campaigns, Bush's late visits to Iowa have concentrated on the state's eastern battlegrounds. In 2002 he helped save several vulnerable House seats in eastern Iowa, and two years ago his efforts there helped turn Iowa, a blue state in 2000, to red. This year, Nussle's House district could fall to the Democrats. That Bush will campaign in safe Republican territory, rather than in a competitive House district, is one more indicator of the toll that six years and an unpopular war have taken on his presidency.

AP Poll: GOP Outreach To Blacks Falters (AP-Y)

By Nancy Benac, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 1, 2006

So much for the Republican charm offensive toward minorities. Black voters are far less likely to approve of the way President Bush is doing his job than voters generally and they are more likely to feel that the country is on the wrong track, disheartening news for a Republican Party that has been trying to curry favor with minority voters in recent years.

In what could be a particularly bad sign for Republicans in next week's midterm elections, black voters also are more likely to say that the Iraq war was a mistake and that recent disclosures of scandal and corruption in Congress will be very important to their vote, according to an Associated Press-AOL Black Voices poll conducted Oct. 23 through Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0089662

Black voters have historically voted Democratic, and their votes are critical to Democratic hopes to win tight Senate contests in Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia.

Unhappiness among black voters is reflected by L.C. Washington, a 41-year-old Democratic graduate student from Montgomery, Ala., who says Bush is "the worst president in history," not to mention "the dumbest president I've ever seen — he's the devil." Washington lays blame for a laundry list of ills at the Republican Party's doorstep.

"Republicans are trying to win over black voters," says Washington, but "not doing a good job. Doing a poor job — the war, gas prices, job losses and the layoffs."

Even among black Republicans, there clearly still is work for the GOP to do.

"I don't think Republicans are doing any kind of reaching out to African-Americans," said 71-year-old L.D. Harper of Springfield Gardens, N.Y., who's been a Republican since he was 18.

While black voters say Republicans have done a poor job of representing their interests, they also have misgivings about the Democratic Party. Almost half of black voters said the Democratic Party takes their vote for granted; about a third said the party has done a poor job of representing their interests.

About a fourth of blacks said they weren't confident their votes would be counted accurately.

On the issues, black voters were most likely to rate the economy and health care as extremely or very important to them personally.

The AP-AOL Black Voices telephone poll of 900 black adults, 361 of whom are likely voters, was conducted by Ipsos. The margin of error for the full sample is plus or minus 3.5 percentage points, 5 percentage points for the black likely voters. The overall likely voter results are from an AP-AOL poll released last week.

About nine of 10 black voters have gone for the Democrats in recent elections.

Republicans, particularly party chairman Ken Mehlman, have tried to reach out to minority voters in recent years. Bush's draw on the black vote inched up to a still-anemic 11 percent in 2004. But since then the party has taken a hit because of widespread dissatisfaction with how the Bush administration responded to Hurricane Katrina last year.

Only 38 percent of blacks are confident the federal government would help them in a major disaster, according to the AP-AOL poll.

And while the Republican Party has strongly pushed the candidacies of black Republicans in the coming elections, the survey offers little hope that black GOP candidates hold special appeal for minority voters. More than eight in 10 black likely voters say the race of the candidate makes no difference to them.

"It just depends on their platform," said Kassandra Williamson-Moore, a black Democrat from Indianapolis. "You can't just vote strictly by race."

Prominent black candidates this year include Republican gubernatorial hopefuls Kenneth Blackwell in Ohio and Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania, GOP Senate candidate Michael Steele in Maryland, and Democratic Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr., in Tennessee. Republicans Steele, Blackwell and Swann are behind in the polls; Democrat Ford is running about even with his opponent.

Blacks are disproportionately unhappy with Bush, 89 percent of likely voters disapprove, compared with 61 percent of all likely voters.

But blacks' approval ratings for Congress — disapproval ratings, actually — are roughly similar to those for all likely voters. Some 83 percent of likely black voters disapprove of the way Congress is doing its job, compared with 75 percent of all likely voters.

David Bositis, of the Washington-based Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, said there's little variation in congressional approval numbers by race because Congress is so widely viewed as being "in the trash."

Overall, Bositis said, the Republican courtship of black voters sometimes looks like a case of "one step forward, two steps back."

"They're never going to succeed in attracting more African-American support until the party has some level of catastrophic failure and then decides to go back to the drawing board," he said.

Curtis Gans, director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate, said voter turnout among blacks tends to be lower than among adults in general, but in 2004 they, like Americans overall, turned out in higher numbers.

He said voter discontent could boost turnout similarly this time, adding that: "The group that is the most uniformly anti-Republican at this time is African-Americans."

Two-thirds of black registered voters say they are following news about the campaign, compared with 71 percent of all registered voters doing likewise.

Osama Isn't Running (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

HARD AS IT IS to imagine now, there was a time in the not-so-distant past when the GOP was considered to be the "party of ideas." As the 2006 campaign draws to a merciful close, the only idea national Republicans seem to have left is that, when in doubt, accuse Democrats of being a bunch of terrorist-loving wimps. But as the boy who cried wolf learned the hard way, fear-mongering has its diminishing returns.

The strain of escalating demonization is starting to show. Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), a former GOP wunderkind now scratching for his political life, absurdly accused his opponent, Bob Casey Jr., this week of "aiding and abetting terrorism and genocide." This after airing a commercial in which Casey was shown next to Kim Jong Il and a mushroom cloud. An ad titled "The Stakes," produced by the Republican National Committee, features Osama bin Laden and his minions threatening more attacks.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) last week characterized Democrats' Iraq strategy as "waving the white flag and surrendering." This just weeks after the spectacularly opportunistic retiring majority leader (who can forget the good doctor's "I've seen the video" second-guessing of Terri Schiavo's diagnosis?) concluded that the war in Afghanistan can't be won militarily.

The Republican message reeks of desperation; the party seems spent. That's the nature of the political cycle in Washington — parties eventually overreach after governing uncontested for a time, as their loyalists' desire to stay in power outlasts their enthusiasm for their own ideas. The only reason this election is a cliffhanger is the lack of inspired thinking by Democratic opposition leaders.

President Bush, meanwhile, is also getting into the fear-mongering. "The Democrat approach," he said this week on the stump in Georgia, "comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. And that's what's at stake in this election."

This is why much of the world considers our president a caricature figure — because on occasion he acts like one. It is expected and appropriate for parties to flesh out their differences on national security issues, but it should be a debate about means, not ends.

Part of the Republican playbook consists once again of conveniently confusing the war in Iraq with the post-9/11 war on terror. The disingenuous formulation remains: Criticize the war in Iraq and you're a Bin Laden sympathizer. Voters seem to be growing tired of such manipulation. Who knows, they may even notice that Al Qaeda's leader, in fact, has not been captured — except in the video montages of Republican campaign ads.

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Political action committees representing business interests have boosted their donations to House Democrats in recent weeks, but a significant chunk of that money has not gone to Democratic candidates.

Instead, the money has languished in the accounts of safe incumbents who have given little, or nothing at all, to Democratic candidates in the months leading up to Election Day.

The behind-the-scenes financial maneuvers have come to light in recent days with the filing of reports at the Federal Election Commission (FEC) disclosing fundraising activities through Oct. 18.

Among other interesting developments, the new reports show that Democrats who are poised to become influential committee chairmen if they win control of the House have reaped hundreds of thousands of dollars in political action committee (PAC) contributions over the past several weeks.

The flow of funds, most of it from business interests, who tend to give most of their contributions though PACs, is significantly higher than two years ago when Democrats were viewed as having a slim chance of capturing the House.

Rep. Jim Oberstar (D-Minn.), the ranking member of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, has raised $225,000 for his campaign account from PACs between July 1 and Oct. 18, drawing donations from PACs belonging to business giants such as CSX Corporation and 3M. That amount is nearly $70,000 more than he raised from such sources during a similar stretch in 2004. But during the recent three-and-a-half month period, a $1,000 contribution to Mike Erlandson was the only money he gave to a Democratic House candidate, fundraising records show.

DOJ_NMG_0089664

John Schadl, Oberstar's campaign spokesman defended his boss by noting that he has paid the entirety of his dues owed to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC).

"Jim's one of those members who's always kept his dues paid up at the DCCC," he said. "Other members may have let that lag a little but Jim's been a supporter of the DCCC."

Schadl said that Oberstar paid the last installment of his $200,000 in dues last week when he transferred $50,000 to the party committee, a transaction not yet reflected in public reports.

But Oberstar has not given more to the DCCC than what he was asked earlier in the election cycle, before he and other prospective chairmen began reaping a windfall of business giving. Business contributions to Democrats have picked up dramatically since Congress adjourned at the end of September amid the House page sex scandal.

The ranking Democrats on other powerful committees have given lavishly to Democratic candidates as business contributions have begun to pour in.

Rep. Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.), who would become chairman of the Ways and Means committee, raised $269,000 for his campaign coffers, mostly from business PACs, from the end of August to mid-October. During that time he has also given $156,000 to Democratic congressional candidates and $200,000 to the DCCC.

Rangel owed $300,000 in dues to the DCCC because of his ranking position on Ways and Means, but he has far exceeded that goal by having transferred $570,000 to the party committee, according to FEC records.

But other ranking Democrats have not been quite as generous, keeping most of the money they've raised recently, even though they are not considered in any electoral danger.

Rep. David Obey (Wis.), the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, gave $50,000 to the DCCC in the last four months. But during that time Obey raised $203,000 from PACs, almost $40,000 more than what he raised over the same period in 2004.

In total, Obey has given $350,000 to the DCCC this election cycle, more than the $300,000 he owed because of his senior position on Appropriations. But some Democratic candidates may wonder why Obey kept the bulk of his recent fundraising haul despite having $679,000 in his campaign account and facing no real political opposition.

Rep. Collin Peterson (D-Minn.), the ranking member of the House Agriculture Committee, raised $180,000 from PACs between July 1 and Oct. 18. Peterson gave $14,000 to Democratic congressional candidates, even though he raised almost twice as much from PACs compared to a similar period in 2004. Prior to July, however, Peterson gave $250,000 to the DCCC.

Rep. John Dingell (Mich.) owes $300,000 to the DCCC because he is the ranking Democrat on the Energy and Commerce Committee. He has only given $100,000 to the party committee through Oct. 18. That is despite raising $346,000 between July 20 and Oct. 18, according to FEC reports.

During that time he has given $38,000 in contributions to Democratic congressional candidates. He has given more to local candidates in Michigan. He gave over $100,000 during that period to help state-level candidates in the Wolverine State. Dingell, who is serving his 26th term in the House, has $820,000 in cash in his campaign account.

On the Republican side of the aisle, several prominent Republicans have given surprisingly little to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC).

Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, has given only $10,000 from his campaign as of Oct. 18. That could be largely because Lewis is reportedly under federal investigation because of allegations that he did legislative favors in exchange for campaign contributions. He has accumulated hundreds of thousands of dollars in legal bills.

Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), has only transferred $10,000 from his campaign to the party committee. Reynolds is in a tough race but his colleagues may not accept that as an excuse. The so-called "Battleground" fundraising program Reynolds helped organized has asked even the most endangered Republican lawmakers to contribute $75,000 to the NRCC.

Retiring Rep. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.), who formally chaired the House ethics committee, again signaled his dissatisfaction with his party by giving only $1,000 from his campaign to the NRCC. Hefley was removed as chairman of the ethics panel after he presided over its decision to rebuke former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) for several ethics transgressions.

House Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), who has since become embroiled in ethics allegations, has given nothing from his campaign to the NRCC, according to the most recent FEC records.

Pombo is favored to win reelection on Nov. 7, but his race is considered competitive.

Democrats Enjoy Resurgence (HILL)

By Jim Snyder
The Hill, November 1, 2006

Michael McKenna is a Republican and owner-operator of a one-man lobbying shop, MWR Strategies. Those facts led his client, energy company Suez, to ask him the following in a recent phone conversation: What does he plan to do if Democrats retake the House?

"What my plan is, is to adjust to a new reality," McKenna says he told executives from Suez, formerly known as Tractebel.

McKenna said that likely means he will work more closely with his Democratic colleagues through some sort of formal business agreement to lobby on behalf of his client.

DOJ_NMG_0089666

"There is no getting around the fact that [Democrats] are going to be more important," McKenna said. Even if Democrats fall short of retaking the House or the Senate, the margins in either body are likely to be narrowed.

Some version of the question posed by Suez executives is being repeated across Washington, as companies, associations and lobbying firms plan for the new reality after the midterm elections.

Many political observers predict Democrats will regain the majority in the House, or at least significantly reduce the voting margins held by Republicans. Less likely, though possible, is a Democratic takeover of the Senate.

While the election is still six days away, the strength Democratic candidates have shown has already produced one shift in Washington: Democratic lobbyists, once marginalized, are seeing a resurgence in their popularity.

"We've had more detailed conversations in the last month than we have had all year," says Patrick Murphy, a lobbyist who has been an active supporter of Democrats. Murphy joined mCapitol Management in July and has been aggressively marketing his ties to Democrats ever since.

"We are ready for the new transition," says Murphy, whose current clients include Eastman Kodak, the American Federation of Government Employees, and the Edison Electric Institute.

Lobbyists close to House Democrats in particular are stressing their ties. Not many lobbyists bothered with House Democrats, they say, because the caucus faced a disciplined Republican majority and had little ability to affect the course of House votes. Now those ties could produce new business.

"In 2005, things were pretty tough for a Democrat. Nobody thought we were going to win," said Steve Elmendorf, a former chief of staff to then-House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) , who is now in the midst of expanding his practice at Bryan Cave Strategies.

As they work to market themselves by stressing those ties, Democrats on K Street are also careful to strike a cautionary tone.

"Nobody's measuring drapes. Nobody's counting their chickens," Elmendorf said.

Any change in the political dynamic will affect industries differently. How members view issues relating to telecommunications, financial services or transportation doesn't necessarily depend on their party affiliation, Elmendorf said.

One industry, though, that may feel particularly nervous about a Democratic takeover is the energy industry, which is a traditionally strong backer of the Republican Party.

Democrats, meanwhile, have called for "windfall" profits on oil companies. A Democratic House may also investigate the rise in gasoline prices or Vice President Cheney's energy task force that often met in secret.

"There are companies that are definitely looking to hire Democrats," said John Northington of Thomas Advisors, a firm that specializes in energy issues.

Northington is a rarity: a Democratic lobbyist who specializes in energy production issues. Oil giant ExxonMobil hired Northington three months ago to lobby the White House on exploration issues and to reach out to Democrats in Congress.

Other lobbyists said energy companies have been calling them, too.

"It is evident across the board that energy companies are desperately trying to identify lobbyists with Democratic credentials, especially in the House," says Stephen Brown, a former counsel to Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.), who is in line to take over the Energy and Commerce Energy and Air Quality subcommittee if Democrats regain the majority in the House.

Brown, who now runs the energy and environment practice at Dutko Worldwide, a broad, bipartisan firm, said several companies have approached him in recent weeks. He declined to name the companies.

Brown favors some issues more aligned with Republicans, like opening the outer continental shelf to oil and gas drilling. But while his practice is bipartisan, Brown adds, "I can talk Democrat."

It may be easy to overstate the nervousness among business groups in town.

Democratic staffers have sought to ease any anxiety among business leaders in the run-up to the election. Many lobbyists don't predict wild swings in policy even if Democrats take over one or both bodies of Congress.

Don Duncan, a lobbyist at ConocoPhillips, said the most onerous measures proposed for oil and gas companies, like windfall profit tax, are unlikely to become law in an environment where the voting margins are close and there is a Republican president with veto power.

"Personally, I'm not that concerned with a change. We'll work with whoever is up there," Duncan said.

Most large companies and trade groups already employ a bipartisan staff, although Republicans, who have control of the House, Senate, and White House, are typically in the top spot.

"At the end of the day, you are going to have to have a strong bipartisan team," Elmendorf said.

But many Democratic lobbyists describe the environment in more hopeful terms than any time since Republicans took over the House in 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0089667

Through efforts like the K Street Project, Republican leaders have sought to put their own into top slots of trade groups or large companies. There is disagreement over how aggressively that effort was carried out. But Democrats maintain the effort was real and harmful to the prospects of Democratic lobbyists.

The Association of Oil Pipe Lines last week hired Shirley Neff, a former Democratic aide on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources, to lead the group.

Raymond Paul, a spokesman for the group, said Neff's Democratic background had nothing to do with the decision.

"Our executive search team didn't discuss party affiliation," he said.

While Neff will replace another former Democratic staffer, Benjamin Cooper, the association would likely have felt more pressure to hire a Republican a couple of years ago when Republicans were more firmly in control of Congress, one Democratic lobbyist said.

Win Or Lose, Some Republicans Are Already Pressing For Major Changes (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Win or lose next week, the GOP needs some serious soul-searching, according to several rank-and-file House Republicans who already are arguing in favor of a post-Election Day leadership shake-up.

With just days before voters decide Republicans' fate, most lawmakers contacted for this article are focused on last-minute campaign and get-out-the-vote efforts and won't talk about post-election strategy.

Others, however, believe that change — be it in policy, process, or leadership matters —as soon as possible is the only way House Republicans can climb out of the rut they've been stuck in this cycle.

"If we lose the majority, I think it ought to be a clean sweep — a fresh start," Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) said about the GOP leadership team.

He worries that if the GOP keeps even a fragile hold on its majority, the conference will stick with the same leadership course with only minor changes. This, in turn, will mean continuing to put too much emphasis on trying to keep the majority by handing out earmarks to vulnerable members and special favors to certain groups instead of standing for principles such as fiscal restraint.

Recent conference calls with GOP leaders have done nothing to calm his fears. "When you get on these conference calls … there's not much of a 'Mea culpa on what we've done wrong and here's what we're going to do,' " he said.

Even GOP lawmakers reluctant to discuss anything past Nov. 7 are preparing for a leadership scramble next week.

Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) has indicated that she would like to run for the GOP conference chair, a key communications position now held by Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), who is in the toughest reelection fight of her life. In the last month, Blackburn has hit the talk show circuit to press the GOP's case to voters, appearing on about 20 national TV shows, according to her spokesman.

"Right now everybody's focus is on Nov. 7 and those of us that are looking at leadership races know that the focus has to be on keeping our majority and helping our colleagues win … ," she said. "With that said, and as you look at the last year, we all know there will be a crowded field for different leadership posts when we get ready to have our elections."

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the conference vice chairman and a contender for the full chairmanship, has also hit the media circuit to speak out for Republican candidates. He also gave at least $365,000 from his campaign committee alone to the National Republican Congressional Committee, according to a recent Federal Election Commission report.

Kingston doesn't want to discuss leadership contests, and sticks to the GOP election script that Democrats would raise taxes if they retake control. But he concedes that Republicans need to make critical policy changes after the election, win or lose.

House Republicans must provide more oversight hearings on the war in Iraq and do more to end the nation's addiction to oil by developing viable energy alternatives. "We've got to provide better energy solutions," he said.

Flake is well known for fighting his leaders, especially against earmarks, but he also places some blame for GOP's poor standing on himself for failing to speak out more strongly at key times.

Flake said he deeply regrets not standing up and criticizing GOP leaders' decision early last year to purge the ethics committee of its Republican members after the panel admonished former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) for the third time for ethics violations.

"The rank-and-file members, myself included, should have stood up and screamed," he said. "Its just another indication that we're not policing our own and it goes to the whole earmarking culture [that led to the imprisonment of former Rep.] Duke Cunningham [R-Calif.]."

DOJ_NMG_0089668

If the ethics committee had been up and running last year when GOP leaders first heard about inappropriate emails former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to a page, members would have been able to refer it to the panel for investigation. Democrats, at the time, were protesting the purge of GOP members and were refusing to meet the new Republicans on the committee.

"You can blame the Democrats, but we certainly gave them a reason to do what they did," Flake said. "We simply didn't have an ethics committee process that worked at a time when we needed it … I feel badly that I didn't say anything and neither did other members … it's a pox on all of us."

Other members would only speak anonymously of a growing desire within the conference to change at least some of its leaders no matter what happens next week.

"There's a heightened sense that there needs to be a different approach — a refocusing of our priorities," one lawmaker noted. "There is a lot of frustration."

When asked, several GOP sources said they believed that Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) could announce his departure whether Republicans maintain the majority or not, although most believe it is more likely if Republicans lose.

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) could run to replace him or, if in the minority, simply try to keep his job as leader, but he could face opposition in any race for a top spot from outspoken conservatives such as Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) or John Shadegg (R-Ariz.). Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) is also weakened, GOP sources said, and would not fare well in a challenge against Boehner, who beat him for the post after DeLay stepped aside.

"I don't think anyone wants to see that redux," one GOP source remarked.

Others mentioned as possible leadership contenders include: Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) and Tom Feeney (R-Fla.). Reps. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), Pete Sessions (R-Texas) and Phil English (R-Pa.) are all running to chair the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Bill Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard, said, "If they lose the House, it might be time for a change in leadership for obvious reasons — fresh faces, fresh blood … All three would go—Hastert, Boehner, Blunt, from my outside point of view."

Kristol and several other lawmakers interviewed for this article believe at least two members of the team are safe from challenge: Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) and GOP Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.). Both are members of the Republican Study Committee, a large conservative group that has repeatedly challenged GOP leaders to rein in spending. Both have managed to stay above the fray through hard work. Many GOP sources say Cantor could rise in the GOP ranks, considering that he amassed roughly 170 votes in what was then only a hypothetical race for whip earlier this year.

"Eric's worked hard with the battleground program raising money... ," one GOP lawmaker said, "and conservatives and others who are unhappy with the direction of the conference always felt that he would support us if he were in a position to actually make decisions."

Ky. Republican In Toss-up House Race (AP-Y)

By Dylan T. Lovan

AP, November 1, 2006

Democrats have been targeting Republican Rep. Anne Northup for a decade to no avail, but that hasn't stopped them from betting once again that her political luck is about to run out.

Northup, a five-term incumbent, has a lot of advantages, including a prized seat on the House Appropriations Committee. She has raised twice as much money as her Democratic opponent.

But her ties to President Bush, mounting casualties in Iraq and her district's penchant for leaning Democrat has made the race against Louisville businessman John Yarmuth a virtual toss-up.

Bush is not popular here; the district went for Democratic presidential candidates John Kerry in 2004 and Al Gore in 2000. Four years ago, Northup held on to her seat by beating a political newcomer by just a few thousand votes.

"John Yarmuth wants to make this a race on the popularity of the president, which in this district is not that high," Northup said. "He makes two claims, that it's about President Bush or that I'm a rubber stamp for the president, and it's neither one of those."

Yarmuth, a former Republican who switched parties in 1985, said despite the war and the GOP's troubles, he thinks voters will be thinking about their pocketbooks on Nov. 7.

"Economic security has become the critical factor in their decision-making. They're being squeezed by health care costs, by energy costs and stagnant wages," he said.

A recent Bluegrass Poll by The Courier-Journal of Louisville showed Northup was favored 48 percent to 42 percent for Yarmuth, but that falls within the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0089669

Northup said a Yarmuth win would hurt the district, because of her prominent position on the Appropriations Committee and support of a billion-dollar project to build two new bridges on the Ohio River at Louisville.

"This project needs a champion every day," Northup said. She said the project could crumble if Yarmuth were to win the seat.

"If somebody blinks, just by benign neglect, it'll fall apart," she said.

Northup had a strong fundraising advantage as of mid-October, with nearly $900,000 left in her campaign coffers, compared to about $170,000 for Yarmuth.

Yarmuth's campaign is getting some late help from national Democrats.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee began running a television ad critical of Northup on Monday night in the district. The 30-second spot is the first ad the DCCC has run in the district during the campaign, said DCCC spokeswoman Adrienne Elrod.

"This is a race that we definitely see as winnable," she said.

The Republican National Committee had no plans as of this week to run an ad on behalf of Northup, said Northup campaign spokesman Patrick Neely.

Northup has already survived four close races, repeatedly dashing Democratic hopes.

This year's close race has turned the campaign nasty, especially on the airwaves.

Northup's campaign has dug up opinion articles Yarmuth wrote when he was a columnist for a weekly alternative newspaper, the Louisville Eccentric Observer, that he founded. In television ads, she has accused Yarmuth of penning support for marijuana legalization, gay marriage and lowering the drinking age.

Yarmuth has said the columns were taken out of context by the Northup campaign, which created a Web site featuring snippets of Yarmuth's columns and TV appearances over the last 16 years. Yarmuth created his own rebuttal ad that pokes fun at Northup, saying he also "plays golf with Saddam Hussein" and "snatches toys from little children."

Northup's own ads have yet to mention that she is a Republican, and she has not invited President Bush to the district to campaign for her.

In a further distancing from Bush, she recently announced a shift in her views on the Iraq war, calling for the ouster of Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and saying the U.S. military policy needs a change of course.

Yarmuth called Northup's shift "obvious political posturing in the last moments of the campaign."

Northup's change didn't matter to retired truck driver Jim Vibert, who lives in Louisville's south end, a blue-collar area where Northup has won over many Democrats.

Vibert, a Republican, said he has soured on Bush but said he'll vote again for Northup. He said he believes her values are similar to his.

"She's more in line with the thinking around here," Vibert said while sipping coffee during lunch hour at a White Castle restaurant. "I think it's going to be a tight race."

Another south-end voter, Steve Fein, said he is supporting Yarmuth. He said strong gains by the stock market are not improving the economic situation of many in the middle class. He said Yarmuth is a thoughtful candidate.

"He has a lot of good ideas," Fein said.

Northup has held onto the district by effectively appealing to Democratic voters, said Phil Laemmle, a retired University of Louisville political science professor.

"What we have here is a large number of Democratic voters who have consistently voted for Northup," he said.

Laemmle said Yarmuth would be leading Northup if the problems plaguing national Republicans better motivated Democratic voters in the district.

"I think the election has been nationalized in many areas (of the country), but I don't think that strategy is as effective in Kentucky," he said. "It doesn't divide people as much as it does in other districts. If that were the case, Yarmuth would be in a much stronger position."

8th District Battle In Washington A Surprising Tossup (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, November 1, 2006

ORTING, Wash. — By all rights, Republican Rep. Dave Reichert shouldn't be having such a tough time winning a second term.

He's the popular former King County sheriff who brought the Green River serial killer to justice in 2001. He represents a district that has never elected a Democrat. His opponent has never held public office, while he's a 30-year public servant. As a freshman on Capitol Hill he landed a coveted post: chairman of a Homeland Security subcommittee.

DOJ_NMG_0089670

Yet Reichert's race against Democrat Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft manager, is rated a tossup and considered a key race if Democrats are to regain control of the House. A poll Oct 24-26 by Constituent Dynamics, an independent research firm, had Burner leading 49% to 47%.

Heavy hitters from both parties — including President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Barack Obama — have stumped this fast-growing, affluent suburban region. Al Gore appeared last month with Burner and Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell and lambasted Reichert on global warming.

The national parties have funneled in gobs of money: $1.5 million from the Republicans and nearly $900,000 from the Democrats has been spent so far. The candidates themselves have raised a combined $5.1 million.

Reichert's unexpected struggle against a political novice is due to growing opposition to the Iraq war and scandals in the Republican-controlled Congress, to the 8th District's changing demographics and to Burner's well-financed campaign, political analysts say.

Burner, 35, tries to paint Reichert, 56, as a Bush apologist. Reichert maintains that he votes independently and doesn't always toe the party line. Burner has not called for withdrawing the troops but says Congress should be more assertive over Iraq policy. Reichert says troops should stay put until Iraq's government and economy are stable.

"This is a referendum on national politics, the Bush administration and the Republican Congress," says Todd Donovan, a political scientist at Western Washington University. "If she can find a picture of him getting on Air Force One with George Bush, that's in her ads."

If Burner were running in any other year, Reichert says, "she wouldn't have this kind of showing. All she has is to paint me with the Bush brush. … But Congress is not running the war. We shouldn't be calling the shots. We have been and will continue to ask tough questions and provide oversight."

Burner says voters she talks to have turned against the war. "They understand that Bush's strategy in Iraq has failed," she says. "They look at (Reichert's) voting record and the times he's voted with his party and President Bush. They understand if they want to change course, they have to change him."

Shifts in the district, packed with bedroom communities of commuters to Seattle and Tacoma, haven't helped GOP candidates, says David Olson, a University of Washington political science professor. Recent Asian and Russian immigrants have dropped income levels a bit in the state's most prosperous district.

Bellevue, the district's largest city, "is not the rock-ribbed Republican city that it once was," Olson says. "There's a significant group of blue-collar workers. … That's not the usual image we think of" here.

Wealthy voters usually associated with GOP values are more tech-centered here and tend to be moderate on social issues. "Very much like Silicon Valley," Donovan says.

Women could be a key. "On everything from school prayer to abortion, women in these satellite suburbs are economic conservatives and social liberals," Olson says. "That makes a Darcy Burner an attractive candidate."

In Congress, Reichert reversed his opposition to more federal funding for research using embryonic stem cells after, he said, he investigated the issue. "This is no dyed-in-the-wool follower of the Bush line, up, down and sideways," Olson says. "Part of that is driven by the social liberalism of women in this district."

Here in Orting, in eastern Pierce County, change has been rapid. The city has tripled in size to 6,000 since the early 1990s, including a 12% growth rate in the last year alone. Most of the influx was families with children looking for affordable housing, a group that might have moderated a historically conservative rural town, says city administrator Mark Bethune.

Or maybe not. Stan Gunno, a general contractor among 25 or so who turned out last week for Reichert's appearance, says the congressman will support "finishing the job" in Iraq. Burner, says Gunno, "is running a campaign against George Bush instead of running against her opponent."

Another Reichert supporter, retiree Dixon Blackmer, 67, likes it that Reichert "supports the administration most of the time."

"You want to know if I support Bush and the war? Absolutely," he says. "You want to know do I think we need an exit strategy? Yeah, he has one: We're going to win."

A Democrat In Nebraska (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

This year, open seats have become dangerous territory for Republicans. Only months ago, Scott Kleeb, left, a 31-year-old cattle rancher who is running in Nebraska's Third Congressional District, where voters have not sent a Democrat to the House since 1958, could barely get an audience with Democratic leaders.

This week, after a poll showed Mr. Kleeb with a slight edge, the party sent $100,000 his way. The Republican, Adrian Smith, a 36-year-old real estate agent, had hoped to slip into the seat being vacated by Representative Tom Osborne.

DOJ_NMG_0089671

As he campaigns, Mr. Kleeb quips: "I'm a Democrat, and I'm a bull rider. Now which of those two things do you all think is more difficult to be in Nebraska?"

Rep. Wilson Getting Help From Debate, 5-foot Duck (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, November 1, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — It is a sign of the times for Republicans that the political survival of Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), a five-term incumbent and straight-laced U.S. Naval Academy graduate, may now depend on a woman in a duck suit.

Wilson trotted out this campaign prop last week to bring attention to her Democratic rival Patricia Madrid's "ducking" of debates. The unabashed tactic was a page from a challenger's playbook — an easy ploy to draw media attention to a flagging campaign — and it underscored Wilson's position as the underdog in the polls.

"You don't need to know the latest insider tracking polls to know that … Heather Wilson is having trouble closing out her race with rival Patricia Madrid. You just have to know about the duck," quipped New Mexican blogger Joe Monahan.

By Saturday, however, the duck was earning its keep in media stardom. A Madrid supporter had allegedly stomped on its webbed foot in a tussle outside a Democratic rally, prompting a call to police.

"The gentleman stepped on my foot purposely," sobbed the wounded waterfowl, Kathleen Hennessey, a campaign volunteer on leave from Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart's (R-Fla.) office. The Wilson campaign speedily distributed the video to news organizations, drawing attention away from the rally with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa (D).

The duck appeared on crutches with mock bandages a day later.

The avian performance, coupled with ads highlighting Madrid's gaffe in the candidates' one televised debate, are the incumbent's last-ditch maneuvers to stave off an impending Democratic wave.

The last six independent polls in the race have shown Wilson tied with and then trailing Madrid, the state attorney general, marking the first time the perennially vulnerable incumbent has been behind her challenger.

Democrats have sought to nationalize the race by charging that Wilson is a "rubber stamp" for President Bush and congressional Republicans. As approval ratings for national Republicans have slumped so too have Wilson's poll numbers.

"I'd vote for whatever Democrat, any Democrat to take over this Congress," said Robert Lovelace, 56, the night manager at an Albuquerque Econolodge, who describes himself as "a moderate Republican or moderate Democrat." He said he knew little about the race but planned to vote. "The Republicans are in control of everything. They just have too much power. You learn who tells the truth and who hands you a crock of bull."

But political observers expect Wilson to rally in the final week of the race.

"I expect it to further tighten," said Brian Sanderoff, an independent pollster in Albuquerque whose three surveys in the race have shown Wilson leading 45-42 percent, then tied at 44 percent, then trailing 42-45 percent. "Nationally it's not going well for the Republicans, but I haven't seen the Madrid forces counter the buzz about the debate. The Wilson campaign has skillfully developed an ad based on Madrid's debate faux pas that to me looks quite devastating."

During last week's high-ratings televised debate, Wilson asked Madrid to "cite something … that will give the people of New Mexico some kind of reassurance that you will prevent a tax increase."

Madrid was flummoxed, fumbling for 12 seconds before launching into a response about the proportion of the tax cuts that went to the upper class.

"It's been a long time since I've heard that much dead air time on Channel 4!" quipped Wilson afterward.

The Wilson campaign repackaged the exchange into an ad that began airing Sunday with the tagline "Patricia Madrid … Don't take the risk."

That approach could resonate with voters like Richard Anglada, 48, an Albuquerque real estate broker.

"Whether I'm low-income or high-income, I hate taxes. I don't like all the taxes the Democrats would propose," said Anglada, a Democrat. "I am leaning towards Madrid, but I just hate that tax issue. I would probably make up my mind on taxes."

In the past, it has been Democrats and Hispanics that have propelled Wilson to victory in a district where Democrats outnumber Republicans.

In Sanderoff's first poll in the race, in which Wilson was leading, she had 35 percent of the Hispanic vote and 17 percent of Democrats. In his third poll, Hispanic support had dropped to 20 percent and Democratic backing to 10 percent.

"Simple math in this district tells you the Republican wins by luring Democrats and Hispanics," Sanderoff said.

Wilson was clearly aware of those calculations. She held a "Democrats, Hispanics Pledge Support for Heather Wilson" event Sunday with New Mexican musician Al Hurricane.

Tuesday, a prominent Democrat was predicting an exceedingly tight race.

DOJ_NMG_0089672

Democratic Governor Bill Richardson told the Albuquerque Tribune that Madrid would prevail by one half of one percentage point.

Drug Benefit Is Popular, But Not Touted Much By GOP (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Republican lawmakers looking to change the subject from unfavorable issues such as the war in Iraq have by and large avoided claiming credit for what the White House views as one of the GOP majority's signature domestic-policy accomplishments: the Medicare prescription-drug benefit.

President Bush and congressional leaders such as House Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) have urged GOP incumbents to shift the electoral debate toward matters that they say demonstrate the effectiveness of Republican-controlled government.

But few candidates have actively highlighted their support for Part D, which has been under constant Democratic fire. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) has vowed to begin the process of altering the program within the first 100 hours of the next Congress if her party takes control of the House.

Democrats have maintained their drumbeat of criticism of Part D — frequently referring to it as a "disaster" — even as the program appears to have stabilized from significant logistical problems during its rollout in January.

The program has proved popular with those beneficiaries who have joined the Part D program, according to numerous opinion polls.

J.D. Power and Associates released survey findings in September showing 75 percent of Part D enrollees were satisfied with their benefits. This week, the AARP, which endorsed the bill to create the program, issued survey results showing that 48 percent of voters age 42 and older think the program is good for senior citizens, compared with 26 percent who think it's bad.

Bush, Boehner and other Republican message-makers have responded sharply to Democratic criticisms, pointing to such polls and the millions of people newly receiving drug coverage under the program.

But except for the administration, the GOP has been mostly reactive to Democratic assaults rather than aggressive.

Republican campaign sources identified some exceptions on the campaign trail, such as GOP Reps. Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.), and GOP Sens. Jim Talent (Mo.) and Jon Kyl (Ariz.). Each lawmaker is locked in competitive reelection battles against opponents who have targeted them for their roles in drafting the Medicare drug bill.

Nationally, however, the Republican election effort has shied away from Medicare Part D. Neither the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), the National Republican Senatorial Committee nor the Republican National Committee has run any advertisements highlighting the program this year, spokespeople for the organizations said.

While the national campaign operations have chosen not to highlight Part D, big business has. Between July and September, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce paid for television spots targeting eight Senate races and 26 House races. The advertisements praised lawmakers by name, including some Democrats, for their votes in favor of the bill that created Part D.

In 2003, Bush and the congressional Republican leadership cajoled an often recalcitrant rank-and-file to support the legislation to create the drug program with promises that tackling the potent Medicare issue would win them strengthened support among the politically motivated older voting bloc.

The president reiterated this argument last month. "My own view is our candidates and the people who voted for this ought to be out there traveling to senior centers all over their districts and their state, saying, 'Look what we did,'" Bush remarked on Oct. 20, the AP reported.

One of the central figures in the creation of the program agrees. "They're crazy not to take credit for it," said former Medicare chief Tom Scully, who added, "It's a huge positive in my opinion." Scully left the administration three years ago and now works as a lobbyist at Alston and Bird and is a partner at the New York-based investment firm Welsh, Carson, Anderson and Stowe.

One Republican campaign operative denied that GOP candidates would not benefit from Part D this year. "Just because it's not a central theme in every race … doesn't mean it's not a political winner," said NRCC spokesman Ed Patru.

Scully suggested that Republican candidates simply are not comfortable taking credit for an expansion of an already large entitlement program. "Republicans traditionally are fearful of talking about Medicare," he said.

Moreover, Scully said, the low-income people who stand to benefit the most from the program do not usually support Republican candidates.

The program may be popular with Medicare beneficiaries, but it is not with segments of the GOP. Fiscal conservatives in particular were displeased that Republicans enacted the largest entitlement-program expansion since Medicare itself was created during the Johnson administration.

DOJ_NMG_0089673

The measure passed the House over the objections of 25 Republicans who voted against it and with the support of at least a handful who gritted their teeth when voting for it.

The electoral atmosphere also simply is not conducive to Republicans touting their accomplishments, said GOP pollster Bill McInturff of Public Opinion Strategies.

Furthermore, Part D does not appear poised to play a significant role in voters' decision-making this year, McInturff said. The public's reaction to the drug benefit has been "muted" and the issue has made only a "very modest" impression on voters younger than 65 years old, he said.

Democrats Discover New Political Frontier (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

LAKEWOOD, Colo., Oct. 31 — Campaigning in suburban Wheat Ridge in the rapidly fading October twilight, Ed Perlmutter, the Democratic Congressional candidate, knocked on the door of Maxine Dunham, a registered independent.

"Already voted," Mrs. Dunham quickly reassured Mr. Perlmutter, peering out to tell him he had locked up her support. "You can relax."

Mr. Perlmutter is probably unlikely to relax in the final days of his closely watched race with Rick O'Donnell, his Republican opponent, as the two kick their sophisticated get-out-the-vote machines into high gear. But Mr. Perlmutter and fellow Democrats in Colorado and neighboring states believe that unaffiliated voters like Mrs. Dunham are the key to what could be a turnaround in the party's political fortunes in the region.

Despite a Republican edge in registration, Democrats are discovering the Mountain West — and Colorado in particular — to be a new political frontier as the party benefits from a potent mix of changing demographics, anger over the war in Iraq, resentment toward conservative social initiatives and millions of dollars' worth of advocacy advertising.

Republicans acknowledge that the political terrain is shifting along the Continental Divide but argue that any realignment will be temporary and due to the Iraq war more than any other factor.

"We still have more registered Republicans by a pretty significant margin," said Representative Tom Tancredo, an advocate of tough immigration laws who is running for re-election in a nearby district, "but it certainly appears an increasing number of independents or unaffiliated voters are now breaking more for the Democrats than the Republicans."

If that trend holds, Democrats could be in for a big day next Tuesday. The Democratic candidate for governor, Bill Ritter, is leading in his race against Bob Beauprez, a Republican congressman. If Democrats can retain control of the State House and Senate, which they gained in the 2004 elections, they would have total control of the state government for the first time since the early 1960s.

"It really is incredible," said Tom Schaller, a political scientist at the University of Maryland who explores the potential for Democratic gains in the West in a new book, "Whistling Past Dixie." "They had nothing three years ago."

Mr. Perlmutter has consistently led in polls in the Seventh District race in the Denver suburbs. Should he win, it would give Democrats at least a four-to-three advantage in the state's Congressional delegation. The fact that two other House races are even remotely competitive illustrates the changed political dynamic after years of Republican dominance.

In neighboring states, Democrats are seen as having a good chance of capturing a Senate seat in Montana, are battling in what should be safe Republican House seats in Idaho and Wyoming, and have their eyes on Republican seats in Arizona and New Mexico.

The increasingly blue tinge of the formerly red region — some say it gives new meaning to the phrase "purple mountains" — has the national party seriously considering holding its 2008 presidential convention here at the foot of the Rockies.

Republicans are hardly surrendering. Mr. O'Donnell is pushing ahead and on Monday trumpeted an endorsement from Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, hoping the McCain name would resonate with independents.

Using a high-tech voter identification model, Mr. O'Donnell spent more than $30,000 to mail a letter of support from Mr. McCain along with his own 38-page platform to 20,000 independents and Democrats deemed receptive to the message.

"It was sent very strategically," said Mr. O'Donnell, who believes he can pull off a victory, although he acknowledges a tough environment for Republicans. "I picked a heck of a year to run for Congress," he said Tuesday as he led volunteers on a local cleanup campaign intended to send the message that he would also help clean up Congress.

Mr. Perlmutter has also focused on independents, trying to sway them by presenting his case that Republican control of Washington has been a failure. "I just think that over the last few days the unaffiliated voters have really been watching what is going on closely, and they are leaning to the Democratic side," Mr. Perlmutter said.

Mr. O'Donnell said he believed that Democratic electoral expectations in the West were overblown and that even if Democrats did have some success, Republicans would quickly recover.

DOJ_NMG_0089674

Analysts and activists say the Democratic rise has been building quietly but steadily. Robert Duffy, a political science professor at Colorado State University, said he thought Republicans began losing the public's confidence after 2002, when the General Assembly was not seen to be responding strongly to an economic downturn but was instead caught up in political fights over redistricting and other peripheral issues.

"The state legislature and the governor seemed to be incapable of doing anything about it," Dr. Duffy said of the economic situation.

He and others said that many in the West, where Republicans exhibit a pronounced libertarian streak, had also grown weary of the social agenda that stirs Republicans in the South.

"They want someone to provide solutions to problems, and they are tired of the government getting too much in their business out there," said Nancy Keenan, a former state legislator in Montana who is now president of Naral Pro-Choice America, an abortion rights group that has been actively engaged in Western Congressional races.

In one respect, the region's conservative leaders have fallen victim to their own success. Exerting strong control over the party in many communities, conservatives have been able to deliver victories for their candidates in party primaries over more moderate Republicans.

But the conservatives then struggle in the general election, sometimes because of hard feelings over the primaries, and Democrats have been able to sneak in. Party infighting over an open Republican House seat in the district around Colorado Springs is considered a factor in giving Democrats a chance at that seat.

Members of both parties say there is another important but less well-known explanation for Democratic success in Colorado: an assertive advocacy campaign by wealthy progressives in the state who have poured millions of dollars into pro-Democratic advertising through independent 527 organizations, groups so named after the provision in the tax code that allows political spending as long as it is not formally coordinated with parties or candidates.

The 527 groups were considered instrumental in the 2004 elections, when Democrats achieved a surprising takeover of the legislature and, at the federal level, won a Senate and a House seat. They have been active again this year, particularly in an effort to unseat Representative Marilyn Musgrave, who has supported a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage.

Democrats say the 2004 gains laid the groundwork for an expansion this year because the Democratic legislature was able to work with the departing Republican governor and address pressing problems in education, health care and immigration, demonstrating to skeptics that Democrats could govern.

Both Mr. Perlmutter and Mr. O'Donnell, competing for the open seat now held by Mr. Beauprez, have said throughout the campaign that they will bring a similar sensibility to Washington, promising to inject new thinking into a Congress that has been plagued by partisanship and stalemate.

Now it is up to the voters in this evenly divided district, where the romance of the Rockies meets the pressures of 21st-century suburbia, to make a choice.

"I think people are ready," Mr. Perlmutter said. "They have seen enough ads."

How The GOP Lost The North (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Most of the House seats that the Democrats are expected to take from Republicans are in the Northeast and industrial Midwest, heartland of the old Republican Party of Lincoln, McKinley and Eisenhower. Many of the Republicans holding these seats are a distinct minority in a party now dominated by Southerners who are more supportive of executive branch authoritarianism and yet also more government-phobic. And the Republican moderates, judging by their own comments, are boiling mad that the Democrats are going after them.

"There is no one who has voted more often with the Democrats than Linc Chafee," Susan Collins, the Republican senator from Maine, told the New York Times of her Rhode Island colleague, who is trailing Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse in the polls. "Yet that didn't stop them from going after him with everything they had."

And we all remember how moderate Republicans stopped the conservatives who control their party from going after moderate Democrats in previous elections, right? How they pleaded with Tom DeLay not to push through his mid-decade reapportionment of Texas, which led to the ousting of such veteran conservative Democrats as Rep. Charles Stenholm? How they deplored the campaign that Republican Saxby Chambliss waged against Georgia Democratic Sen. Max Cleland, who'd lost both legs and an arm in Vietnam, for being soft on national security?

Indeed, it was precisely the Republicans' success at defeating the centrist and center-right Democrats in the South over the past two decades that has driven the GOP steadily rightward. And for all their protestations of moderation, the northern

Republicans -- from Susan Collins to Lincoln Chafee to Rep. Chris Shays -- abetted that transformation. While some of them may have favored raising the minimum wage, all the Republican moderates in the House voted for rules that prohibited the Democrats from bringing a minimum-wage hike to the floor unless, as their Republican leaders dictated, it was linked to other provisions (such as a permanent repeal of the estate tax) that would doom it in the Senate. While they may have harbored doubts about the wisdom of the president's course in Iraq, their party conducted no oversight hearings.

Since George W. Bush's election, the rightward gallop of the Republicans has only accelerated. Karl Rove became convinced that independent voters were a myth, prompting Bush to govern as if only his most conservative supporters really mattered. Denny Hastert let no bill come to a vote in the House unless a majority of the Republican caucus backed it -- essentially giving veto power to the House right-wingers. Gerrymandering has made many Republican members more fearful of a primary challenge from the right than of a Democratic challenge in the general election.

But what next week's election seems likely to illustrate is that the laws of thermodynamics -- in particular, the one that states that for every reaction there is an equal and opposite reaction -- have not been repealed. Upstate New York, the Philadelphia suburbs, Connecticut's tweedy enclaves and the Microsoft precincts surrounding Seattle seem poised to show that they've had it with the party that restricts funding for stem cell research. In Arizona and Colorado, secular libertarians have grown estranged from the party that invested the power of the federal government in the cause of keeping Terri Schiavo in a vegetative state. In Ohio, voters look to be revolted not just by the corruption of their state and national Republican parties but also by the party's indifference to the collapse of the state's industrial economy.

Historically, the major parties in America have yoked together the most disparate groups for long periods. The New Deal Democrats were a party of Northern liberals and Southern segregationists. But once Lyndon Johnson committed the Democrats to civil rights for African Americans, the white South up and left -- a process that took 40 years to complete but that left the Democrats struggling to assemble congressional and presidential majorities and that converted the Republicans into a party where Southern values were dominant. Now the non-Southern bastions of Republicanism may themselves up and leave the GOP, seeing it as no longer theirs.

Susan Collins may protest that she has a quarrel with the Democrats, but it's her own party that provoked this transformation. And in a larger sense, her quarrel is really with history.

What If It's A Tie? (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

With polls nail-bitingly close, one possible result is that the Senate will divide 50-50 between the two parties. For a hint of how that may work, consider the only time that has happened, for six months in 2001 (before James M. Jeffords, then a Vermont Republican, became an independent to caucus with the Democrats), when the two parties worked out a collegial power-sharing agreement. Republicans maintained control of the Senate because Vice President Dick Cheney had the power to break tie votes.

But while the Democrats lost a bid to have co-chairmanships of committees, they won an equal number of committee seats and an equal share of the money to run them. Senator Tom Daschle, the Democratic leader, called it "miraculous"; Senator Trent Lott, the Republican leader, called it "a framework for bipartisanship." But that was fresh off the 2000 elections, when everyone was pledging bipartisanship.

Could it happen again? Democrats admit they have considered the possibility, "What was done in 2001 should serve as a useful framework," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for the Democratic leader, Senator Harry Reid. Not so fast, the Republicans say. They do not want to be seen even considering the idea of losing control, so much so that a senior Republican aide would speak only anonymously. "If the Senate were ever to return to that ratio," the aide said, "the previous agreement is not precedent."

GOP Grip On Senate Hinges On Tight Races (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

Republicans say the latest evidence gives them reason to think they will maintain control of the Senate, although Vice President Dick Cheney may not feel free to leave Washington often during the next two years.

"There is this for the Republicans -- at least the bleeding seems to have stopped on the Senate side, and in a few House races," said pollster John Zogby. "Republicans can still turn this around."

Race-by-race surveys of Senate contests by pollster Scott Rasmussen show that Republican-leaning voters may be "coming home" in closely watched states like Tennessee and Missouri, while the GOP is poised for a potential upset in Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0089676

To prevent Democrats from taking over the Senate, Republicans must hold their net losses to five -- which would leave the Senate split 50-50, with Mr. Cheney available to cast a tiebreaking vote -- and election analysts say four of the GOP's incumbent senators likely will fall on Nov. 7:

·Mike DeWine in Ohio is now trailing Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown by such a wide margin -- 20 percentage points in one poll -- that even some Republicans now privately describe Mr. DeWine as "road kill."

·Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania -- a reliable foe of abortion and same-sex "marriage" and a strong supporter of President Bush -- trails pro-life Democrat Bob Casey by 16 percentage points in the latest poll.

·Conrad Burns in Montana is trailing Democratic state Sen. Jon Tester, and has been hammered by Democratic ads highlighting the Republican's involvement in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Meanwhile, Republicans have been buoyed by a strong stretch run by Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in Maryland, where the former state Republican Party chairman seeks the seat being vacated by Democratic Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes.

Mr. Steele still trails Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin in most polls, but turned in a solid debate performance Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" and this week won the endorsement of important black Democrats in Maryland. "If he gets over 20 percent of black vote statewide, it does have a significant impact for the politics of both parties," Mr. Zogby said.

Republicans have also hoped to pick up a Democratic seat in New Jersey. However, six different major polls since Oct. 10 show Republican Tom Kean Jr. trailing Sen. Robert Menendez by as many as 6 percentage points in a state where institutional advantages favor the Democratic incumbent. "If we had a functional party in New Jersey, we might win that one," said one veteran Republican observer.

Republicans say they feel increasingly confident about holding onto the Tennessee seat being vacated by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. The most recent CNN poll showed Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker with a 52 percent to 44 percent lead over Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., although Rasmussen showed a much narrower 49 percent to 47 percent lead for Mr. Corker.

Perhaps the most encouraging recent development for Senate Republicans has been the comeback by Missouri Sen. Jim Talent, who some polls had shown trailing by as much as 9 percentage points to Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill just three weeks ago.

The most recent polls indicate the Missouri contest is a dead heat, with CNN showing both candidates at 49 percent, and Rasmussen giving Mrs. McCaskill a 48 percent to 47 percent lead.

However, Republicans have become concerned as recent polls show Sen. George Allen losing ground in Virginia. A Rasmussen poll released yesterday showed Mr. Allen with 46 percent to 51 percent for Democrat James H. Webb Jr., a former Republican who served about a year as Navy secretary in the Reagan administration.

Republicans says that their well-honed voter-turnout operation can make the difference in close races, but election analyst Charlie Cook remains skeptical about Election Day prospects for the GOP.

"In the House, Republicans are most likely to see a net loss of 20 to 35 seats, and with it their majority," Mr. Cook wrote in the latest issue of National Journal. "In the Senate, the GOP could lose at least four, but a five- or six-seat loss is more likely."

Poll: GOP Corker Leads In Tenn. Senate Race (USAT)

USA Today, November 1, 2006

Tennessee Republican Senate nominee Bob Corker led Democrat Harold Ford by 8 percentage points in a race that could determine who controls the Senate, according to a poll released Tuesday. The survey of 541 likely voters conducted by Opinion Research for CNN showed former Chattanooga mayor Corker favored by 52%, compared with 44% for U.S. Rep. Ford. The error margin is +/-4 percentage points. Previous polls had them neck-and-neck for Sen. Bill Frist's seat.

“This is all about getting out the vote,” Corker told supporters in Knoxville. “Let's energize our base.” In the same poll, taken Thursday through Sunday, Corker led 47%-45% among 897 registered voters, with a +/-3-point margin of error. “This race is a dead heat and it's been a dead heat for a month,” Ford adviser Michael Powell said.

Bush to campaign for Talent in Missouri

President Bush will travel to Missouri on Friday to campaign for Sen. Jim Talent, the first time the two will appear together at a public campaign event in the state this year, the White House said. Details were not released. “The president wants to do everything he can to help him win re-election,” White House spokesman Alex Conant said. Talent has seldom mentioned the president in stump speeches or in his TV spots. Recent polls continue to show Talent and Democratic State Auditor Claire McCaskill running about even.

NFL player wants off mom's election team

New Orleans Saints' quarterback Drew Brees has asked his mother, Texas 3rd Court of Appeals candidate Mina Brees, to stop using his picture in her campaign TV ads. The athlete is shown in the uniform of his former team, the San Diego Chargers. In the ads, which had aired on Austin stations, she says, "I'm a football fan, and I have to be. … Drew Brees is my son. But there's one difference between him and me: I want to sit on the bench." Drew Brees has referred to his relationship with his mother, a Democratic attorney from Austin, as "non-existent." The NFL player said "my mother is using me in a campaign, and I've made it known many times I don't want to be involved."

Keystone Poll Bodes Ill For GOP (PTR)

By David M. Brown And Brad Bumsted

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 1, 2006

Democrat Bob Casey has opened up a 15-point lead over Republican U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum -- more than double the lead the challenger held in September -- according to a Pittsburgh Tribune-Review/WTAE-TV Keystone poll released today.

Casey leads Santorum 53 percent to 38 percent, with 9 percent undecided, according to the telephone poll of 626 registered voters conducted over five days ending Sunday. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.9 percentage points.

A Keystone poll conducted in late September showed Casey, the state treasurer from Scranton, with a 7-point lead over Santorum, of Penn Hills, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate.

"(Santorum) is falling further behind as voters seem to be rejecting his shift in course toward focus almost exclusively on the war on terror," said Keystone Poll director G. Terry Madonna, a political science professor at Franklin & Marshall College, Lancaster County.

"It's a campaign theme that's not working well," Madonna said.

Casey's lead, combined with Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell's 25-point advantage over Republican challenger Lynn Swann, could portend disaster for Republicans on Tuesday, when voters head to the polls. Rendell, of Philadelphia, leads Swann, the former Steelers star from Sewickley Heights, by 58 percent to 33 percent, the poll shows.

Political analysts are pondering whether the margins favoring Rendell and Casey will benefit fellow Democrats in congressional and legislative races.

"It's clearly not a positive sign for Republicans in real competitive races lower on the ticket to have their headliners trailing this late in the campaign, but it's not necessarily a death knell," said Christopher Borick, political science professor at Muhlenberg College in Allentown. "Pennsylvanians have a clear record of splitting tickets."

Votes for Casey or Rendell won't automatically translate into votes for other Democrats if a Republican candidate is perceived as having done a good job, said Al Neri, editor of The Insider, a statewide political newsletter.

"It's a very informed electorate," he said.

Santorum trails Casey in nearly all regions, including by 3 points in Central Pennsylvania, where Republicans traditionally enjoy their strongest support.

Santorum leads only in Northwestern Pennsylvania, 50-41 percent, the poll shows. Casey leads by 27 points in Allegheny County and 16 points in the southwest, where U.S. Rep. Melissa Hart, R-Bradford Woods, is seeking to beat back a strong challenge from Democrat Jason Altmire in the 4th Congressional District.

Casey also leads by 33 points in Philadelphia and 27 points in the Philly suburbs, where three Republican Congressmen are fighting for their political survival.

Santorum, who is seeking a third term, has been hurt by his close ties to the Bush White House, analysts say. The president's approval ratings have dropped to an all-time low in Pennsylvania. Only 32 percent hold a favorable opinion of Bush, and only 31 percent say he is doing an excellent or good job.

Poll participant Charles K. Hillman, 68, of Monongahela, Washington County, said he will vote for Casey because he doesn't like the direction the country is going under Republican control. Hillman is upset that American soldiers are dying in Iraq in what seems to be "a civil war."

"I do not trust Santorum, and I don't like Bush at all," he said. "I'm voting for a change."

Walter J. Nichols, 42, of Commodore, Indiana County, said he will vote for Santorum because he is consistent in his views. Nichols likes Santorum's opposition to gun control and abortion.

"Santorum has a platform he sticks with. He believes in what he says, and he stands for something," Nichols said. "Bob Casey seems to be the typical politician. Whatever you want to hear, he's going to say."

Santorum spokeswoman Virginia Davis dismissed the poll's significance.

"No matter how you shake it, there's a range of numbers" in various polls, she said.

At least 55 polls have been conducted since January, all of them showing Casey with a lead of at least 5 points and as high as 23 points, according to RealClearPolitics.com.

DOJ_NMG_0089678

Davis, however, said Santorum will rely on superior Republican get-out-the-vote efforts.

"The investment we've made in our grassroots doesn't have a return until election day," Davis said.

Casey spokesman Larry Smar said the latest Keystone poll reflects that "Santorum's often desperate attacks are backfiring, and people clearly want a change."

"They see Bob Casey talking about issues that concern them," such as health care and jobs, Smar said.

One in three of those polled who indicated they will vote for Casey said their primary motivation was to oust Santorum. Another third said the war in Iraq is the most important issue in determining their Senate vote. Twelve percent identified the war against terrorism as the most important issue.

Rendell spokesman Dan Fee said the numbers are consistent with other recent independent polls. The lead won't change the governor's strategy, Fee said.

"We are going to get out as many of our voters (to the polls) as we can," he said.

Swann spokesman Leonardo Alcivar disputed the poll's results.

"It's simply not a 25-point race," he said. "If it were, Rendell wouldn't continue to pour millions of dollars into negative ads."

Heckler Subdued At George Allen Event (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, November 1, 2006

A heckler who confronted Sen. George Allen at a campaign appearance Tuesday was put in a chokehold and slammed to the floor by three of the Republican's supporters in an incident captured on video.

Mike Stark, a liberal blogger and first-year University of Virginia law student, approached Allen at an event in Charlottesville, loudly asking, "Why did you spit at your first wife, George?" according to witnesses.

Three men, all wearing blue Allen lapel stickers, immediately grabbed Stark, dragged him backward and slung him to the carpet outside a hotel meeting room, according to video captured by WVIR-TV in Charlottesville.

Stark said later in a telephone interview with The Associated Press: "I am a constituent. I am allowed to ask my U.S. senator questions."

A new statewide poll conducted for CNN showed Allen's Democratic challenger, former Navy Secretary Jim Webb, with a slight lead in a bitterly contested race that could help determine whether the GOP retains control of the Senate.

In a Monday posting on "Calling All Wingnuts," the blog Stark publishes, he hinted that he would attempt to provoke Allen before the TV cameras.

"Im also trying to `Roger and Me' George Allen whenever I can," Stark wrote, referring to director Michael Moore's 1989 documentary in which he repeatedly tried to confront former General Motors' chief executive Roger Smith about the company's downsizing.

In August, Stark similarly approached Allen after a speech at a hotel near Staunton, loudly asking if he had ever used a common six-letter epithet against blacks.

That was two weeks after Allen, at a rally, referred to a Webb volunteer of Indian descent as "Macaca," which is considered by some to be a racial slur.

Democratic Activist Claims Abuse By Allen's Staffers (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

A Democratic activist who verbally confronted U.S. Sen. George Allen at a campaign rally in Charlottesville yesterday was shoved, put into a headlock and thrown against a window by three men wearing Allen stickers, according to a widely disseminated video of the incident.

W. Michael Stark, who identified himself in an e-mail after the incident as a University of Virginia law student, yelled a question at Allen (R) about whether he had ever spit on his first wife, an unsubstantiated charge that has been circulating on liberal blogs on the Internet. Allen supporters hauled him away from the senator as television cameras rolled.

"I demand that Senator Allen fire the staffers who beat up a constituent attempting to use his constitutional right to petition his government," Stark wrote in an e-mail.

Charlottesville Police Lt. Gary Pleasants said Stark reported the incident yesterday and indicated that he wanted to press assault charges against the men. Pleasants said police are investigating and trying to determine the names of the Allen staffers involved.

"We will find out who the people are, give him the information and he can go to the magistrate and try to obtain a warrant for them," Pleasants said.

On the video, Stark was heckling Allen about rumors that embarrassing material is contained in records from the senator's divorce. Those records have been sealed by a judge and are not accessible. Allen's current wife, Susan, is his second and the mother of his children.

Allen aides accused Democrats and the Webb campaign of orchestrating the event as a way of getting news organizations to write about the Internet rumor. "These are the typical Jim Webb tactics," said spokesman Dan Allen, no relation to the senator. "It was disappointing to see, and this certainly has no place in Virginia politics."

Kristian Denny Todd, a Webb spokesman, said Stark has no affiliation with the Webb campaign. "I have no idea who this guy is or what he was trying to accomplish," she said. "I saw the video, and from what I saw, he was wrestled to the ground by a bunch of Allen supporters so that is not very nice behavior."

Dan Allen said Stark pushed him as Stark tried to approach the senator and Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), who was campaigning with Allen. "He did it in a very menacing way," Dan Allen said.

Stark countered: "I never raised my hands above my waist. I was manhandled."

The event was recorded by a local television station and was broadcast widely yesterday on CNN. Within hours, the video was also uploaded to YouTube, a video-sharing Web site.

In the video, Stark can be seen being shoved back by several Allen supporters. A man puts Stark in a headlock, and Stark wiggles out and struggles. The man then wrestles Stark to the ground, knocking his head against a window.

Student Tackled At Allen Campaign Event (CDP)

By Bob Gibson

Charlottesville Daily Progress, November 1, 2006

U.S. Sen. George Allen, R-Fairfax County, spoke at a Charlottesville rally of his supporters Tuesday and then watched as it ended with a law student being wrestled to the floor by Allen supporters.

Allen was walking with Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., toward an Omni Charlottesville Hotel lobby after their upbeat campaign speeches when University of Virginia law student Mike Stark approached him and loudly asked if he had ever spat at his first wife.

Television cameras recorded the shoving and tackling that followed and quickly spread images from it around the world on CNN, other networks and Web sites as Stark, 38, was pushed to the lobby floor and escorted from the hotel by three men wearing Allen stickers.

Allen ignored the question and shrugged off the incident.

“That guy’s typical of the Webb campaign, and that’s just their negativity,” Allen said, referring to the campaign of Democratic challenger Jim Webb of Falls Church. Stark, a liberal blogger who confronted Allen two months ago at a Staunton hotel with questions about racial insensitivity, said he is not associated with any campaign.

One of the men who pushed Stark away from Allen, former Albemarle County GOP Chairman John Darden, said he was simply trying to protect Allen and Dole and stood between the law student and the senators not knowing what Stark’s intentions might be.

“It was crazy,” Darden said. “This guy kept coming toward George. I had my back to the guy, just blocking him out, and he pushed me.” Darden said he yelled at Stark, “You are getting personal,” and pushed back as Allen and aides walked away toward the back of the lobby.

Four hours later, Stark, a first-year law student and former Marine, went to Charlottesville police headquarters and tried to obtain an assault warrant. Police said they would assign an investigator to the case today, and no warrant was issued Tuesday.

Allen's former wife, Anne Waddell, later issued a statement calling Stark's question "a baseless, cheap shot." She said that she and Allen divorced more than 22 years ago and sealed the divorce records because it was a personal matter.

Allen and Dole headlined the hour-long rally attended by about 150 supporters of the junior Virginia senator and former governor seeking a second six-year term. They said Allen should win Nov. 7 based on his record in office, including his strong support for continuing tax cuts, building job growth and protecting Virginians as governor by abolishing parole for convicted felons.

Both senators said they viewed passages from Webb's six novels as "degrading of women."

In remarks to reporters, Allen said, "Those excerpts are, I think, demeaning of women and he will have to explain those passages. … The judgment will be on the part of the people of Virginia."

Allen did not say he had read any of Webb's novels but "I've read those excerpts" depicting explicit sexual behavior and incest.

At the rally, two women who said Allen had affected their lives through his leadership offered testimonials.

Rhonda Winfield of Stuarts Draft, who lost her son 22 months ago in the war in Iraq, called Allen "a tremendous leader for this country" and explained how the senator had written her and shed tears with her over her son's death.

Winfield said she gave Allen his dog tags, which the senator placed on his dresser mirror and told her "that he would never, ever support our withdrawing in defeat" from Iraq. Winfield's son, Marine Lance Cpl. Jason Redifer, died at 19.

Teresa Sayers of Galax, who had been stabbed eight times by her former husband, credited Allen for abolishing parole so her assailant would spend 85 percent of his 36-year prison sentence behind bars instead of just 20 percent.

Allen also helped her by protecting her job through a crime-victim protection act during "a devastating time in my life," Sayers said.

Dole, who chairs the re-election committee of Senate Republicans, said an Allen victory "could be important in the United States Senate in terms of our maintaining our majority." Allowing Democrats to control the Senate would be giving control to a "Trojan horse" full of senators with a stealthy agenda of raising taxes.

Marriage Measure May Turn On Allen (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

A state constitutional marriage amendment designed to motivate conservative voters and help Virginia Sen. George Allen's re-election campaign appears to be backfiring, at least among black voters.

The Republican senator probably will benefit from evangelical Christians voting for the amendment. But, the amendment also will drive turnout among the state's black voters, many of whom are questioning whether Mr. Allen is racially insensitive and deserves a second term.

Virginia's black voters support the amendment, which defines marriage as the union of one man and one woman, by more than 60 percent, according to most polls. They also overwhelmingly favor Mr. Allen's Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr.

The black vote is even more crucial this year than most, as Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb are nearly tied in statewide polls leading up to Tuesday's election.

"My people don't see it as a Democratic issue or a Republican issue. They see it as a societal issue," said the Rev. Milton R. Blount, pastor of the predominantly black New Mount Olivet Baptist Church in Portsmouth, Va.

Mr. Blount said his congregants are overwhelmingly in favor of defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman, but they also are traditionally Democratic voters.

Marriage amendments on state ballots in 2004 helped drive turnout among Republican voters and secured President Bush's re-election.

Virginia's majority Republican legislators kept that in mind over the past two years as they crafted the amendment and ensured its placement on the 2006 ballot.

Most Republicans would only smile when asked whether the amendment's timing was a gift to Mr. Allen, a former Virginia delegate and governor. Privately, they acknowledged they wanted to help Mr. Allen, thinking a large re-election margin would help position him for a 2008 presidential run.

Now, after Mr. Allen has been accused of making racial slurs when he was younger and his highly publicized "macaca" moment, a high turnout of black voters for the amendment might cost Mr. Allen a few crucial percentage points in the neck-and-neck race.

Political observers also think the evangelical vote could be depressed next week because of the congressional page scandal in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0089681

Mr. Allen and most Republican voters favor the marriage amendment as necessary to protect against what they call "activist judges." Mr. Webb opposes the amendment, saying it is unnecessary and would restrict the rights of unmarried heterosexual couples.

The Rev. Charles H. Miller Jr., a pastor from the predominantly black First Church of Jesus Apostolic in Altavista in Southside Virginia, said black voters will side with the amendment because "that is what the word of God teaches."

He recently told his local newspaper that he supports the amendment not "referencing any political party but rather a statement respecting Christian principles."

"I just believe that marriage is man and woman. No gray areas in between," agreed the Rev. Samuel Griffith, a pastor at Union Street Missionary Baptist Church in Danville, Va.

Twenty percent of Virginia's population is black, according to the 2004 census. Mr. Allen won 20 percent of the black vote when elected governor in 1993, and 17 percent in his 2000 Senate election.

A recent poll conducted by The Washington Post showed that Mr. Webb is supported by blacks 81 percent to 11 percent. That same group supported the amendment 61 percent to 34 percent in the poll.

Opponents of the amendment are well-funded and organized, with a large grass-roots operation to turn out voters in Northern Virginia.

Opponents say the measure is unnecessary because same-sex couples already are forbidden from exchanging vows in Virginia. They also say the amendment's language would affect opposite-sex unmarried couples.

That argument has helped shrink support for the amendment, but it is still expected to pass.

The Rev. Benjamin W. Robertson, pastor of Cedar Street Baptist Church of God in Richmond, believes in traditional marriage but plans to vote against the amendment.

"I am the longest-serving pastor in Virginia, and no one has ever asked me to perform a same-sex marriage," he said, adding he fears the amendment would affect heterosexual couples.

Mr. Robertson would not say which candidate he favors. The pastor said many black voters don't like Mr. Allen because he has not voted to increase the minimum wage and he once voted against making Martin Luther King's birthday a state holiday.

He said Mr. Webb is still an unknown to voters.

Others agreed, citing Mr. Webb's past suggestion that affirmative action was unfair to poor whites. He has since tempered those comments.

"I'm not comfortable with either one," said Mr. Blount, who is undecided.

Mr. Webb, who also has the backing of the state's Legislative Black Caucus, was endorsed last week by Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, who became the nation's first elected black governor in 1990.

Mr. Allen has been endorsed by state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a black Richmond Democrat. Both Mr. Wilder and Mr. Lambert oppose the marriage amendment, as do members of the legislative black caucus.

Outcome May Rest On Black Turnout (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Erving Sabb, a black Alexandria barber, sat in his chair at the Hair Clinic and considered what he knew and didn't know about the two men running for the U.S. Senate in Virginia.

"Well, not voting for the Republican, Allen. Never could support him," he said, referring to Sen. George Allen.

"But this Webb fella . . . he used to work for Reagan, didn't he? He was a Republican, too?" Sabb, 61, asked, shaking his head thinking about Allen's Democratic challenger, James Webb. "I vote for Democrats, but I'll only vote for a guy I know is a real Democrat. I want to know if he's really one of us."

Whether Webb, a former Republican and Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, will be able to energize loyal Democratic voters such as Sabb will be critical in determining who wins one of the tightest Senate races in the country.

African Americans, who make up about 20 percent of Virginia's electorate, vote reliably for Democrats and are key to their success in the Republican-dominated state. But Webb has struggled to gain their support because of questions about whether he used a racial epithet to describe blacks when he was younger and because of his stance on affirmative action, which he once called "state-sponsored racism."

Allen has had his own problems with black voters, dating to his days as a state delegate. Blacks have long been turned off by Allen's affinity for the Confederate flag and his 1984 vote against a state holiday commemorating the birthday of Martin Luther King Jr., among other things. Last month, a handful of Allen's former teammates accused him of repeatedly using a racial epithet for blacks when he played football at the University of Virginia, a charge Allen denied.

Allen has tried to mend fences with the state's black community, highlighting his support of black colleges and appearing at several important political events.

Nonetheless, a Washington Post poll conducted last month showed that blacks were overwhelmingly supporting Webb: 81 percent of African Americans said they would vote for the Democrat, compared with 11 percent who said they'd vote for Allen.

But the determining factor, political experts said, will be how many of those voters go to the polls on Election Day, given concerns about both candidates.

"If I was running this race for Webb, the path I would seek for victory is running really well in Northern Virginia and getting a big black turnout in the Tidewater area and the Richmond area," said David Bositis, an expert on black voting patterns at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington. "How many black voters are going to show up . . . that's going to be key."

Successful Virginia Democrats have been helped by high turnout among blacks. In 1989, when L. Douglas Wilder became the first black candidate to be elected governor in the nation's history, African Americans made up 17 percent of voters, according to an analysis by the Weldon Cooper Center for Public Service at the University of Virginia.

In 2001, when Mark R. Warner took the governor's mansion, blacks constituted 15 percent of voters. Both Wilder and Warner won more than 90 percent of their vote.

In between those elections, Republicans Allen and James S. Gilmore III won gubernatorial races in elections when black turnout was less than 14 percent, according to the center's analysis.

Webb probably needs a better turnout than his Democratic predecessors. Many black leaders were initially critical of the former Marine for his position on affirmative action, which has been endorsed by the Democratic party establishment for decades. Webb said he supports affirmative action for blacks but not for other minorities. Otherwise, he thinks preferential job and education programs should be awarded based on economic conditions or not at all.

Webb lost nearly all of the state's majority black communities to Harris N. Miller during the Democratic primary. And although the state's Legislative Black Caucus endorsed Webb in his race against Allen, they did so by a 9 to 8 vote, according to two people who were familiar with the decision.

Webb's effort to woo conservative GOP-leaning voters and independents back into the Democratic column has also clashed with the sensibilities of many black Democrats. His first television commercial, for instance, sought to connect the candidate with Reagan, an unpopular figure among blacks.

After appearing before an audience of black voters in Alexandria last week, Webb acknowledged that he started with an uphill battle reaching out to African Americans.

"The number one thing that I saw is that I worked for Reagan. . . . It was especially hard for the African American leadership," he said, adding that he still believed Reagan was a "very fine" president. "But I've explained my journey on that . . . and it's been a process of us getting to know one another."

In recent weeks, Webb has tried to boost his presence in black communities. Late last month, he visited a dozen black churches in Hampton Roads. In addition, he picked up support from several black newspapers and received the endorsement of Wilder, now the mayor of Richmond. Wilder plans to campaign with Webb today in Richmond, and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) will join him on the stump there tomorrow.

Some activists said that Webb's opposition to the Iraq war will help with black voters, overriding other potential concerns. Recent polls have found that blacks are more likely than whites to say that the Iraq war was a mistake.

"I think there's going to be a lot of support for him," said Robert James, a black Democratic activist from Arlington County. "He opposed the war early, and in regards to affirmative action, we're beginning to like what we see."

That view was borne out by those who attended the Alexandria event, where Webb received enthusiastic applause when he talked about raising the minimum wage and his concern about a growing economic divide in America.

"Now that I'm beginning to hear more of his message, I'm beginning to feel more comfortable," said Thad Denney, 52, an insurance agent from Fairfax, who was at the event. "I'll admit it, I only knew him from his days as Navy secretary and didn't know where he stood. I wasn't sure if I was going to vote for him . . . but I'm thinking about it now."

Allen also has tried to mend fences with the black community, appearing at an NAACP dinner earlier this month and signing a lifetime membership to the organization. At the dinner, Allen said that he was not perfect and looked forward "to joining hands" with black voters.

Supporters say that Allen has pushed education programs, including Virginia's Standards of Learning and the federal No Child Left Behind law, that are especially beneficial to blacks.

He also picked up an important endorsement from state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III (D-Richmond), a leading black lawmaker, who said in an interview that Allen has "appeared to be trying hard" to reach out to black voters and will help secure federal money for Virginia's historically black colleges.

DOJ_NMG_0089683

Still, there is long-standing anger toward Allen and skepticism about his support for black colleges.

In an interview, Harrison B. Wilson, president of Norfolk State University from 1975 to 1997, said that when Allen was governor he never visited the school, turning down three invitations to speak at its commencement ceremony. "Every other governor came and had lunch with me and visited campus and spoke at commencement while they were in office," said Wilson, who recently aired his feelings about Allen with his church congregation.

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign director, said black church leaders and William Harvey, president of Hampton University, continue to support his candidate.

Lambert said he wasn't concerned.

"I kind of like to judge people on what they do now," Lambert said. "I think George has changed an awful lot. I didn't like some of the things he did as governor as well, but at the same I time I think our relationship has improved tremendously. He is very apologetic for things that happened earlier in his life."

A Star Of Red-state Virginia Has A Fight On His Hands (CSM)

By John Dillin

The Christian Science Monitor, November 1, 2006

FALLS CHURCH, VA.

A few months ago, when the warm breezes of summer were wafting across Virginia's Blue Ridge Mountains, George Allen could justly expect only one result from Election 2006 - he would be reelected easily to the US Senate.

Senator Allen's supporters were already quietly looking beyond November. There were whispers in Republican circles about Allen running for the White House in 2008.

Yet as autumn drew near, there was an abrupt change in the political climate. The winds from the Blue Ridge grew cold. Very cold.

Jim Webb, a decorated, twice-wounded combat marine with family roots in the hamlets and hollows of Virginia's mountains, suddenly threatened Allen's comfortable lead.

Starting in February with no money and few supporters, Mr. Webb had built strength. In June, he won the Democratic Senate primary against an opponent who outspent him 3-to-1. As summer turned to fall, Webb picked up momentum. Allen was now fighting for his survival.

Political polls have seesawed. The latest Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times survey found Webb slightly ahead, 47 percent to 44 percent.

This remains Allen's race to lose, however. Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, explains that in federal elections in Virginia, "Republicans almost always win the close races."

Republicans hope so. Otherwise, this election could become part of a major shift in Washington. A Democratic victory here, combined with other states where Republicans are in deep trouble, could tip the balance in the Senate to the Democrats, and give President Bush a rough finish to his second term.

GOP notables, including the president, have rushed to Virginia to help the senator's embattled cause. Mr. Bush raised $500,000 for Allen in a single day Oct. 19.

Democratic worthies, including former President Bill Clinton, smell an upset. Mr. Clinton, on the same day Bush was here, raised a similar $500,000 for the Webb campaign.

It's that close.

So why is Allen - one of only six men in Virginia history to be elected both governor and US senator - in such trouble? After all, he's well known and widely liked across the state. Though a native Californian, he has close ties here. He graduated with history and law degrees from the University of Virginia, and was a quarterback on Virginia's football team.

True to his college, founded by Thomas Jefferson, Allen preaches his adherence to "Jeffersonian principles," one of which is the centrality of the family to America's social and political order, notes Peter Onuf, Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation professor at the university.

To understand Allen's problems, however, one needs to look no further than the war in Iraq, as well as to an obscure word with Portuguese origins - "macaca."

First, Iraq. The war might not be such a problem for Allen, except for Webb. Allen has backed the president in the war from the outset. And Webb has opposed it. As security problems grow worse in Iraq, it is "advantage Webb."

What makes Webb so effective on Iraq in a conservative, pro-defense state like Virginia is his extensive military record along with a gravitas that drives home both the human and economic costs of the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0089684

A 1968 graduate of the United States Naval Academy, Webb later served as a Marine Corps company commander in the Vietnam War. He came away with the Navy Cross, Silver Star, two Bronze Stars, and two Purple Hearts. He knows first- hand the bitter price of war in blood, treasure, and heartbreak.

Some Democratic consultants privately lament that Webb is not what one of them calls "a natural politician" - something Webb readily concedes. On the campaign trail, Webb is a stern, straight-backed man of about 6 feet who seldom smiles and carries himself more like a drill sergeant than a glad-handing politician.

Webb comes from a military background that he traces back to the Scots-Irish who fought, and often defeated, the armies of English kings. He is clearly proud of his ethnic heritage, which he explored in his 2004 book, "Born Fighting: How the Scots-Irish Shaped America."

Since leaving the military because of his war wounds, Webb has become a millionaire writer of six novels, as well as his non-fiction volume on the Scots-Irish. But he is never far mentally from his warrior days.

The Webb family's commitment to the military continues with his son, James Robert Webb, now in Iraq with the Marines. The candidate brushes aside questions about his son's tour, but wears a pair of marine boots on the campaign trail.

Since leaving the military, Webb has been a party switcher. Originally a Democrat, he quit after President Jimmy Carter, also a Democrat, pardoned draft dodgers after the Vietnam War.

When Ronald Reagan became president, Webb joined his Republican administration, first as an assistant secretary of defense, then as secretary of the Navy. But his party hopping continued.

Webb told reporters recently in Arlington that before the Iraq war began, he warned that it could become a quagmire. When Bush ignored such advice and plunged into Iraq, Webb dumped the GOP and returned to the Democrats.

Webb was only marginally responsible for another of Allen's problems. It was a split-second mistake by the senator, captured on video. While at a public meeting, Allen spotted a young Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent who had been recording Allen's speeches at various locations. The senator knew the man worked for Webb, and speaking to him, referred to him as "macaca," and welcomed him "to America."

Allen claims he just made up the word "macaca." But it turns out that in some countries, the term is considered an insult and refers to a genus of European monkey - although it doesn't appear in most dictionaries. (This reporter finally found it in a 12-1/2-pound, unabridged Webster's.) Allen apologized for any offense, but critics charged him with uttering a racial slur. Damage control pulled Allen away from the message of his campaign for days.

Webb has interpersonal problems of his own, however. Most of those problems are with women, some of whom have criticized his writing about women in the military.

A prime target has been a 1979 article, "Women Can't Fight," in the Washingtonian magazine. There are claims that the article prompted extreme hostility toward female cadets at the Naval Academy.

Webb has apologized, but some former cadets still fume about it.

The candidate recently called together reporters and several retired women military officers to counter the criticism. Nine former women officers endorsed Webb, though like the senior officers they once were, some of them gently dressed down the former marine, who appeared to wince at least once.

Retired Army Col. Barbara Lee reread his articles before joining "Veterans for Webb." She called the article "extremely troubling." But after talking with Webb, she told reporters that he was "a young man then," but is now "a seasoned leader" who has "moved along in his thinking."

As is fitting for a Senate race in Virginia - the home of George Washington, James Monroe, and James Madison - both Senate candidates look into history for inspiration and guidance. Both share a favorite president, Ronald Reagan. Allen is a Reagan Republican, Webb a Reagan Democrat.

And each has a favorite president from America's first century. For Allen, it is Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence. For Webb, it is Andrew Jackson. Webb notes that "Old Hickory," as he was known, was the first populist president, and fought for the little man - something Webb wants to do in the Senate. And besides, Jackson was Scots-Irish.

The Two-Minute Drill (WP)

By Michael Leahy

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

He would have been forgiven for looking stressed. His fat summer lead of 16 percentage points had disappeared. But George Allen seemed just fine early Saturday morning. If tense campaigns demand that imperiled candidates, like card players, learn the art of the bluff, Allen has mastered the technique.

For the first of seven frenetic campaign events on this day, he had come to Winchester, which is solid Allen turf, a good hour away from his electoral troubles in increasingly Democratic Northern Virginia. About 200 people had come to a small hotel to wear Allen stickers, eat breakfast and wait for his exhortation. The chairman of Virginia's Republican Party, Kate Obenshain Griffin, launched into her introduction by promising the crowd that "if you've never heard George Allen speak, you'll leave here with a passion you've never had before."

Standing off to the side, Allen softly groaned at the effusive praise, as if a tad embarrassed. "Gosh, geez, ahhhhhh," he muttered, his voice all but inaudible. He towered over several seated breakfasters who, never having met him before, shyly, furtively glanced his way. A few Allen aides in the room occasionally rubbed their eyes, stifled yawns. It had been a long week, and Saturday would be even more grueling, with two long rides of more than an hour awaiting them. Presidents have travel perks: Air Force One, helicopters, bulletproof limos that ride along cleared-out interstates. George Allen, like any other senator in a reelection campaign, cruises like a road-weary salesman.

There is nothing more instructive about the unglamorous nature of the midterm election process than to ride for a day in chase of the candidate's vehicle, which on this day would be racing south through Virginia, trying to put some space between the candidate and an increasingly formidable foe.

His name called by Griffin, Allen strode to the front of the room, beaming. "Ladies and gentlemen . . . patriots all," he boomed. "Good mornin'. Are you ready to win?"

"Yesssss!" the crowd howled back. Allen grinned. His ability to stir his political base has inspired comparisons to Ronald Reagan, part of the reason why he was long regarded by many as the chief rival to John McCain for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. But ever since a series of missteps that led some to see him as racially or ethnically insensitive, Allen's poll numbers have been sliding.

If Allen's Democratic rival, James Webb, has been the beneficiary, analysts generally agree that this has less to do with his strengths than with Republicans' woes generally and Allen's in particular. In a recent poll of Republican and Democratic insiders conducted by the National Journal, the sampled political pros said Allen had run the worst of all Senate campaigns in the country.

But on this Saturday, the incumbent sounded like a man 20 points up. He talked happily about how his trademark cowboy boots were ready for the race's final sprint. "I only expected a third of this crowd to be out here on a rainy day," he said, rocketing through his stump speech.

In conclusion, the former college quarterback and son of the famous Washington Redskins coach exhorted his troops: "This is the final two-drill . . . Let's get out to victory . . . The boots are ready!"

Out in the audience, Kenny Noe stood and applauded. A political independent, he has been a longtime supporter of Allen. He is a computer technician from nearby Stephens City and, at 40, savvy about the way the world works. He knows politics is a rough game, but even so he has been disappointed by the tenor of campaigns from both parties this year.

"If I had the opportunity, I'd tell Senator Allen that the campaign and the negative campaign ads are turning me off to the whole process," Noe said. "But a [campaign event] is not the place where you can comfortably talk to someone about something like that."

True. An American political rally has its own rituals. Sunny dispositions are mandatory. Discussion of a candidate's problems is verboten. So Kenny Noe and his wife, Traci, lined up to have their picture taken -- on Traci's cellphone -- with Allen, who was doing what nearly all candidates do in these situations: making happy small talk. Riffing about a good hamburger. The Virginia Tech football game the other night. Allen smiled and positioned himself for the photo. He smoothed his blue blazer and adjusted his red tie. "Let's get your bride in close," Allen said to Kenny. The line moved on. Another supporter shyly approached. Allen shook his hand and smiled at the woman alongside him. "Is this your bride?" he asked brightly.Unscripted Moments

Allen's second stop of the day was to a volunteer fire and rescue unit just outside Berryville. After that he hurried into his campaign's red Ford Explorer and was driven back to Winchester, so that he could stand at the entrance to the Handley High School football stadium, the site of an afternoon game.

He shed his blazer and necktie. He gripped a football, in case incoming spectators wanted him to throw passes their way. Not many people stopped. It was a reminder of just how seldom prominent officeholders intrigue the public. In most cases, Simon Cowell would do better.

A stocky man walked by, trailed by a little boy carrying a miniature ball with a Redskins logo on it.

"That's a good Redskins football," Allen said to the kid.

"I don't like the Redskins," said the boy. That was the problem with a public event like a football game -- a non-campaign event. Nothing was controlled. Supporters did not necessarily predominate. There might be a weird moment. On the other hand, a candidate had a chance to win over undecideds.

Here came another kid, this one lithe and big. "Hey, young man, let me throw you a pass," Allen said.

The kid looked at his father, who nodded.

"Go long, go deep," Allen said.

DOJ_NMG_0089686

The kid ran about 15 yards and turned. Allen threw a decent spiral and the boy caught it. His father shook Allen's hand. "I'd appreciate your vote," the candidate said to Thomas Grant Jr., who smiled and wished Allen luck, saying to others, as he walked away, that while he hadn't decided, he thought he might vote for Allen, having enjoyed meeting him.

Buoyed, Allen stuck out his hand toward a thin, mustachioed man with a jaunty black leather cap. "I'm George Allen," he said. "Nice to meet you. Would appreciate your vote."

The man warmly shook Allen's hand and smiled. "Very nice to meet you, too," he said.

Allen began giving him his pitch. "I want you to keep more of your money in your wallet," he said. "And I'd be grateful if you took a look at my stance on illegal immigration. Another really big issue is -- " The smiling man interrupted Allen, amiably. "Can I ask you something? I'm just curious. When will we ever get back to discussing issues? I'm not concerned about the history of a man way back before. And I know it's not just you doing it. It's just that I'd just like to hear more about what all of you are going to do with all the problems, Iraq and everything else. I'm just asking."

Allen nodded. "Yes, and that's right. And I talk about those very important things every day. I really do hope you'll take a look at my positions on taxes and illegal immigration because -- "

"But there is a lot more of the other thing on television -- about the opponents, I mean," said the man, whose name was Larry Banks and who works as a pharmacy technician in Winchester. Banks, 59, had not made up his mind about Allen and Webb, genuinely on the fence about the race, he said, and just as genuinely engaged in their campaigns. "I'd like to hear more about the issues when I turn on the television and it's you on. And, like I said, don't misunderstand, it's not just you, but . . . I guess I'm tired of hearing the slurs from everybody."

Allen nodded. "Well, please take a look at my stance on all those things. And I'd appreciate your vote."

Up at the entrance, Allen's aides were telling him it was time to go; they were already running behind schedule. "Let's go, let's go," Allen responded and, grabbing the football, threw a pass to an aide headed for the red Explorer. "Touchdown."Pedal to the Metal

One of the worst-kept secrets of campaign managers is that they overschedule candidates, are chronically late for everything and try to compensate by having aides drive at some suborbital speed to get to the next event.

Allen headed toward a barbecue at a supporter's house in the town of Sperryville, which was about 58 miles away from Handley High School. Mapquest said it would take an hour and 29 minutes to get there, but Mapquest doesn't count on people driving at 80 to 85 mph.

Allen slept some of the way. The Explorer rocketed south along Route 522, over roadkill in its many forms, around a piece of sheet metal at one point, and once swerving slightly to get out of the way of an erratic driver. Much of the way the SUV was being buffeted by stiff gusts of 30 to 40 mph.

When the Explorer reached the house, Allen ran out and immediately started shaking hands. A bluegrass band was playing on a deck. Supporters wore name tags and Allen stickers. A woman named Connie Hair ran up to Allen to say she had already voted absentee for him. Allen thanked her, hugged his hosts, posed for a few pictures and headed back toward the Explorer, gone. He had been there for 12 minutes.Fact and Fiction

He was off on another long drive south again, this time to Glen Allen, to pick up an endorsement from the National Rifle Association, whose officials waited for him in the parking lot of Green Top Sporting Goods, where a sign carried a huge word in big block letters: GUNS.

Allen was a half-hour late, stepping out of the vehicle even as it was coasting to a stop. He ran toward a podium. About 100 supporters clapped loudly. Cars slowed on the main drag of U.S. 1, right out in front of the store, with motorists craning their necks to see what the fuss was all about. There came the sound of a crash, somebody getting rear-ended. Eventually the candidate took questions, virtually all of which dealt with Allen's charge that novels written by Jim Webb had demeaned women.

When asked whether novelists who had ever written a sex scene, from John Steinbeck to John Updike, were unworthy of pursuing political office, Allen joked, "Are they on the ballot?"

This got a good laugh from his supporters -- proof of the wisdom of staging news conferences while surrounded by boosters. "My opponent runs ads and talks about himself being a writer," he said. "This is part of his record. . . . He can explain those [book] passages. Not just me but others find those passages to be demeaning to women. He can explain those passages."

If Webb's books were grist for fair debate, a reporter asked, should the book by Allen's sister Jennifer be scrutinized, particularly passages that claimed he had bullied her, dragging her by the hair and once dangling her over Niagara Falls?

The boosters fell quiet. Allen stayed composed. "That book is a novel and fiction," he said, "and I love my sister, and she had me escort her down the aisle when she got married. . . . She said it was a novelization of certain events, a lot of it from her perspective [as] . . . a young girl from her view of growing up in a fairly rough and rowdy family, but a lot of those are exaggerations."

DOJ_NMG_0089687

He said he wanted to touch on a couple of other "big issues," noting his support of the Virginia Marriage Protection Amendment.

"Amen," a supporter called out.

But Allen got back on point: "My record is an open book, and he can explain passages that he wrote in his books, because he's proud of being an author."

Is this about character? a reporter pressed.

"He needs to explain his passages," Allen said resolutely.

"Thank you," an aide interrupted, ending things.Focused on the Game

Allen made an appearance at a Ducks Unlimited dinner, and then his day ended in Richmond, at the season's opening home game of the Renegades, a minor-league hockey team. The team's president, Allan B. Harvie Jr., had invited him to drop the ceremonial first puck on this evening and, afterward he stayed to watch the game.

At the end of the first period, he was playing with a souvenir hockey stick under the stands, near the locker room, when a reporter who had grilled him at the NRA event appeared.

Allen slipped the stick around the reporter's left ankle and pretended to jerk. "Tripping," he said, but he was smiling, in good humor. His wife, Susan, had come to the game, and so had one of his best friends, and Allen was looking serene, playing a little game, shooting a puck down a hallway and jogging after it, then tapping it further down the hallway, like a kid dribbling a basketball. No one interfered with his game.

"Let George shoot," his wife said.

"I used to play on a pond when I was a boy," Allen recalled, "second to eighth grade, when we were living out near Chicago, when my father was coaching there."

Someone wanted to ask him a last question about Webb, but he was too engrossed in that puck, asking that a friend open a door so that he could attempt to shoot the puck through it. He drew back for a wrist shot -- and the puck flew through the opening, Allen exultant, his wife saying, "You keep on winning."

"Thanks, coach," he said to her.

An aide whispered in his ear, wanting something. "Not now -- can talk about that later," he said softly, and then the aide repeated the question.

"Not now," Allen said.

People began shuffling into the red Explorer. "It's starting all over again tomorrow anyway," Allen said, climbing into the Explorer, at rest.

Sex And The Sinking Candidate (WP)

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

SEN. GEORGE ALLEN implored Virginians four weeks ago to focus less on personal attacks and more on "the issues" in his race for reelection. Now he has seized on an unlikely one: sex scenes in novels written by his Democratic opponent, James Webb. Now there's a pressing concern for Americans in 2006.

Mr. Allen, a Republican whose campaign professes profound moral shock that actual sex should occur in fiction, has spent months trying to extract himself from his own "macaca"-inspired tailspin. When all else failed -- including an Allen ad in which a woman accused Mr. Webb of misquoting her, although he never quoted her at all -- Mr. Allen apparently decided that what he needed was a sex scandal crafted to smear his rival and timed for the campaign's fourth quarter. Lacking such material in real life, he turned to Mr. Webb's novels, most of which concern the wartime experiences of soldiers and international intrigue. There he found -- horrors! -- sex. And what better place to spread the word than the Web site of Matt Drudge, the online gossip-monger. That ensured the story would be echoed by radio talk show hosts in high dudgeon.

Mr. Allen has spent months disparaging Mr. Webb as a writer of fiction, as if a novelist's experience is any more divorced from everyday reality than the life of a U.S. senator. His campaign suggests that because some female characters in Mr. Webb's books are portrayed as sleazy or servile Mr. Webb must himself see women in that light. Please. Maybe Mr. Allen also believes that J.K. Rowling, author of the Harry Potter series, takes too soft a line on wizards.

DOJ_NMG_0089688

As it happens, Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary, assistant secretary of defense and Marine company commander in Vietnam, is an acclaimed novelist whose books are widely read. Mr. Allen wouldn't say whether he'd read any of Mr. Webb's novels himself -- only that "I've been reading initiatives and ideas and I'm trying to motivate people and inspire people."

Mr. Allen certainly is an inspiration -- to anyone who believes that political campaigns may be won by diversions and dirty tactics, even as the candidate calls high-mindedly for a discussion of "the issues." Win or lose, he'll be remembered for his performance during this race, and not fondly.

Allen's Fumbles, Romney's Gain (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Even before the votes are counted, over the Republican Party a "thick darkness broodeth" -- words from a Victorian hymn, for a party with a Victorian tendency. But one Republican, who is not running for anything this year, will emerge from this bruising season with enlarged prospects. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's hopes for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination have been enhanced by Virginia Sen. George Allen's difficulties.

Romney's most formidable rival for the Republican nomination is John McCain, who needs a crowded field of Republican aspirants to prevent the conservative majority of the party's nominating electorate from quickly coalescing around a single candidate. Allen once seemed likely to compete with Romney for conservatives' support.

But Allen, who makes no secret of finding life as a senator tedious, is fighting ferociously for another term, a fate from which his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, is close to rescuing him. As a result, Allen is dabbling in literary criticism. He has read, or someone has read for him, at least some of Webb's six fine novels, finding therein sexual passages that have caused Allen -- he of the football metaphors, cowboy regalia and Copenhagen smokeless tobacco -- to blush like a fictional Victorian maiden and fulminate like an actual Victorian man, Anthony Comstock, the 19th-century scourge of sin who successfully agitated for New York and federal anti-obscenity statutes and is credited with the destruction of 160 tons of naughty printed matter and pictures.

Webb, a highly decorated Marine veteran of Vietnam combat, includes sexual scenes in his fictional depictions of young men far from home and close to combat, something about which he knows a lot and Allen does not. Allen says the scenes are demeaning to women and are evidence of flaws in Webb's character.

This ham-handed grab for women's votes may help Allen win but will not help him escape the perception that, as a presidential aspirant, he is problematic. His ragged campaign has made him seem accident-prone, and by Tuesday he probably will have burned through all the money he could raise. But to be competitive in the nomination contests that begin with the Iowa caucuses in January 2008, a candidate probably needs to have at least $60 million by December 2007. Allen would have to raise that amount in 60 weeks. A million dollars a week is a daunting challenge.

Allen's radically reduced prospects will make it less likely that McCain can duplicate his 2000 triumph in New Hampshire's primary. As one seasoned New Hampshire Republican says, "It is difficult to capture lightning in a bottle twice." It will be particularly difficult for McCain to do so because there is apt to be a spirited New Hampshire contest on the Democratic side. This would draw independent voters who were crucial to McCain in 2000, when he thrashed George W. Bush, receiving 115,606 votes (48.53 percent) to Bush's 72,330 (30.36).

But Bush won the Republican part of the Republican primary, in this sense: New Hampshire independents can vote in either party's primary, and 34 percent of McCain voters identified themselves as independents. A 41 percent plurality of the Republicans voting favored Bush, 38 percent favored McCain.

If one disregards President Harry Truman's brief interest in seeking a second full term in 1952 -- he renounced running on March 29 -- and the ineffectual attempt by his vice president, Alben Barkley, to secure the nomination, 2008 will be the first election in 56 years with neither an incumbent president nor vice president seeking a nomination. If you count the Truman and Barkley episodes, 2008 will be the first such election since 1928.

So the presidential field is uncommonly open, and there is a palpable desire in the country to shuffle the political deck. In their new book "The Way to Win: Taking the White House in 2008," Mark Halperin of ABC News and John F. Harris of The Post suggest why:

"When the current President Bush completes his full second term, it will be the first time since James Madison and James Monroe almost two hundred years ago that back-to-back presidents both served all eight years of two elected terms. Put another way, two of the most divisive figures in this country's history will have commanded the White House for sixteen consecutive years."

DOJ_NMG_0089689

Such circumstances should entice many aspirants into the race. Yet with Allen much diminished and perhaps out of contention, and with Rudy Giuliani not yet doing serious groundwork for a national campaign, the Republican field is already down to two. That is good for only one of them: Romney.

Cardin, Steele Put Focus On PG (WT)

By S.A. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The battle for Prince George's County voters is intensifying in the final days of Maryland's U.S. Senate race.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee, will team up a second time with Sen. Barack Obama, the Senate's only black member, to woo voters in the mostly black and heavily Democratic county.

Mr. Cardin, 63, also is lining up last-minute endorsements in the county, including from Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson, a black Democrat who could announce his support for Mr. Cardin as early as today, county officials said.

Prominent black Democrats in the county broke party ranks this week to support Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee and the first black elected statewide in Maryland. The Democratic crossovers have accused party officials of repeatedly snubbing the black community and their county.

Mr. Steele, who lives in Prince George's, will be campaigning alongside his crossover supporters, which include all five black members of the County Council and former county Executive Wayne K. Curry.

The election could hinge on how Prince George's 320,000 registered Democrats vote Tuesday.

The county, which is more than 65 percent black, accounts for a large part the Democratic Party's overwhelming advantage in voter registration.

Maryland has about 900,000 registered Republicans and 1.7 million registered Democrats, of which an estimated 700,000 are black.

Polls show the race in a dead heat.

"Cardin's office called yesterday, and they're having Obama, and I'd like to go," said Mount Rainier Mayor Malinda Miles, whose endorsement could sway some of her 600 constituents. "And Steele also is calling and saying, 'I need you.' I'm torn in between.

"If Wayne Curry and the majority of the council endorsed him ... I think it's going to be a major impact," she said.

Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, refrained from criticizing Mr. Steele when campaigning for Mr. Cardin after his narrow primary victory over Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional representative, and Rep. Elijah E. Cummings of Maryland have said they will not attack Mr. Steele, even as they campaign for his Democratic rival.

"I think that is a tactical decision," Mrs. Norton said last week.

Though Mr. Cardin won the statewide primary, Mr. Mfume trounced him in Prince George's, winning 74,637 votes to Mr. Cardin's 19,824.

Mr. Cardin, a white 10-term congressman from Baltimore, has struggled to shore up black support.

Mr. Curry and other black Democrats throwing their support to Mr. Steele this week reiterated accusations that party leaders blocked Mr. Mfume's run and criticism that the ticket lacks black candidates.

Both senatorial campaigns made stops yesterday in Prince George's.

Mr. Steele, 48, greeted residents at a senior-citizen center in Brentwood. Mr. Cardin stumped for universal health care outside the Prince George's County Health Department in Cheverly.

"I've been in this county campaigning more than any other county in the state," Mr. Cardin told reporters. "We'll be here the rest of this week, every day, because of the importance of Prince George's County to our campaign."

A Steele campaign spokesman described the push in the county as "aggressive."

About 400 Steele campaign volunteers have been canvassing in the county for the past several weeks. Joe Gaskins, chairman of the Steele campaign in Prince George's, said he hopes to have between 3,000 and 5,000 canvassers in the county on Election Day.

The candidates are engaged in a fierce tug of war for the county's voters, said the Rev. C. Anthony Muse, a Democrat running unopposed for a Prince George's state Senate seat.

"I've seen them both working extremely hard," he said. "Their presence is felt here in Prince George's County. ... Workers are on the ground. People are enthused about this race."

A Black Republican Runs Against The Tide In Maryland Senate Race (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

DOJ_NMG_0089690

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

Washington — Though political momentum appears to be with Democrats around the country, the trend is going the other way in one solidly blue state, where a Republican candidate is gaining on the favored Democrat in a contest with an unexpected racial twist.

The state is Maryland and the candidate is Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, a black Republican running for the Senate against a white Democratic congressman, Benjamin L. Cardin.

Once trailing by more than 10 points, Steele narrowed the margin to where the race is now considered by some to be nearly a tossup. His recent gains reflect growing dissatisfaction among some blacks toward the state Democratic Party.

On Monday, a group of prominent African American Democrats from Prince George's County in the Washington suburbs crossed party lines to endorse the Republican.

"The [Democratic] Party acts as though when they want our opinion they'll give it to us," said Wayne Curry, the former county executive who led the mutiny. "It will not be like that anymore."

Curry and others complained that although nearly 30% of the state's population and 35% of Democratic voters were African American, too many of the statewide Democratic candidates in this year's election were white.

Endorsing Steele "is a way to say, 'Don't leave Prince George's out, and don't leave African Americans out,' " said county council member David Harrington at a press conference.

Racial tensions in Maryland's Democratic Party have been brewing since earlier this year, when Cardin beat back a primary challenge from former congressman and NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume by a margin of 44% to 41%.

Democratic leaders say that Cardin won because he raised more money than Mfume. But Ronald Walters, a professor at the University of Maryland who studies African American politics, said the party leadership rallied early around Cardin, which hampered Mfume's ability to raise cash.

"I was startled by the swiftness of it," Walters said. "It was as if they wanted to foreclose the possibility of anybody else jumping in."

Since winning the primary, Cardin has generally polled well above Steele, which would be expected in a state where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2 to 1. But Cardin's lead began to slip recently, and some polls show it in the single digits.

One reason, observers say, is that Steele has run a series of clever TV ads, including one known as "the puppy ad." In an effort to inoculate himself against negative Democratic ads, Steele warns voters that they are likely to hear Democrats accuse him of terrible things like hating puppies.

"For the record," Steele says, "I love puppies."

Jennifer Duffy, who analyzes Senate races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, says that Steele's strong performance has been a surprise.

"Mfume didn't have all that much money, and he still got 41%. Which tells me people didn't exactly flock to Cardin," Duffy said. "Steele is a lot better than expected. It's not that Cardin is a bad candidate; he's just a little dull."

On Friday, Duffy officially moved the race — which is for the seat of retiring Democrat Paul S. Sarbanes — from the "leans Democratic" category to "tossup."

"At the end of the day, do I think it's really hard for Steele? Yes," Duffy said. "It's a very Democratic state and a very bad environment for Republicans. But he has made this a race."

Maryland's Democratic Party insists that Cardin is well ahead of Steele, and that even a black Republican in a state with a sizable African American community will have trouble getting elected this year.

"I think the voters understand that a vote for Michael Steele is a vote for George Bush," said state Democratic Party spokesman David Paulson. "Right now, Democrats don't like the guys who are holding George Bush's hand."

Democrats also complain that to attract Democrats and independents, Steele has been softening his positions to make himself sound more liberal. In particular, they cite what they describe as changing statements about his views on abortion and stem cell research.

"You need to round up a search party to find out where he stands on the issues," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.).

And they also point out that because Steele is from Prince George's County, where he got his start in politics, the support he's won there from some black Democrats may not carry over to the rest of the state.

Still, the race has been closer than expected.

Duffy said that Steele's success continued to be an aberration for black Republicans. The other two black GOP candidates who have caught national attention, gubernatorial candidates J. Kenneth Blackwell in Ohio and Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania, are not expected to win.

"Of the three of them," Duffy said, "Steele is the last man standing."

Va., Md. Senate Camps Dig Deep (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Television viewers in Virginia and Maryland are being inundated by a last-minute deluge of commercials from the U.S. Senate candidates and their national political party benefactors, who are pouring millions of dollars into the two states as the bitter fall campaign draws to a close.

The flood of money into the two states means that hardly anyone who watches TV in the next six days will be able to avoid seeing the candidates or their surrogates make a final plea for votes before Tuesday's election. In the Washington area media market, for example, even a casual TV viewer will see 42 campaign commercials for Republican George Allen or Democrat James Webb between now and Election Day, advertising specialists said.

"Each side is dishing it out," said Charlie Cook, who edits a nonpartisan national political newsletter. He said that the money pouring into Maryland and Virginia, especially from Democrats, is staggering. "It's almost as though Chuck Schumer has a printing press in his basement." U.S. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

In Virginia, that committee has bought $2.6 million worth of TV and radio spots that began airing yesterday, bringing its contributions on behalf of Webb to about $6 million. The GOP counterpart has spent $1 million on ads for Allen.

In Maryland, the National Republican Senatorial Committee contributed $400,000 yesterday to air 93 TV spots on behalf of Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) on stations in Baltimore and the Eastern Shore. Democrats have pumped $1.7 million into Maryland for U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.).

The money from Washington, combined with the substantial cash raised by the Senate candidates, reflects how critical Virginia and Maryland are to the national political parties. A Steele victory in Maryland could doom hopes for Democratic control of the Senate. A victory by Webb in Virginia could be a disaster for the GOP.

The advertising intensity is particularly acute in Virginia, one of three states with close contests where control of the Senate is likely to be decided. Allen, who started the campaign with a huge financial advantage over first-time candidate Webb, will be outspent heavily by Democrats in the closing days as he fights for his political survival. A statewide poll for CNN released Monday showed Webb with a four-point lead over Allen among likely voters.

"It's clear to us that the DSCC and [Sens.] Chuck Schumer and Hillary Clinton -- oh, and let me add in John Kerry -- want to buy themselves a U.S. senator," said Allen consultant Chris LaCivita.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd promised a heavy dose of Webb on TV, offering "what he stands for, what he believes in, what type of person he is."

A spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, Dan Ronayne, said he could not comment on the TV push in Maryland but said, "We see it as a very close race."

Steele spokesman Doug Heye was more optimistic. "I think over the past week, this campaign has demonstrated that Michael Steele has more momentum than any candidate in the country," Heye said. "He's worked extremely hard to put himself in a position to win, and that's what we've seen happen."

A spokesman for Cardin, Oren Shur, said: "Michael Steele has been the chosen candidate of President Bush and the national Republicans from Day One in this campaign. We expect that to continue to Election Day."

Even as their mugs were flashing on TV, the candidates in both states took to the road yesterday, courting voters face to face.

Cardin spent the day in Prince George's County and Baltimore, where he spoke to a minority business group. Steele gave a 40-minute motivational speech at Morgan State University in Baltimore. In Virginia, Webb campaigned with former governor Mark R. Warner (D) in rural areas; Allen rallied in Charlottesville with Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.).

With the clock ticking toward Tuesday, the candidates continued to air negative charges, hoping to depress turnout for their opponents. An Allen ad running frequently in Virginia accuses Webb of failing to take seriously the Navy's Tailhook scandal, in which women were assaulted at a Las Vegas convention in 1991.

Webb has responded with an ad denying Allen's accusations.

"After a campaign filled with nothing but attacks on Jim's character, you would think that now, in the last week, [Allen] would find a shred of decency and keep this positive," Todd said Tuesday. "He can't do it."

LaCivita said that Todd's comments were "the pot calling the kettle black."

Allen and Webb also began airing more positive ads yesterday in hopes of appealing to voters' softer sides. By the end of the week, those ads are likely to become almost as ubiquitous as the attacks that viewers have come to expect as candidates attempt to end the campaign on a high note.

DOJ_NMG_0089692

In one new ad, called "Bottom Line," Webb looks directly into the camera and -- in a first for him -- directly asks to be elected to the Senate.

"Bottom line: They're not fighting for you," he says of incumbents in Washington. "I will. We need a new direction, on issues like making health care and college more affordable and setting a real strategy to make our nation more secure. If you're ready for change, I'd be honored to have your vote."

Allen countered with a new ad of his own, in which he says he deplores what he calls false character attacks and distortions of his record.

"That's not how we do things in Virginia," he says to the camera. "As your senator, I want to continue fighting for our shared values. Lower taxes, a better education for our children and a safer, stronger America. I'm George Allen, and I approve this message and respectfully ask for your vote."

Campaign Takes Low Road Through Crucial Missouri (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, November 1, 2006

FARMINGTON, Mo. – For Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.), one syllable, like one vote or a one-point margin, could make all the difference.

At a Republican rally on Monday in this small town 90 miles south of St. Louis, Talent first pronounced his home state "Missour-ee" and then as "Missour-ah," prompting a cable television producer to inquire about Talent's sudden twang.

Talent explained that he tends to adopt the inflection of those around him, noting that Sen. Kit Bond (R-Mo.), who introduced Talent to the local crowd, calls their home state "Missourah." It is not unusual for politicians to thicken their accents the farther they travel from Washington.

Talent's shifting inflection could serve as an analogy for competing natures of his appeal to voters; Talent has a studious, bookish reputation but his fight against state auditor Claire McCaskill (D) has been as down-and-dirty as others across the country.

Talent, one of seven GOP senators facing tough contests, is in the third fight for his political life. In 2000, he lost a gubernatorial race by one percentage point. Two years later, he won his current Senate seat by a percentage point.

McCaskill, a proven vote-getter, has won two statewide elections. In 2004, she defeated a sitting governor in the Democratic primary, but lost to then-Secretary of State Matt Blunt (R). Some Democrats said she let Republicans define her and did not spend enough time campaigning in rural Missouri. Now, McCaskill is running a more disciplined campaign, touring southern Missouri in her RV and focusing on appealing to rural voters.

Her advertisements, particularly her most recent and controversial one, have thrown Talent off-stride. Last Saturday during the first game of the World Series, the Democrat aired an advertisement on embryonic stem cell research with actor Michael J. Fox. With his symptoms of Parkinson's disease front and center, Fox endorsed McCaskill and criticized Talent, accusing him of opposing stem cell research.

The ad has drawn huge national attention, and Republican criticism for mendacity, but a supporter of Talent in Clayton, an upscale suburb of St. Louis, told two Talent canvassers that, "The Democrat's ads make Talent look like an idiot."

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) has spent $9.1 million running ads against Talent, alleging that he voted for legislation that would send jobs overseas. The Republican National Committee (RNC) and the Senate GOP campaign committee have spent $7.7 million on ads, polling and mailings.

"They're coming after me," McCaskill told a small group of labor supporters earlier last Saturday morning. "Why even take 30 seconds? They ought to just come out and say it. Claire is Satan's sister."

For weeks, Talent and his allies have alleged that McCaskill's husband beat his former wife and used investments in Bermuda to shield income from taxation; that the couple did not pay taxes on a lakeside condominium; and that as state auditor, McCaskill did not scrutinize the nursing home industry in which her husband made his fortune.

Having learned from her loss in 2004, McCaskill lets no attack go unanswered. She will begin airing a television advertisement tonight rebutting GOP criticism of her oversight of the nursing home industry. She insisted that her criticism of Talent is limited to his voting record in the Senate and that his campaign did not match his character.

"I've known Jim for 20 years … He's not a Prince-of-Darkness kind of guy," she said.

Talent said his campaign style was simply a matter of talking about his accomplishments and contrasting his record with his opponent's.

"Yeah, I talk about my record and what I've done and accomplished. I contrast that with her record … this is all relevant to the campaign," Talent said, referring to McCaskill's family's finances.

DOJ_NMG_0089693

While sources from both campaigns said the race would remain close in this traditional swing state, they acknowledged the negative attacks had driven up the candidates' disapproval and unfavorability ratings. A St. Louis Post-Dispatch poll showed the race tied with each candidate pulling in 47 percent of the vote.

Everyone, including both candidates, expect a tight race. Talent said even in a perfect world the best he could do is win by six points, 53 to 47 percent.

Republicans are pouring resources into the state. The Talent campaign is paying volunteers $50 for six hours of working for the campaign. The RNC is expected to send volunteers into the state and local Republicans are recruiting volunteers for the vaunted 72-hour program. In southwestern Missouri, a bastion of GOP votes, Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) is organizing 800 shifts of volunteers to knock on 40,000 doors and make 150,000 phone calls to likely GOP voters, said a campaign aide.

McCaskill loaned her campaign $500,000 last week. The DSCC and the state Democratic party have updated the voter file and labor unions and local and congressional Democrats will help get voters to the polls. Charlie Dooley, the St. Louis County Executive, said he plans to knock on 60,000 doors in the campaign's final week to help McCaskill. Rep. Russ Carnahan (D-Mo.) has deployed his political operation to help McCaskill and Democratic Reps. Lacy Clay and Emanuel Cleaver have done advertisements on black radio stations to encourage black voters.

With six days to go, both campaigns are ginning up support among their base voters. McCaskill began a campaign swing yesterday that will take her from St. Louis to Springfield to Kansas City. She plans to campaign for 24 hours straight starting Friday.

On Monday, Talent, Bond and Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) made stops in five cities in southeastern Missouri. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) campaigned yesterday for Talent and President Bush will visit Springfield on Friday.

Bond, who introduced Talent, hyped his work to combat methamphetamine abuse and increase resources for farmers to produce ethanol. Talent then reassured the base voters that he opposed gay marriage, amnesty for illegal immigrants and any legal consolations for terrorists. He mentioned Iraq only in passing.

At each of the five stops and at an evening fundraiser with Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow, Talent told the crowds that he "thinks" he can win. In a pithy rejoinder, Snow said, "The only difference between President Bush and Jim is that [Bush] knows you're going to win."

Democrats are watching McCaskill to see whether her strategy of appealing to culturally conservative voters will pay off. McCaskill laces her speeches with references to the Bible in an effort to connect with voters on a gut level and to make a case for Democratic policies. If she is successful, many Democrats believe her campaign can provide a road map for how to recapture the White House in 2008.

Her strategy appears to have yielded some dividends. Not only have polls shown her running ahead or even with Talent, she appears to have captured support from some disaffected Republicans.

"We need some changes and Claire is that change," said Bernard Fritz of St. Louis, a recent retiree and lifelong Republican who explained that he was fed up with the war and budget deficits.

For his part, Talent has not closed the deal with the few voters who remain undecided. At the Applebutter Festival in Kimmswick, Mo., last weekend, Orville Sauder, who was selling sausage and elk jerky, said, "I'm not impressed with Talent, but I really am unimpressed with McCaskill."

On Sunday afternoon in Clayton, some voters expressed disgust with both campaigns.

"They ought to quit talking about each other. Neither candidate is talking about themselves yet," said a middle-aged man who asked not to be identified. "I'm a supporter [of Talent], but I am [not sure]."

Chafee Takes Jab At Sen. Harry Reid (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 1, 2006

Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), whose collegial personality has bolstered his appeal in an otherwise blue state, took an indirect shot at Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) during a debate Monday night with his Democratic opponent, state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse.

When Whitehouse blasted Chafee for failing to push for Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation in the wake of escalating chaos in Iraq, the incumbent — trailing his foe by as many as eight points in recent polls — asked Whitehouse why he has failed to question Reid's amended reports to the Senate ethics committee clarifying the details of a $1.1 million land deal.

"Whitehouse is talking about, 'you should call for this, you should call for that,' and the senator is putting out that the current Democratic minority leader, Harry Reid, has got some ethics questions surrounding his conduct and Whitehouse has stayed silent," Chafee campaign manager Ian Lang said. "Does [he] believe that this disqualifies Reid as minority leader?"

DOJ_NMG_0089694

Whitehouse spokeswoman Alex Swartsel did not address the Chafee camp's question directly, instead continuing to hammer the centrist Republican as a reliable vote for GOP leadership.

"Chafee hasn't explained why he has continued to support his Republican leadership despite their failure to hold the administration accountable for its failures in Iraq," Swartsel said.

Behind The 'Mob' Ad, A Republican Donor With A History (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 31 — A much-criticized television advertisement that uses a mob character to impugn Senator Robert Menendez was financed by a Republican donor who has given more than $6 million this year to start ad campaigns attacking Democrats.

The donor, Bob J. Perry, a Houston home builder, gave $4.45 million in 2004 to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, an independent organization that attacked Senator John Kerry's Vietnam War record, damaging his presidential campaign and leading to protests about the tactics used by such outside groups.

The anti-Menendez ad was produced by one such group, the Free Enterprise Fund Committee, which said it received about $1 million from Mr. Perry. His role in the ad was reported on Tuesday in The Star-Ledger. Earlier this year, Mr. Perry started another group, the Economic Freedom Fund, with a $5 million contribution. Together, the committees are running attack ads in about a dozen states.

In the anti-Menendez ad, titled "Politicos," a stocky character with a leather jacket and a "Sopranos" accent rasps into a cellphone: "We got a problem. Our boy down in Washington, Bob Menendez, he's caught in a federal investigation. The feds start looking at these fixed contracts, and bada-bing, we're in it deep."

"We need to get the bosses to fix this thing, like they did for Torricelli," he says at the end of the ad.

Jill Hazelbaker, a spokeswoman for Mr. Menendez's Republican opponent, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., said the campaign condemned the ad when it started running a week ago. That statement, Ms. Hazelbaker said, "makes clear that we loathe the ad."

She said the Kean campaign could not call on the sponsors to stop running the ad. Campaign finance laws prohibit any direct contact between campaign officials and the independent groups, known as 527s after a provision in the federal tax code that permits them to spend unlimited amounts as long as they do not coordinate efforts with candidates.

But Matt Miller, a campaign spokesman for Mr. Menendez, said: "The Republicans have been very good at getting all their donors to fund side projects to smear Democratic candidates. We saw it pop up in New Jersey with the Free Enterprise Fund ads, which repeated Tom Kean Jr.'s smears."

Todd S. Schorle, a spokesman for the Free Enterprise Fund Committee, said that Mr. Perry provided almost all of the group's financing but that the ad was entirely the creation of the committee staff and the agency that made it, Nelson Warfield and Company. Mr. Schorle said the ad cost $200,015 and was to run for a week, ending today, on cable stations in several North Jersey counties.

When asked about Mr. Perry, Mr. Schorle said, "We don't discuss any of our donors."

The committee has run ads against other Democratic Senate candidates, including Ned Lamont in Connecticut, Jon Tester in Montana and Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee. The Economic Freedom Fund, Mr. Perry's new committee, has run attack ads in at least five states.

In Indiana, the state attorney general filed a complaint against the group and forced it to stop automated telephone calls attacking a Democrat, Baron Hill, who is challenging Representative Mike Sodrel.

Anthony Holm, a spokesman for Mr. Perry, declined to comment.

Mr. Perry is the nation's top donor to the independent groups this year, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks federal campaign finance reports. In 2004 he and his wife, Doylene, were the biggest Republican donors to 527 groups, giving $9.6 million.

Senate Dems Outgive GOP (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 1, 2006

More than half of the members of the Senate Democratic caucus have tapped into campaign coffers for six-figure donations to their party committee, while only 15 Senate Republicans have given similar sums with only one week remaining and control of the chamber up for grabs.

DOJ_NMG_0089695

From committee gavels to White House momentum, Democrats digging deep to transfer unused campaign dollars stand to reap huge gains if they can net the six seats needed to take over the Senate. But even Democratic senators up for reelection and out of chairmanship contention made unrestricted transfers to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) in October, leaving Republicans at a $6 million disadvantage in the hunt for member money.

Senate Republicans maintain that their majority will survive despite members' reluctance to give directly to the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and some strategists' anxiety over spending shortfalls in key races. The NRSC made a million-dollar negative-ad buy yesterday in Virginia, where the DSCC reportedly is planning to double that number in a bid to vault Democrat Jim Webb over Sen. George Allen (R-Va.).

Allen chaired the NRSC during the 2004 cycle, when he gave $375,000 in campaign cash directly to the committee, according to Federal Election Commission (FEC) records. Current Chairwoman Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) has given the NRSC $100,000 directly from her campaign, which had about $224,000 on hand at the end of September.

Among the members Dole has solicited for six-figure transfers is Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who did not heed Dole's call for $100,000 from a campaign war chest strained by his high-profile reelection fight in 2004.

"What I've done is raise a lot more money than Dole wanted me to contribute," Specter said in an interview. "I'm working hard to maintain the majority."

Specter said he has held fundraisers for three of his committee members up for reelection, Sens. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) and Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), in addition to raising $100,000 through the NRSC's Majority Makers program and giving more to individual candidates through his Big Tent leadership PAC. His greatest effort has been directed at helping fellow Pennsylvanian Sen. Rick Santorum (R), and Specter said he hopes to cut a radio commercial for the embattled senator this week.

Specter's Democratic counterpart on Judiciary, Sen. Patrick Leahy (Vt.), has given $100,000 in direct campaign cash in addition to making appearances for House candidate Peter Welch (D-Vt.).

Specter and Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine), who is up for reelection in 2008, are the only two Republican chairmen who did not give directly to the NRSC. A Collins spokeswoman noted that she has given more than $200,000 to Republican candidates through other avenues.

"We're very pleased to have support from the caucus and we will do everything we can to get as much as we can during the last week," NRSC spokesman Brian Nick said.

Only one Democratic senator who is in line to chair a committee if the Senate changes hands, Appropriations ranking member Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), has not given directly from his campaign to the DSCC. Byrd is heavily favored to stave off GOP challenger John Raese next week, and his office did not return a request for comment by press time about his giving record.

Despite the NRSC's nearly $1 million deficit in cash on hand entering the final stretch of one of the most hard-fought midterms in years, some GOP senators have boosted their giving since the 2004 season.

Senate Rules Committee Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who is widely expected to vie for the majority whip's post if Republicans hold on and Santorum loses his race, transferred $100,000 to the NRSC in September — his first unrestricted contribution since the 2002 cycle, when he was deposed from Senate leadership.

Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), who has announced his intention to take over the NRSC for the challenging 2008 cycle, gave $250,000 to the committee in October while waging a reelection fight against Democrat Jack Carter.

"Obviously, he believes in the NRSC and has always been one to help out fellow Republicans wherever he can," Ensign spokesman Jack Finn said.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) gave the NRSC $50,000 in October, bringing his total transfers to seven times his 2004 level. Allard, who took a seat on Appropriations at the beginning of this Congress, also has done direct mail for Colorado House hopeful Rick O'Donnell (R) and will join a statewide bus tour for Colorado candidates this week.

The predominance of incumbents in need during this cycle compared with 2004 helped motivate Allard, his Chief of Staff Sean Conway said: "I think the difference is that this time, a lot of the colleagues he works with on a daily basis are in tough races, so he wanted to step in and help out."

One senior GOP aide pointed to his own boss's fundraising activities and said the Republicans' failure to match moves like Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) $2.1 million gift to the DSCC did not tell the full story.

"We certainly understand the importance of this election and we understand the stakes," the aide said. "It's not all about the hard numbers you see, but about your organization. It's not just that members are giving some money to NRSC, but they are doing a lot on behalf of their colleagues. A lot of it is the sweat equity that you do."

Yet few Republican senators can match the earned-media power of John McCain (R-Ariz.), who continues to crisscross the country for Republicans but has given no direct cash to the NRSC. On the Democratic side, presidential aspirants such as Joseph Biden Jr. (Del.), Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) have all sent $150,000 or more directly to the DSCC.

In addition to maxing out through his Progressive Patriots Fund PAC, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) hit the $100,000 mark in October with a bequest to the DSCC.

"Taking back the Senate is a priority if we're to get our country back on track, and continuing to support the DSCC and its efforts is another way Senator Feingold is working toward that goal," Feingold spokesman Trevor Miller said via e-mail.

Some Democratic senators have targeted their campaign transfers and PAC contributions outside of the DSCC, often to swing close state-level races. Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), for example, sent $250,000 on Thursday from his unexpectedly full coffers to a Florida Democratic party working to lift Rep. Jim Davis's (D-Fla.) gubernatorial fortunes.

The DSCC did not return requests for comment on Democratic members' money movement.

A Senate Newcomer, Helping Fellow Democrats On The Trail And Drawing Big Crowds (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

MILWAUKEE, Oct. 31 — Senator Barack Obama of Illinois has become the prize catch of the midterm campaign. More sought after than virtually every other Democrat, Mr. Obama was fully booked, long ago, on a schedule to take him across a large swath of the country to help his party try to win control of Congress.

Now, having increased the intrigue of his persona with his recent announcement that he may run for president in 2008, Mr. Obama is winding up the closing days of the 2006 race as what party officials believe is a powerful tool to draw last-minute attention to Democratic candidates.

In stops with candidates in Minnesota and Wisconsin over two days at the beginning of this week, Mr. Obama helped draw large crowds and intense news media attention to earnest but otherwise nondescript rallies.

His travels have a self-serving purpose, as well; he has been on a tour the last few weeks to promote his second book, "The Audacity of Hope," which is set to make its debut on the nonfiction best-seller list. But the publicity he has attracted along the way has been welcomed by party officials.

Other prominent African-Americans are summoned to the Midwest to campaign in black churches (and that is on Mr. Obama's schedule, too, before the week is out). But Mr. Obama also traveled to Rochester, Minn., in a Congressional district that is more than 93 percent white, to campaign on Monday in front of a nearly all-white crowd for Amy Klobuchar, who is running for Senate, and Tim Walz, a candidate for the House.

Mr. Obama then traveled to Milwaukee on Tuesday to campaign for Gov. James E. Doyle at a rally, where Senator Herb Kohl compared his appearance to one scheduled later in the week by former President Bill Clinton.

"So we're going to have a former president," Mr. Kohl told the more than 1,000 participants at the outdoor rally, "but you know, we might just have a future president in town."

DOJ_NMG_0089697

And thus on a freezing Halloween morning, Darnell Barrett, a seventh-grade English teacher, carted his class to an outdoor field in Milwaukee to see the junior senator from the state directly to the south. Mr. Barnett said that seeing the governor and the city's mayor would not have justified the journey; it was Mr. Obama, he said, who inspired the trip.

"He's all people are talking about, to be honest with you," said Mr. Barnett, whose class of 20 students stood on their toes to get a glimpse of the stage. "A lot of the kids had heard of him, if you can believe that."

Mr. Obama's message varies little from venue to venue; in interviews and on the stump, he returns to the theme of moving past the divisions of the 1960s, a distinctly post-baby-boom vision that he, at the age of 45, would be conveniently suited to pursue.

He dreams aloud of a political world in which each side tries to understand the other, and speaks of his belief that Americans are fundamentally optimistic. He warns that the current climate risks leaving the country "a little poorer and a little meaner than the one we inherited from our parents," citing universal health care, higher wages, improved education and sounder energy policy as the most pressing goals.

The war in Iraq, which he opposed from the outset, is among the areas where he sounds most like the liberal wing of his party. In other ways, especially in tone and with regard to politics, he insists that neither party has a monopoly on good ideas and frequently declines to criticize President Bush as unfit.

Even on the question of race in a midterm season that has at times had a sharp racial undercurrent, Mr. Obama can be understated.

In an interview on a flight between campaign appearances, the senator said he did not consider an advertising campaign against Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat running for Senate in Tennessee, to be offensive strictly because it seemed designed to provoke bias in white voters. In the advertisement, a blond white woman, scantily clad, says she met Mr. Ford at a Playboy party and asks him to call her.

"What I saw was some pretty crude innuendo," Mr. Obama said. "I would have been just as offended had they used a black woman. The fact that they used a blonde was sort of putting mustard on the hot dog."

Mr. Obama, who has campaigned for Mr. Ford and plans to do so again, is also one of the top donors to federal candidates from his federal political action committee. He has given $374,000 to federal candidates in this election cycle, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

That is more than even Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, whose PAC donated $252,500, and Senator John Kerry, whose PAC has given $82,600. (All three of them have also helped candidates in other, sometimes more valuable ways, like headlining fund-raising events and lending lists of donor e-mail addresses.) Mr. Obama has also been featured prominently in the Democrats' direct mail campaigns.

When questions about the presidential campaign arise, Mr. Obama is quick to say that he is still at the earliest stages of contemplation. He declined to point out differences between himself and Ms. Clinton, except to say that they had disagreed at the outset of the war in Iraq, which she voted to authorize. (He was not in the Senate yet.)

But he did elaborate on the question of experience, which given his brief tenure is certain to follow him if he decides to run. Asked how important experience should be for a president, he replied, "What I think is more important is judgment."

"Judgment can be borne out of experience," he said. "It would be nice to think the more experience we get, the better our judgment is. But I don't think that's the case. I mean, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld have an awful lot of experience, and yet have engineered what I think is one of the biggest foreign policy failures in our recent history. So I would say the two most important things are judgment and vision."

"Well," he added, catching himself, "judgment, vision and passion for the American people, and what their hopes and dreams are."

Haunted By The Past (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

Many Republicans have been tut-tutting about the author of "The Audacity of Hope" having the audacity to hope.

"I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in," Dick Cheney told Sean Hannity.

Charles Krauthammer wrote that, despite Senator Barack Obama's charms, he could not win in '08: "The reason is Sept. 11, 2001. The country will simply not elect a novice in wartime."

But if there's one thing W.'s reign proves beyond a shadow of a doubt, it is this: Experience, like affectations, can be dangerous.

DOJ_NMG_0089698

They will fill up history books with all the myopic misjudgments made by a war council with a couple of centuries of experience, blunders that undermined America's security and integrity, wrecked Iraq, loosed Osama, and made the world more dangerous.

Those on the president's "dream team" of foreign policy advisers were haunted, not strengthened, by their years of past service in top jobs. When they got the chance to run the country again under W., all they wanted to do was finish unfinished business, misapplying old ideas to new crises, like those who sabotage new romances with baggage from old relationships.

On his initial tour as defense secretary, for Gerald Ford, Rummy felt that Vietnam, Watergate and then Jimmy Carter robbed him of his opportunity to rein in the military brass, who were always impudent enough to have opinions about the military. Determined to banish America's post-Vietnam fears about using force, he ended up creating another Vietnam that spurred more fears about using force.

As Bush 41's defense secretary, Mr. Cheney prepared the '92 Defense Planning Guidance draft with his aides Paul Wolfowitz and Scooter Libby. It called for swaggering world domination in the wake of the cold war, asserting that America should intervene to stop any countries — allies or foes — from challenging its supremacy.

A decade later, with a more jejune Bush as president and a more jittery post-9/11 America, Cheney & Co. brought back the loony plan and renamed it the Bush doctrine.

Vice and Rummy corroded the Constitution by using the terrorist attacks as a pretext to correct the past: as Ford administration big shots, they felt emasculated by the post-Watergate reforms; three decades later, they saw a chance to shoot some steroids into executive branch powers.

Condi Rice had been a Russia expert in Poppy Bush's White House, so she and the older cold warriors like Rummy and Cheney readily saw the red menace under every rock. Like the "experts" who failed back in the 1960s to see that Red China and the Soviet Union were enemies of each other, not friends, they naïvely assumed that Saddam and Osama were in bed together and that because they were both bad guys, going after one was going after the other.

George Tenet's experience tracking bin Laden did him no good, because he was so nervous about being the only Clinton holdover that he was overly sycophantish to W., assuring a skeptical president that proving Saddam had W.M.D.s was a "slam dunk."

W. let the past cloud his judgment as well. He went along with Vice and Rummy on invading Iraq because he thought he could avenge and one-up his father simultaneously.

When Sonny, as Colin Powell called him, announced his candidacy in 1999, I asked him if it was scary to run for president knowing so little about foreign affairs.

"There will be moments when situations, incidents will flare up," he replied, blissfully unaware of the conflagration to come. He said he could lean into his dad's advisers, and trust his gut about which ones to trust and which to "kiss off."

Yesterday, Senator Obama, asked about his short résumé, made the same claim that judgment is more important than experience. But he acknowledged that President Bush has given learning-on-the-job a bad name.

"I mean, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld have an awful lot of experience, and yet have engineered what I think is one of the biggest foreign policy failures in our recent history," he told The Times's Anne Kornblut. "So I would say the two most important things are judgment and vision. Well, judgment, vision and passion for the American people, and what their hopes and dreams are."

Those who declaim on the need for Senator Obama to have more experience must forget who's running the country. It often seems that the most inexperienced person alive is George W. Bush — even after six years in office.

Hillary Blasts Bush Policy (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, November 1, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton blasted President George W. Bush Tuesday for pursuing a foreign policy that had produced "a landscape of failure and disorder," and she urged a return to diplomacy and negotiation in tackling the world's challenges.

"Our country desperately needs a foreign policy based on bipartisan consensus and executed with nonpartisan competence," Clinton, a likely 2008 presidential contender, told a packed gathering at the Council on Foreign Relations in Manhattan.

Earlier in the day, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, another Democrat eyeing a possible White House bid, outlined his foreign policy views at the Asia Society in Manhattan. While not as openly critical of the Bush administration, Edwards said future leaders would have to deal with a vast erosion of respect for the United States throughout the world as a result of the Iraq war.

"It is the single most important responsibility of the next president: We have to restore American leadership," Edwards said. "The chaos we see in the world today is a direct result of that leadership vacuum."

DOJ_NMG_0089699

Clinton, an increasingly vocal critic of the White House, labeled the Bush administration "the largest and least competent government we've ever had."

In her remarks, the New York Democrat emphasized the need for the United States to develop an "internationalist" foreign policy that engaged allies on issues including nuclear proliferation and terrorism. While she broke little new ground in her remarks, the speech offered a window into how she might approach global challenges as president.

As she has before, Clinton criticized Bush for squandering global goodwill after the 9/11 attacks and for pursuing a flawed strategy in the Iraq war while neglecting threats such as Iran and North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons. She expressed amazement over the Bush administration's refusal to negotiate directly with either of those regimes, calling it "a simplistic division of the world into good and evil."

Senator Clinton Attacks Bush And The Iraqi Government (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

Calling for "a fundamental change in course" in Iraq, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton presented her most comprehensive criticism yesterday of the Bush administration's handling of the war, and she said the current government in Iraq had so far failed to be part of a solution.

"Only the Iraqi government can take action to create the conditions for a political settlement," Mrs. Clinton said in a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. "Instead, the government in recent days seems to be going out of its way to rebuff our efforts to move in that direction."

"American credibility is held hostage by an Iraqi government that will not fulfill its pledge to seek a political resolution of the rights and roles of the Sunni minority and to determine how oil revenue is allocated," she added.

Her remarks came on a day of increased tension between the United States and the Iraqi government, led by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, after his insistence that the American Army remove checkpoints set up around Baghdad neighborhoods that are Shiite militant strongholds. The Americans complied, and administration officials said the decision was mutual.

In Mrs. Clinton's speech, touching on issues in countries including Afghanistan, China, Iran and North Korea, she presented a broad vision for an internationalist approach to foreign policy. Yet she reserved her harshest criticism for Iraq.

"In human terms, this has been a horrible month," she said. "In political terms, we have finally reached the point of complete absurdity. The administration announces that it will propose timetables or benchmarks, and the Iraqi prime minister denounces them."

Mrs. Clinton went on to say that several basic components should guide future American policy, laying much of the burden on the Iraqi government.

"First, we need to press consistently, privately and publicly, the Iraqis to become serious about achieving an internal reconciliation and political solution," she said. "And present real consequences for their failing to do so."

While she did not expound on those consequences, she suggested that the pressure put on the Iraqi government would be tied to a "phased redeployment" of American troops out of the country beginning this year.

"Phased redeployment will get the attention of the Iraqi leadership," Mrs. Clinton said. Iraqi officials have sent a mixed message in meetings with her, she said, expressing a desire to be a sovereign nation yet saying they are not ready for the Americans to leave.

"It is time for us to force the Iraqi government to face up to that contradiction," she said. Repeating other ideas that she has expressed over the past year, Mrs. Clinton called for a fund to administer oil revenues in Iraq in an equitable fashion. She also called for a meeting of all the countries in the region to discuss the situation.

More broadly, Mrs. Clinton outlined a foreign policy that she said tried to blend "realism" and "idealism," as opposed to what she said was the Bush administration's "simplistic division of the world into good and evil."

One example of that philosophy put into action would entail the possibility of negotiating directly with Iran to prevent it from developing nuclear weapons.

As Mrs. Clinton skipped from discussing one global hot spot to another, she was consistently critical of the Bush administration. Regarding North Korea, she said the White House was investing too much faith in China. In Afghanistan, she accused the administration of prematurely shifting focus elsewhere and allowing the Taliban to regroup.

She also made a broad case for international cooperation. For instance, she said that the treaties and institutions that were effective in limiting nuclear proliferation during the cold war should be modernized instead of abandoned.

DOJ_NMG_0089700

The administration declined to comment on the speech, but the Republican National Committee denounced it. “Either the junior senator from New York really doesn’t grasp the stakes in the war on terror or she is so consumed with her political future that she is willing to compromise our security for personal partisan gain,” said Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman.

From Iraq to the broader fight against terror to domestic security, Mrs. Clinton said the administration had failed.

“The people who promised less government,” she said, “have instead given us the largest and least competent government we have ever had.”

Bridge To The Center (WP)

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

David Ignatius

ROCHESTER, N.Y. -- A tinny band strikes up "Happy Days Are Here Again" as Sen. Hillary Clinton makes her way to the podium at a campaign rally. And here in Upstate New York, where Democrats not so long ago were an endangered species, it looks like happy days are indeed ahead.

A week before Election Day, the Democrats are in a dominant position across the Empire State. Clinton is leading her Republican challenger, John Spencer, by nearly 30 percentage points. The Democratic candidate for governor, Eliot Spitzer, is up nearly 50 points over his GOP rival, John Faso. Perhaps most important, Democrats Eric Massa and Jack Davis are making strong races in Upstate congressional districts that have been solidly Republican for years.

A day spent with Clinton on the campaign trail Monday illustrates the broad, bipartisan themes that have helped rebuild the party in Upstate New York. Her comments also signal the legislative strategy that Clinton hopes to pursue next year, when her party is likely to have control of at least one house of Congress and Clinton herself will be the instant front-runner in the 2008 presidential race.

Rochester on a clear fall day seems like an idyllic version of Clinton's own girlhood home in the prosperous Chicago suburbs. It's a sturdy, Rust Belt industrial city -- a place that sees itself in the middle of the political landscape. The mayor, Robert Duffy, is a former police chief who was recruited to run by both parties but opted for the Democrats and now has an 89 percent approval rating. In national politics, it sometimes seems the country is ripped at the seams by extremists on both sides, but it doesn't feel that way in Rochester.

The issues Clinton stresses through the day are classic "bridge to the future" themes articulated by Bill Clinton when he was president, but with a Hillary twist. She starts the morning brainstorming with local leaders on how to make Rochester a hub for "green" alternative-energy technologies, building around a plant that makes fuel cells. Next, she meets with a health-care network and pitches a revival of her failed 1993 campaign to lower health costs and insure the uninsured. Then it's a tour of a poor urban neighborhood being redeveloped with public-private partnerships of the sort the Clintons have long championed. Her last stop is a steel company where she talks about reviving American manufacturing.

Clinton can't match her husband's raw political energy -- his ebullient way of blurring the edges and seeming to be all things to all people -- but she's getting closer. She feels the pain of the doctors and nurses: "We are just skating along, and the ice is cracking, and we're in danger of falling through." At the political rally that ends the day, she turns her version of centrist politics into a war cry, shouting to the crowd that even conservative Republicans are deciding that "there is nothing conservative or Republican" about Bush policies. She leaves the boisterous rally with a Hillaryesque: "Oh my goodness. This is so exciting."

What will happen to this Democratic energy after Nov. 7? Will it coalesce into strategies for effective governing, or will it simply elevate Bush-bashing to a wider stage? The rage among Democratic activists may undermine the party's effectiveness, but you don't see that negativism here. The Democrats are mounting a surprisingly effective challenge in the bedrock GOP 29th District south of here thanks to Massa, a Navy veteran who has bonded with the activists' "Net roots" Internet campaign. Massa's pro-military, anti-Iraq-war stance defines the high ground this year for Democrats.

Clinton says her priorities in the new Congress will be the same issues she discussed here: creating an energy research agency to speed development of alternative technologies; building a nationwide health-information system as a first step toward broader health reform; restoring the budget rules of the 1990s to slow runaway federal spending; and shaping a bipartisan foreign policy that can salvage what's possible in Iraq. She gave a powerful speech Tuesday at the Council on Foreign Relations, staking out this center ground.

I asked Clinton at the end of this long campaign day to sum up where she will be going in 2007 and beyond, and her answer sounded like a version of America as Upstate New York: "Americans are primarily pragmatic," she said. "We are both conservative and progressive. In the pragmatic center, you get people together; you listen, you learn; you don't draw lines in the sand."

Her updated version of the Clinton gospel is obviously working here in Rochester. But for Hillary, the hard part begins the morning after Election Day.

Election Tests How Much Race Matters (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 1, 2006

NEWTON, Mass. — When Democratic gubernatorial nominee Deval Patrick addressed members of the local Chamber of Commerce, he talked about stimulating the state's economy, streamlining regulations and improving public education.

And race? The subject didn't come up.

Patrick, who is African-American, and members of the audience, almost all of them white, insist color isn't a factor in this campaign. “I don't even see him as black,” says Mike Hurley, 54, owner of the local Minuteman Press franchise. He jokes, “It looks like to me that he has a deep tan.”

Colorblind electorate or not, Patrick is likely to make history next week. The political neophyte, who led Republican Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey by 25 percentage points in a Boston Globe poll taken Oct. 22-25, is poised to become the first black governor of Massachusetts and only the second black ever elected governor in any state.

He is one of a new generation of African-American politicians who are changing old assumptions about what offices black candidates can win.

Unlike senior black members of Congress, they are too young to have joined the civil rights struggles of the 1960s. They often haven't gone to historically black colleges or launched careers at black churches. Instead, many graduated from Ivy League colleges and pursued careers at big law firms. They often advocate pragmatism over ideology and aspire — like white politicians — to the most powerful elected offices in the country.

“African-Americans are now able to come through the political pipelines and break through old barriers,” says Donna Brazile, a top Democratic strategist. “Whether they make it to the finish line is another thing, but the door has been left ajar.”

In congressional elections next Tuesday, Memphis Rep. Harold Ford Jr. would be the first black senator popularly elected from the South if he prevails in a tossup contest for the Tennessee Senate seat. Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele is in a competitive contest for the Senate. Keith Ellison, who is black and Muslim, is favored to win a 70% white congressional district in Minneapolis. Angie Paccione, whose mother is black, is in a close contest to represent an 80% white district in Colorado.

A record six African-Americans hold major-party nominations this year for senator and governor — three Republicans, three Democrats — and another 10 are running for such statewide offices as lieutenant governor and secretary of State that often provide steppingstones to higher office.

To win, these candidates have to appeal to white voters, of course — and in a nation where race continues to resonate.

Ads against Patrick and Ford in recent weeks used “subtle and not-so-subtle” racial appeals, says political scientist Kerry Haynie of Duke. Skeptics, among them political scientist Ronald Walters of the University of Maryland, note that 1989 also was proclaimed a breakthrough year, when Douglas Wilder of Virginia became the first black ever elected governor — only to have 17 years pass without a second.

Still, David Bositis of the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies says he's seen a “co-evolution” by black candidates in shaping broad appeals and by white voters in being open to hearing them.

African-American candidates who lose next week will have been undone not by their race but by the same challenges that defeat white contenders, Bositis says.

Republican Ken Blackwell is running for governor in a year the Ohio GOP has been tainted by scandal, for instance, and Lynn Swann faces a formidable opponent in Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell.

“A lot of young kids are getting beyond race in a lot of ways — I say ‘getting,' not ‘got,' but ‘getting,' ” says Bill Perry, a middle-age high school teacher attending a rally for Patrick at the DCU Center Arena in Worcester, Mass. “It's just like my generation got beyond ‘Are you Irish?' or ‘Are you French?' That was our grandparents.”

Thousands of people jam the arena, waiting for the chance to see Patrick and former president Bill Clinton. They wave small American flags and — at the urging of the emcee — use their cellphones to create a sort of instant phone bank, calling friends and urging them to vote.

“You ready to win?” Patrick asks to cheers when he comes on stage with his wife, Diane. Even at a rally, Patrick has a low-key, conversational style. He's given to on-the-one-hand, on-the-other-hand expositions on policy reminiscent of Clinton, his onetime boss and political patron.

“It's a pretty heady thing for a kid from the South Side of Chicago to have a president stump for you,” Patrick tells the audience. While he's become accustomed to meeting with power brokers in the penthouses of skyscrapers, he says, “What's also wonderful is when the cleaning crew stops you in the lobby and says, ‘I'm for you.' ”

Patrick, 50, has lived in both worlds. He and his sister were raised by a single mother in one of Chicago's toughest neighborhoods, living on welfare for a time. A teacher recommended him for a program called A Better Chance, which awarded him a scholarship to attend Milton Academy, a tony prep school south of Boston.

It was, he recalls, "like coming to a different planet." He thrived at the private boarding school, graduated from Harvard and Harvard Law School, then worked for the NAACP Legal Defense Fund. That's when he met Clinton, then governor of Arkansas. Later, as president, Clinton appointed Patrick assistant attorney general for civil rights.

Campaigning at the Chamber of Commerce breakfast, Patrick doesn't mention those jobs or his credentials on civil rights. Instead, he notes that he worked in senior posts at Texaco — chairing a task force appointed after the company lost a major race-discrimination lawsuit — and at Coca-Cola. That gives him the background to effectively manage state government, he tells the audience, many of them small-business owners.

"I bring a range of leadership experience in government, in business, in non-profits, in community groups that's broader than any other candidate in the race," Patrick says in an interview with USA TODAY. His skin color hasn't been an issue "because I'm not offering to be the first black governor of Massachusetts," he says. He's appealing to "all kinds of people from all corners of the commonwealth."

His opponent, Kerry Healey, 46, agrees that race hasn't been a significant factor — perhaps, she says, because her election also would represent a political breakthrough. She would be the first woman elected governor in Massachusetts. "That almost takes that all off the table," she says in an interview.

But Healey injected race with two TV ads in recent weeks, according to David Paleologos, director of the Suffolk University Political Research Center. One ad took Patrick to task for writing two letters and contributing $5,000 to a campaign to win parole for a rapist, Benjamin LaGuer, a black man who proclaimed his innocence. Even after new DNA testing proved LaGuer's guilt, the ad shows Patrick calling him "thoughtful."

The second ad shows a white woman being stalked as she walks in a parking garage at night. Depicting Patrick as soft on crime, the announcer declares: "He should be ashamed — not governor."

Healey says the ads raise legitimate questions about Patrick's judgment in supporting LaGuer and the veracity of his initial explanations about what he had done.

Patrick sees a racial message. "There were a lot of reasons why people equated those ads with the Willie Horton ad," he says, a reference to a spot aired against Michael Dukakis in the 1988 presidential race that showed a glowering black man who committed violent crimes while on parole.

Suffolk University surveys showed Healey's attacks on crime initially narrowed Patrick's lead from 21 percentage points in early October to 13 points in the middle of the month. By the end of the month, however, they had backfired, Paleologos says. Patrick's lead rebounded to 27 points.

Patrick, who has never run for office before, seems poised for a resounding victory in a state where 6.8% of the population is black, half the U.S. average. He crushed two better-known white candidates in September's Democratic primary. Now the Suffolk survey shows him leading among every demographic group except Republicans.

Doug Wilder says Patrick shouldn't put too much stock in the findings. In his Virginia campaign, surveys of voters as they left polling places showed him ahead by a comfortable 10 percentage points.

When the votes were counted, he won by just half a point.

Wilder, now the mayor of Richmond, related that cautionary tale to Patrick strategists at a political fundraiser in Washington last month. He says "there's no empirical data" to prove that white voters today are any less likely to lie to pollsters about their willingness to vote for black candidates.

"There remains a non-trivial faction of white voters who will not vote for a candidate simply because (the candidate is) black," says Vincent Hutchings, a University of Michigan political scientist who is co-authoring a book called Wedge Politics. "We are kidding ourselves if we argue these people have disappeared from the landscape."

This year's contests will test whether African-Americans who advocate broad political agendas to mostly white electorates can win, he says. Haynie says their prospects are boosted by such high-profile black officials as Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell, the current and former secretary of State, who have "helped pave the way."

To the White House?

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama roiled calculations about the 2008 presidential contest when he suggested last month he might jump in. And Patrick declines to rule out higher ambitions. "I'm not making any plans for national office," he says. But he also notes, "Life is what happens while you're making plans."

Study: Big 3 News Tilts Vs. GOP (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

DOJ_NMG_0089703

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The Big Three television networks have used unprecedented midterm election coverage to bash the Republican Party with negative stories, and plenty of them, a study says.

Only 12 percent of election stories that aired on NBC, ABC or CBS were favorable toward Republican candidates, according to a study released yesterday by the District-based Center for Media and Public Affairs (CMPA).

In contrast, Democrats basked in glory. The study found that 77 percent of the news accounts between Sept. 5 and Oct. 22 offered favorable evaluations of Democratic candidates and lawmakers.

"These numbers are pretty striking," said Robert Lichter, director of CMPA, a nonpartisan researcher of news and entertainment media. "The coverage has become a referendum on Republican leadership. The big question for all three networks is this: Why are the Republicans in trouble and how bad is it going to get?"

While midterms typically garner only tepid interest from broadcasters, the networks have dramatically ramped up their coverage this time around, providing 167 stories during the study period. Only 35 stories had been aired during a comparable time in 2002.

The networks have fixated on a trio of story themes. The CMPA study found that the resignation of former Florida congressman Mark Foley dominated the midterm coverage, producing 59 stories, compared with the war in Iraq, which inspired 33, and national security or the threat of terrorism, which produced 31 stories.

Other issues of potential importance to voters -- the economy or redistricting, for example -- got short shrift, such topics earning mention in six or fewer stories.

Speculating on voter behavior is also popular on the networks.

"Another big question they ask is this: What is it the public is rejecting, and what are they so angry about?" Mr. Lichter added.

"CBS Evening News" anchor Katie Couric, for example, said yesterday that 2006 would prove a "wave election, where public dissatisfaction changes the political environment" and "incumbents are washed away."

On NBC, Brian Williams led a report from Ohio with the phrase, "Could this red state end up going blue?" ABC News' Jake Tapper also showcased Ohio voters, saying they showed "an extra layer of disillusion with the Republican Party."

Like negative campaign ads, negative news reports may have a destructive rebound effect on a fickle viewing public.

"For the past week, the mainstream media has run story after story about the nastiness of this year's campaign ads -- perhaps as a way to distract our attention from their own dirty tricks," observed Stephen Spruiell of National Review Online yesterday.

"Viewers can get sick of negative TV coverage. They consistently rate the news coverage as one of the worst parts of a campaign, specifically citing negative content," Mr. Lichter said. And its going to get worse in the shrill run-up to Nov. 7.

"The GOP is the story, and they're caught in an echo chamber," he added.

Midterm Elections Offer Rookie Anchors New Battleground By BROOKS BARNES (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Add another hotly contested race to the list for Tuesday's elections: Brian, Charlie or Katie?

While NBC's Brian Williams, ABC's Charles Gibson and CBS's Katie Couric have all settled into their new roles as evening news anchors, Tuesday's midterm elections mark their inaugural efforts at presiding over prime-time election results. The stakes are high. Live coverage of national elections is a defining event for news organizations, and viewers, advertisers and cable and broadcast rivals will be watching closely to see how each handles the hot seat.

Ratcheting up pressure are the special demands of this Election Day. Midterm elections are typically sedate affairs that are more important locally than nationally. But this year the results could lead to a seismic shift in political power. With control of both the House and Senate up for grabs, the television audience is expected to be particularly large, with the networks competing with Fox News Channel, CNN and MSNBC for viewers.

The rookies -- particularly Mr. Gibson and Ms. Couric because Mr. Williams has anchored lots of MSNBC election coverage -- have a series of especially difficult races to call. More than a dozen important ones remain too close to predict, raising the specter of recounts. There could be problems in some states with new electronic ballots. Meanwhile, the networks' exit polls, crucial to their system of calling races, are likely to be fuzzy as more people make use of absentee ballots.

The new anchors have strong memories of their predecessors' botched calls in the 2000 presidential election, and they say in interviews that they are determined to get the calls right this time. "If we have learned anything from the last few outings, it is to call no race before its time," Mr. Williams says. "Getting it wrong is forever. Getting it four minutes late is forgivable."

In a change from the 2002 midterm elections, the networks promise they won't project a winner in any state until after all of that state's polls are scheduled to close. In a first, each network has also agreed to send two representatives to a "quarantine room" at an undisclosed location in New York City to comb through exit-poll data. The goal: to prevent early exit-poll data -- which is often unreliable -- from leaking to the Internet, and to monitor the results in a vacuum, without access to a bank of TV screens tuned to various pundits predicting outcomes.

All three anchors have top billing, but each has a veteran co-pilot. Mr. Williams will be joined by his predecessor, Tom Brokaw. Mr. Gibson will have George Stephanopoulos, the anchor of ABC's "This Week" Sunday news program and a former senior aide to President Clinton. Ms. Couric's predecessor, Bob Schieffer, will appear with her.

ABC, CBS and NBC have spent recent weeks conducting intense preparations for a relatively small amount of on-air coverage. Each network plans an hour-long live special at 10 p.m. EST, with another live broadcast on the West Coast at 10 p.m. PST, the same amount of time the networks dedicated to the last midterms.

The three anchors will be judged not only on ratings but also on content and their ability to perform on the spot. One particularly tricky moment for rookie anchors to master: bringing the newscast back from a commercial or a local break. Called a "reset" in TV parlance, the anchor must sum up the news so far in a pithy sentence.

In their normal slots, Mr. Williams holds a commanding lead. For the week ended Oct. 27, Mr. Williams attracted an average of 8.9 million viewers to "Nightly News" on General Electric Co.'s NBC, according to Nielsen Media Research. At "World News" on Walt Disney Co.'s ABC, Mr. Gibson averaged 8.4 million. Ms. Couric averaged 7.3 million on "Evening News" on CBS Corp.'s CBS.

But unlike the audience for presidential coverage, when the networks remain on the air all evening, viewership for the midterm coverage is typically affected by the strength of the show immediately before. By that measure, ABC has the strongest lead-in with "Dancing With the Stars."

"I personally hope a lot of 'Dancing' fans love politics," says Mr. Stephanopoulos, although they apparently didn't earlier this year, when MSNBC pundit Tucker Carlson was the first "star" voted off the show.

All the new network anchors hope to put individual stamps on their coverage. Ms. Couric, for instance, says her broadcast will strive to be "more accessible and meaningful for regular people." She has been pushing producers to interview average voters over stuffy experts. "Clearly we need to communicate some really critical information, but I think we can have some fun too," she says.

Mr. Williams has something quite different in mind. "I would like to harness some of the shop talk that goes on during our commercial breaks" between political junkies such as Mr. Brokaw and Tim Russert, NBC's senior political analyst. "That's actually really good television," Mr. Williams says. He also plans to pay close attention to potential problems with computerized voting machines. NBC and its sister cable network MSNBC are partnering with an organization that operates a toll-free hotline for voters to report irregularities.

Over at ABC, Mr. Gibson will have the most network air time. While Ms. Couric will go off the air and Mr. Williams will move to MSNBC, Mr. Gibson will continue reporting on ABC's "Nightline."

New this time around at every network is a plethora of news offerings on the Internet and cellphones. CBS plans to update its Web site every 90 seconds, while ABC says it will provide updates every minute. ABC will also allow college and high school students to file Internet "perspectives" via video cellphone, Web cam or camcorder. NBC plans extensive additional material on MSNBC.com, along with original newscasts for mobile phones.

"Online was something that was just beginning the last time around," says Jon Banner, executive producer of "World News." "This time we are truly flooding the zone."

AARP's Tax Trap (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Social Security was supposed to be a killer issue for Democrats this election year after they defeated President Bush's reform plans in 2005. But suddenly the tables are turning on several Democratic candidates because of their endorsement of the tax-increase agenda of the American Association of Retired Persons, or AARP.

The liberal entitlement lobby has asked candidates around the country to fill out a questionnaire asking, "Will you support a balanced Social Security plan to continue the program's guaranteed benefits for future generations?" That may sound innocuous, but here's how AARP defines its balanced plan on its Web site near the above question: "AARP believes that a bipartisan plan that balances additional contributions from high income workers with modest adjustments in future benefits can maintain guaranteed Social Security benefits for future generations."

Those italics are ours, because in Washington "additional contributions" means a tax increase. And by "high income workers," AARP can only mean anyone earning more than $94,200, which is the 2006 income level above which the 12.4% Social Security portion of the payroll tax no longer applies. Employers and workers each pay half of the payroll levy, and the income cap already rises each year with inflation.

Thus if you make, say, $100,000 a year but live in pricey Los Angeles, tough luck; the folks at AARP think you're rich. They supported the elimination of the income cap for Medicare's portion of the payroll tax (2.9%) as part of the Clinton 1993 tax increase, and now they want to do it for the other 12.4%. A worker earning $150,000 would pay roughly $6,900 more each year in "additional contributions" under this AARP definition of "balance."

Many members in both parties signed this pledge, but for a handful of Democrats in hotly contested House seats (see the table nearby) it's become a political liability. That's because their GOP opponents refused to take the AARP pledge and are making an issue of this Democratic support for raising taxes on middle- and upper-income wage earners. It's certainly information voters ought to have before next Tuesday. Strangely, however, the Democrats are crying foul, and AARP is trying to give them political cover.

Democrat Melissa Bean -- who is trying to hold her seat in an affluent district near Chicago -- now claims she never supported the tax increase she plainly endorsed in answering AARP's questionnaire. And AARP is helping her disavow her pledge by sending a letter to her district's AARP members (as well as to the districts of other vulnerable Democrats who took its pledge). The letter from AARP President William Novelli slams Ms. Bean's opponent David McSweeney for his "ads trying to scare voters."

This AARP complaint about Social Security "scare" tactics is certainly novel, given that its own political clout has been built entirely on scaring seniors. In 2005, it paid for a TV campaign claiming President Bush wanted to "dismantle Social Security." But see if you can follow AARP's latest logic: According to a Chicago Daily Herald interview with AARP spokesman Dave Sloane: "The organization does believe lifting the cap on Social Security taxes and cutting future benefits may be necessary to keep the system afloat." But then he added that to conclude that Ms. Bean supports these policies "is an outrageous leap that is not even close to the truth."

That's not what Mr. Sloane said in previous statements about the purpose of AARP's candidate survey. He was quoted in the Palm Beach Post as saying that the intent of the questionnaire was to "gauge support for the group's position on Social Security . . . We presume that all the candidates would have read the background material and understood our positions."

Translation: AARP was hoping to use its candidate survey to nail down enough support to raise taxes on Social Security and to defeat private investment accounts if Mr. Bush pushes for reform again next year. But now that its scheme has been exposed and is hurting its Democratic pals in tight races, AARP leaders want to deny that this is what they meant. Let's hope Republicans remember this AARP double-dealing, which resembles what the lobby did in endorsing a drug plan for Medicare in 2003 only to call it inadequate now.

One irony here is that the now-disavowed AARP questionnaire is more honest than the group usually is about the choices facing politicians on Social Security. One option -- opposed by AARP -- is to reduce long-term unfunded liabilities by allowing workers to divert some of their payroll taxes into private accounts and tap into the higher returns that private investments offer. This would go a good deal of the way to solving the problem.

Another option -- the AARP "balanced" plan -- requires either raising taxes or cutting the future benefits of young workers, or both. That is, AARP would make today's lousy Social Security deal for young workers even worse. By all means voters should pay close attention to what AARP asked and how the candidates answered. It may have been the most honest moment in these Congressional campaigns.

To Save New York, Learn From London (WSJ)

By Charles E. Schumer And Michael R. Bloomberg

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

In recent months, there has been a lot of media chatter about the possibility of London taking over New York's position as the world's financial capital. Such speculation, although overblown, has focused our attention on a broader and legitimate concern: Unless we improve our corporate climate, we risk allowing New York to lose its pre-eminence in the global financial-services sector. This would be devastating both for our city and nation.

One of the engines of growth for the U.S. economy, the financial-services industry in New York has long possessed significant comparative advantages over London and all other cities. These advantages include the broadest, most efficient and liquid capital markets in the world, and a concentration of the world's biggest financial firms -- which have a much larger presence here than anywhere else. This city dominates global private-equity markets, secondary trading markets, and mergers and acquisitions.

New York has unparalleled quality of life and cultural diversity, which global companies increasingly seek, as well as a dynamic labor market -- our unemployment rate is lower than the nation's. Taken together, these advantages explain why New York's financial-sector employment numbers are greater than any other city's.

Yet while New York remains the dominant global-exchange center, we have been losing ground as the leader in capital formation. In 2005 only one out of the top 24 IPOs was registered in the U.S., and four were registered in London. London is gaining ground in other areas too, but it is not only London we need to worry about. Next year, more money will be raised through IPOs in Hong Kong than in either London or New York.

We cannot ignore these warning signs. That is why New York has hired a consulting firm, which will issue a report in November identifying the specific variables that are negatively impacting our financial-services industry and recommending an action plan to correct them.

Based on the work completed so far, there are four factors that bear close attention: globalization of the capital markets, overregulation, frivolous litigation and incompatible accounting standards. The first factor is beyond our control; advances in technology and communication are allowing capital to flow more freely, making it much easier to locate financial activities anywhere in the world. But we can, and must, do something about the other three factors to maintain and expand our competitive edge.

First, what lessons can we learn from other nations' regulatory systems? Currently, there are more than 10 federal, state and industry regulatory bodies in the U.S. The British have only one such body. Industry experts estimate that the gross financial regulatory costs to U.S. companies are 15 times higher than in Britain. Beyond cost savings, the British enjoy another advantage: While our regulatory bodies are often competing to be the toughest cop on the street, the British regulatory body seems to be more collaborative and solutions-oriented.

With the benefit of hindsight, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which imposed a new regulatory framework on all public companies doing business in the U.S., also needs to be re-examined. Since its passage, auditing expenses for companies doing business in the U.S. have grown far beyond anything Congress had anticipated. Of course, we must not in any way diminish our ability to detect corporate fraud and protect investors. But there appears to be a worrisome trend of corporate leaders focusing inordinate time on compliance minutiae rather than innovative strategies for growth, for fear of facing personal financial penalties from overzealous regulators.

Second, what lessons can we learn from other nations' legal environments? The total value of securities class-action lawsuits in the U.S. has skyrocketed in recent years, to $9.6 billion in 2005 from $150 million in 1997. The U.K. and other nations have laws that far more effectively discourage frivolous suits. It may be time to revisit the best way to reduce frivolous lawsuits without eliminating meritorious ones.

Third, what lessons can we learn from other nations' experiences with international accounting standards? Most European and Asian countries have already begun to adopt international accounting standards, which businesses tend to prefer over the American system. Yet we have set no timetable for doing the same.

In the last quarter of the 20th century, we achieved an almost exquisite balance between regulation and entrepreneurial vigor in American financial markets. We learned that too much regulation stifles entrepreneurship, competition and innovation; while too little regulation creates excessive risk to industry, investors and the overall system.

This delicate balance has been upset by technological advances, making it much easier to locate financial-services activities anywhere in the world. As a result, foreign markets may be tempted to lower regulatory requirements to achieve a temporary competitive advantage. Though deregulation may help some countries gain more business in the short term, over the long term it could hurt the stability and reliability of the global marketplace.

New York cannot afford to lose its place as the global leader in financial services. We have to carefully redefine this balance of innovation and regulation. That is what we seek to do over the next several months.

Our ability to do that, and to answer these three questions, will determine the future of New York -- and, in many ways, the nation. If we do not rise to the challenge, the speculation that New York is losing its pre-eminence in the global marketplace will become more than just chatter.

Mr. Schumer is a Democratic senator from New York. Mr. Bloomberg is mayor of New York City.

North Korea Will Resume Nuclear Talks (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad, Andrew Baston and Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

North Korea agreed to return to nuclear-disarmament talks with its four neighbors and the U.S. in a deal brokered by China. As part of the deal, the U.S. agreed to discuss its financial restrictions on the Pyongyang regime.

The agreement relieves some of the tension that North Korea created after it conducted its first nuclear test Oct. 9. It comes as countries around the world prepare to enforce sanctions imposed on North Korea by the United Nations Security Council following the test.

DOJ_NMG_0089707

President Bush said he was "pleased" by the breakthrough and thanked the Chinese for their efforts in making it happen. Yet other U.S. officials expressed concern over whether North Korea plans to actually engage in talks and isn't simply trying to dodge U.N. sanctions.

A State Department spokesman said the U.S. was willing to discuss lifting financial restrictions that Washington imposed on North Korea last year so long as Pyongyang agrees to return to a September 2005 framework, in which it had promised to scrap its nuclear work in return for aid and other inducements.

Mr. Bush said there was still "a lot of work to do" and that the U.S. planned to send "teams to the region to work with our partners to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced."

A new round of talks could occur as soon as mid-November, said diplomats in Beijing, where officials from the U.S., China and North Korea met yesterday to discuss the talks' resumption. The three countries -- along with Japan, Russia and South Korea -- last met a year ago.

The deal to restart the talks is a significant diplomatic accomplishment for China, North Korea's neighbor and closest ally. Relations between the two have been strained by Pyongyang's drive to demonstrate its nuclear capability. Senior Chinese diplomats went to Pyongyang two weeks ago to begin the process of bringing North Korea back to the table.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who represented the U.S. in the discussions, said China's role validated the Bush administration's longstanding decision to negotiate with North Korea only when other countries are involved. "The close U.S.-China cooperation that we have developed in recent weeks and months is due to the fact that we had a multilateral process," he said.

China in early October joined many other countries in urging North Korea not to undertake a nuclear test. Pyongyang responded by giving the Chinese just 20 minutes' notice that a test would occur. China then joined other countries on the Security Council in a unanimous vote for sanctions. It also held up some bank transactions in cities that border North Korea.

Last November, North Korea walked away from the preliminary agreement forged in the six-way talks, saying the U.S. had ruined the deal by alleging soon after the accord was reached that a bank in the Chinese enclave of Macau had engaged in illegal activities on behalf of the North Korean government.

After the U.S. blacklisted the bank, the Macau government froze about $24 million in North Korean funds there. Subsequently, other banks began refusing to do business with North Korea.

U.S. officials said its investigations of Pyongyang's financial activities began long before the six-way agreement reached in September 2005. Under the framework deal, the assistance North Korea would have received each week exceeded the money frozen in the Macau bank accounts.

But the frozen assets remained a major issue for North Korea and were cited in official pronouncements and in interviews by government and military figures immediately after the Oct. 9 test.

While North Korea put no conditions on returning to the talks, Mr. Hill said, "They wanted to hear that we would address the issue of financial measures. I said we would be prepared to create a mechanism to address these financial issues."

Mr. Hill said he also told the North Korean diplomats that neither the U.S. nor other countries recognize North Korea as a nuclear state.

In South Korea, where the government has been reluctant to take harsh steps for fear of provoking the North further, officials quickly welcomed news the talks would resume.

N. Korea Agrees To Return To Talks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

North Korea agreed yesterday to return to the six-nation nuclear disarmament talks, just three weeks after it conducted its first test of a nuclear device.

The country's unexpected decision, which was announced by Chinese and U.S. officials in Beijing, will end Pyongyang's year-long boycott of the talks, which have dragged on intermittently for more than three years. Fourteen months ago, North Korea agreed in principle to dismantle its nuclear programs, but hard bargaining is still necessary to determine the sequence and timing of the incentives it expects in return.

Pyongyang had refused to return to the talks until the United States separately negotiated an end to a crackdown on North Korea's counterfeiting of U.S. currency. But that demand disappeared Tuesday during seven hours of meetings, set up by China at Beijing's Diaoyutai State Guesthouse, involving U.S., North Korean and Chinese officials. North Korea instead agreed to a long-standing U.S. proposal to deal with the counterfeiting issue through a working group of the six-party talks.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill emerged from the meetings to say that there was the potential for "substantial progress" in resolving an issue that has raised tensions throughout the region, including the possibility of a nuclear arms race. U.S. officials were privately puzzled by the mercurial government's change of heart, though they said they hope the universal condemnation of North Korea's nuclear test and the swift imposition of U.N. sanctions had played a role.

"In the wake of their test, it became very clear that there were going to be costs and consequences for their actions and that they faced even greater isolation from the rest of the international community," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. The talks are expected to resume either this month or in December.

Some analysts and diplomats have faulted the Bush administration for being inflexible and ideological during earlier rounds, making it difficult to reach agreement. David Straub, a former State Department official who was part of the U.S. delegation to some of the talks, said North Korea probably shifted tactics to deflect international pressure and divide the nations at the negotiating table. Unless both the United States and North Korea "bring significantly different approaches to the talks, the talks will again amount to nothing," he said. "Indeed, both will almost certainly take even tougher lines."

President Bush, meeting with reporters in Washington, praised China's role in setting up the meeting. "We'll be sending teams to the region to work with our partners to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced, but also to make sure that the talks are effective, that we achieve the results we want," Bush said.

Last Wednesday, the Chinese government contacted the U.S. Embassy in Beijing and proposed a trilateral meeting involving North Korea, the United States and China. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Friday authorized Hill to cut short the meetings he had in the South Pacific and to slip into Beijing on an unannounced visit. U.S. officials agreed to try the Chinese idea but had little expectation it would yield a breakthrough.

In January, Hill held a 2 1/2 -hour meeting in Beijing with the Chinese and North Koreans to try to restart the talks, but that effort was not successful.

This time, Hill had seven hours of meetings -- including, at one point, with Kim Gye Gwan, the North Korean vice foreign minister who is Hill's counterpart in the talks, and other North Korean officials. Hill said he told Kim that the United States would never accept North Korea as a nuclear power, nor would any other nation. Hill also told Kim that the U.N. Security Council resolution imposed after North Korea's nuclear test was an "international obligation" and not up for discussion before the resumption of the talks.

The meetings were described as very businesslike. Kim wanted assurances that a Treasury Department action against a Macau bank suspected of money laundering for North Korea would be addressed in the six-party talks. The United States had earlier suggested setting up a working group to address the issue, and Hill reaffirmed that idea. Kim said that was acceptable, according to Hill.

U.S. officials have maintained that the Treasury case was simply an excuse by North Korea to avoid making the strategic choice of giving up its nuclear programs. In earlier talks, Pyongyang had demanded light-water reactors in exchange for abandoning its programs. Though that possible incentive is mentioned in a September 2005 "statement of principles" to guide nuclear negotiations, the United States has insisted that it is only a theoretical possibility that could come at the end of the verified dismantling of North Korea's nuclear facilities.

North Korea set no conditions for returning to the six-party talks on its nuclear program, Hill said. "For us it was very important that no one should create conditions for attending the talks," he said.

Michael J. Green, who oversaw Asian affairs at the White House until last year, said it was significant that North Korea agreed to return without getting relief from the Treasury action or the U.N. sanctions.

"The Chinese exerted real pressure," Green said. He added that he expects China to push North Korea to offer something concrete at the upcoming rounds of talks, such as a moratorium on future tests, a full detailing of its nuclear programs or the return of international inspectors at its Yongbyon facility.

"North Korea is going to cling tenaciously to its nuclear weapons," Green said, but the existence of U.N. sanctions will facilitate coercive diplomacy.

North Korea has blamed the impasse on the U.S. Treasury action against a bank in Macau called Banco Delta Asia, which the department had identified as the main conduit for bringing North Korean-made counterfeit U.S. bills into the international system. The Treasury had determined that senior officials at the Macau bank accepted large deposits of cash and agreed to place the bogus money into circulation.

The bank is also reputed to hold the private accounts of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and his family.

North Korea Will Resume Nuclear Talks (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089709

BEIJING, Oct. 31 — North Korea agreed Tuesday to resume nuclear disarmament talks, a first sign of easing tensions since the country's nuclear test this month. But the talks have dragged on inconclusively for three years, and the chances for rolling back the country's now-proven nuclear capability remained uncertain.

China announced that six-nation talks would reconvene shortly after a hiatus of more than a year, and an American envoy in Beijing said they could take place in November or December.

The agreement was a procedural victory for Beijing, which scrambled to reopen a diplomatic channel even as it joined the United States and other international powers in supporting United Nations sanctions on North Korea after the Oct. 9 test.

But Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, has participated in multiple rounds of talks over the past several years while he accelerated his pursuit of nuclear weapons, and some analysts suspect that he agreed to restart talks now to forestall tough enforcement of sanctions and to persuade China and South Korea to ease his government's growing economic woes.

While North Korea's decision to restart the talks is being heralded as a diplomatic breakthrough, American envoys will be returning to the negotiating table to face an adversary that now has a demonstrated nuclear capability — a fact that America will try to minimize even as North Korea tries to exploit it, Bush administration officials and analysts said.

"The dangerous possibility is that North Korea sits down at the table and says, 'We're now a nuclear state, let's deal with it,' " said Bonnie Glaser, a senior associate at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

In an interview on Tuesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice played down suggestions that America's negotiating task would be made more difficult by the North's nuclear test. "Nobody accepts that they're a nuclear power," she said. The North Koreans, she said, "can say it all they wish."

Ms. Rice said the United States would work with the other participants of the talks to force the North to take a concrete step toward ending its nuclear program. She offered few details but acknowledged that two of the possibilities being discussed were a dismantling of one of the North's many nuclear facilities and the readmission of international inspectors.

Other officials who have discussed the administration's internal deliberations have said the dismantling should begin with a facility like North Korea's five-megawatt reactor, which is continuing to produce nuclear fuel, or its plutonium reprocessing center, where spent reactor fuel can be turned into material for weapons.

"We understand it can't go from zero to 100 in the first session," Ms. Rice said. "But the core of this is denuclearization, and we have to have concrete evidence."

Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state responsible for the talks, and Kim Kye-gwan, his North Korean counterpart, met secretly in Beijing under Chinese auspices to hash out terms of resuming negotiations, Chinese state media reported.

Mr. Hill said Tuesday that he expected "substantial progress" at the talks and that they would resume without preconditions. But he acknowledged that previous talks had been plodding and painstaking, and promised no quick breakthrough.

"We are a long way from our goal, still," he said. "I have not broken out the cigars and Champagne quite yet."

For the past year, North Korea had refused to resume negotiations on its nuclear program until the United States lifted financial penalties imposed on a Macao bank last year that have hobbled the country's international financial transactions. Mr. Hill said that he agreed to discuss the matter as part of the nuclear talks — perhaps in a special working group that would convene at the same time as the main negotiations — but that he had made no promises.

The Bush administration accused the Macao bank, Banco Delta Asia, of helping North Korea to launder money from drug smuggling and other illicit activities and to pass counterfeit $100 bills manufactured by the North Korean government. In September 2005, the Treasury Department ordered United States banks to sever relations with the bank, a move that had broad ripple effects, curtailing North Korean access to the international banking system and further isolating the government in Pyongyang.

The talks, which involve Japan, South Korea and Russia as well as China, North Korea and the United States, reached a vaguely worded agreement for nuclear disarmament in September 2005, which North Korea quickly disavowed. The talks collapsed a short time later amid mutual recriminations.

Mr. Hill said Mr. Kim reiterated during their meetings in Beijing that putting the 2005 accord into effect should be the main focus of the renewed talks.

That agreement called for North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program in exchange for a range of diplomatic, economic and energy incentives, but left most of the details to subsequent negotiations that never took place.

"We all reaffirmed, including the North Koreans, our commitment to the September statement and the denuclearization of the Korean peninsula," Mr. Hill said.

DOJ_NMG_0089710

Bush administration hard-liners, who have been chafing under Ms. Rice's multilateral diplomatic approach to North Korea, played down the resumption of talks, saying that America is merely back where it was a year ago before the North abandoned the talks, except now Pyongyang has the added bargaining chip of having exploded a nuclear device.

"Where's the stick?" asked one administration official. "We're celebrating the six-party talks, but we're back to endless chatter."

Gary Samore, a North Korea expert who helped negotiate President Clinton's 1994 agreement with the North, said, "I think the North Koreans gamed this all out. They calculated they could get away with a nuclear test if they allowed themselves to be cajoled back into the six-party talks."

But North Korea's commitment to resume talks may reduce the chances that it will soon conduct a second nuclear test, as some in the region feared it might be preparing to do.

Some Chinese experts have argued that North Korea needs to dispel doubts about its nuclear capabilities and complete its quest to become a full nuclear power before it will be willing to bargain away what it refers to as its "nuclear deterrent."

They say that Kim Jong-il may feel he can demand a higher price for disarmament now than he could when some international experts, including some of China's top North Korea specialists, had expressed doubts that the country could make its own nuclear bombs.

Many others disagree, including a growing contingent of Chinese officials and foreign policy specialists who take a skeptical view of the North's intentions and favor a tougher line on China's Korean War-era ally, according to numerous people involved in the debate.

Shi Yinhong, an international relations expert at People's University in Beijing, said he believed that Kim Jong-il's agreement to return to talks was motivated mainly by his desire to head off tough enforcement of international sanctions.

"His purpose has been to develop nuclear bombs and that purpose has not changed," Mr. Shi said. "His goal now is to keep his bombs but reduce the penalty he has to pay by appearing to be negotiating in good faith."

Some Chinese experts said Beijing had made clear that it would exercise considerable economic and financial leverage on North Korea if it continues to develop its nuclear program and refuses to return to talks.

In September, China did not sell any oil to North Korea, Chinese customs statistic show. The cutoff came before the nuclear test but after North Korea conducted a test of its ballistic missiles in July, ignoring Beijing's pleas for restraint.

Beijing provides an estimated 90 percent of North Korea's oil by pipeline, and any sustained reduction in oil shipments could cripple the country's already weakened economy.

Liu Jianchao, the foreign ministry spokesman, said Tuesday, before the resumption of talks was announced, that China had no plans to sever aid or trade with North Korea, but dodged questions about the oil cutoff.

Pyongyang Agrees To Resume N-talks (FT)

By Mure Dickie In Beijing, David Pilling In Tokyo And Anna Fifield In Seoul

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

North Korea on Tuesday surprisingly agreed to return to the six-party talks on its nuclear programme, just three weeks after it conducted its first nuclear test.

In returning to the talks, analysts say North Korea probably bowed to growing pressure from China, its largest benefactor and closest political ally. China's foreign ministry said that Pyongyang's agreement to resume the talks followed a "frank and in-depth" exchange of views.

As the world's big powers work through the details of how to punish Kim Jong-il's regime for the test on October 9, Christopher Hill, the chief US negotiator in the talks, said on Tuesday that the negotiations – which had been stalled for a year – could resume as soon as this month.

However, with North Korea remaining defiant and the US and Japan still lobbying for tough sanctions, hopes remain dim that Pyongyang will agree to abandon its nuclear capability.

"We are a long way from our goals," Mr Hill told reporters in Beijing, after seven hours of talks with Wu Dawei and Kim Kye-gwan, his Chinese and North Korean counterparts.

"I have not broken out the cigars and the champagne yet," Mr Hill said, adding that the timing was "dependent on agreement of all the parties".

In Tokyo, Hiroshi Suzuki, deputy chief cabinet secretary, said North Korea's return to the table vindicated the tough stance advocated by Shinzo Abe, Japan's prime minister. "We feel this is the result of the international community condemning North Korea and the result of the pressure applied under United Nations resolution 1718 and Japan's own sanctions."

Earlier on Tuesday, Mr Abe told the Financial Times, that sanctions were vital to force a negotiated settlement to the nuclear crisis. He said the international community, including China and South Korea, should "make [Kim's] regime aware that, should it continue with its current policy line, it will only find the situation surrounding it worsen by the day. “The economic as well as the food situation is only going to get tougher,” he said.

Mr Abe, who built his political career on being tough on Pyongyang, said imposing severe sanctions would not inevitably lead to confrontation.

“We are convinced that this problem needs to be resolved diplomatically and in a peaceful manner,” he said. “But I also think Chairman Kim Jong-il and the regime are aware that if they resort to force, that will spell the end of them,” he said. Since the test, Tang Jiaxuan, a Chinese state councillor, has travelled to Pyongyang to meet Kim Jong-il and Chinese banks have clamped down on transactions with North Korean companies.

A senior South Korean government official said it was “taken for granted” that North Korea and the US would hold bilateral talks on the sidelines of the multilateral discussions.

Both Japan and the US have said that a return to six-party talks would not be sufficient to prevent sanctions. The cabinet office in Tokyo said last night that in returning to the negotiations, Pyongyang was only doing what it was mandated to do by the United Nations.

Thomas Schieffer, US ambassador to Japan, recently said that only a verifiable end to North Korea’s nuclear programme could justify lifting sanctions.

Analysis: N. Korea, U.S. Both Flexible (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, November 1, 2006

The United States and North Korea took a step back from the nuclear brink after both sides showed they could be willing to bend under the calm guidance of Beijing.

Still, with no date set for arms talks to resume and Washington and Pyongyang profoundly lacking in trust of each other, it remains to be seen whether Tuesday's agreement for the North to return to negotiations means an end is near for the North's aspirations of being a nuclear power.

Both the North and the United States had previously stuck to ironclad positions that seemed totally at odds, leaving little apparent room for a breakthrough. Neither side wanted to cave, despite calls from other nations for flexibility.

In keeping with its typical tactics of escalation and brinksmanship, the North test-fired a barrage of missiles in July and then took the unprecedented step of conducting a nuclear test Oct. 9 to goad the U.S. to action. Washington responded by backing tough U.N. sanctions.

If the United States agreed to meet the North's demand for direct talks and other concessions, it would amount to succumbing to nuclear blackmail — at least in some minds.

Instead, U.S. officials demanded the North first return to the international nuclear talks — which also include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea — and said it'd be happy to meet separately just with the North there. That position had softened somewhat just before the North's Oct. 9 nuclear test, with U.S. officials saying the North simply had to agree to return to the nuclear talks first to get some face time with the Americans.

But the North insisted on direct talks with the U.S., in keeping with its view that its nuclear dispute is with Washington alone because of the perceived threat to the regime it sees from the American military.

Pyongyang also wants to be seen as on equal footing with Washington, a desire fueled by nationalistic ideology viewing itself as a great nation and "socialist paradise."

North Korea had also refused to return to the talks until the U.S. lifted financial restrictions against a Macau bank where it held accounts. That move had been part of a Washington campaign to sever the already isolated communist country from the international financial system for its alleged involvement in counterfeiting and money laundering to sell weapons of mass destruction.

China appears to have held the key in getting both sides to compromise and allow all to save "face."

During Tuesday's meetings in Beijing that led to the North's agreement to return to the bargaining table, Chinese and American representives first met and then all three sides had lunch, said U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the main U.S. envoy. Then, the U.S. and North Korean delegations met before all three got together again.

Having China in the room for most of the time meant the U.S. technically wasn't meeting just with North Korea.

For its part, the North stepped back from its demand that the financial restrictions be lifted to return to nuclear talks. But Hill said Washington did agree to discuss the issue at the nuclear talks.

Those negotiations will still be rife with pitfalls, given disagreements between the two sides.

The North has previously refused to dismantle its nuclear program without getting concessions along the way, while the U.S. has said it wants to see the entire program eliminated before giving Pyongyang any reward.

When the talks do resume, the U.S. and North Korea will have a chance to show just how far their flexibility goes.

Bush Cautious On N. Korea Nuke Turnabout (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 1, 2006

In a surprise turnabout, North Korea agreed Tuesday to return to six-nation disarmament talks just three weeks after rattling the world by conducting an atomic bomb test. The breakthrough came after pressure from China and a U.S. offer to discuss financial penalties already in place.

President Bush cautiously welcomed the deal and thanked the Chinese for brokering it. But he said the agreement wouldn't sidetrack U.S. efforts to enforce sanctions adopted by the U.N. Security Council to punish Pyongyang for its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

He said there was still "a lot of work to do" and the U.S. would send teams to the region "to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced."

The ultimate goal is "a North Korea that abandons her nuclear weapons programs and her nuclear weapons in a verifiable fashion in return for a better way forward for her people," the president said.

The unexpected agreement to restart the talks — before year's end, U.S. officials said — was announced after envoys from North Korea, the United States and China met in Beijing, at China's invitation.

In a statement about the decision, North Korea's Foreign Ministry said the North decided to return to the talks to resolve financial restrictions the U.S. had imposed on its international banking activities. The North's recent nuclear test received scant mention, with the Foreign Ministry referring only to a "self-defensive countermeasure" it had taken against the nuclear threat and financial sanctions from the U.S.

The move represented a step back from the nuclear crisis and was widely applauded, if with some reservations. North Korea has a history of walking away from the six-nation talks, only to rejoin them, then to bolt again.

"We believe that the sooner talks resume, the faster the tension around this problem will fade," Igor Ivanov, chief of Russia's presidential Security Council, said in Moscow.

Japan's U.N. ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, called the development "a welcome first step, but there are many, many other things that we need to closely monitor and watch." Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso was quoted as saying a resumption of talks "is conditional on North Korea not possessing nuclear weapons."

Aso later said that sanctions would be maintained against North Korea in spite of its willingness to return to the talks. In a tough stance against North Korea, Japan has banned all trade and barred North Korean ships from its ports.

Just a week before contentious U.S. congressional elections, it was a diplomatic victory for Bush. Democrats gave it a qualified but skeptical endorsement.

"It may ultimately be a positive step forward, but it is clearly not sufficient to produce the goal we all want to achieve — a halt to North Korea's nuclear weapons' activities," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada. He urged Bush to name a special envoy to Pyongyang and to engage in direct U.S.-North Korean talks.

Republicans cast it as a sign of Bush's foreign-policy leadership. "The president's strategy has effectively isolated North Korea from its neighbors in the region and now appears to have returned that rogue regime to the negotiating table," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

However, China's leaning on its communist neighbor appeared to be the major factor in the progress, not U.S. diplomacy, and Bush acknowledged Beijing's role in Oval Office comments to reporters.

China, the largest supplier of oil for North Korea, has more leverage than any other country with Pyongyang. In a possible sign of Beijing's growing impatience, Chinese exports of diesel and heating oil to North Korea dropped substantially in September from a year ago, though exports of gasoline, liquefied petroleum gas, kerosene and jet fuel rose, according to Chinese customs data.

The six-nation talks — involving North and South Korea, the United States, China, Russia and Japan — have been stalled since last November. North Korea has boycotted them, largely to protest U.S. financial sanctions that target alleged counterfeiting of U.S. currency and money laundering.

Washington has insisted those sanctions, which include a freeze on North Korean bank accounts in Macau, are unrelated to the nuclear weapons dispute.

For its part, the North stepped back from its demand that the financial restrictions be lifted before it would return to nuclear talks. And Washington agreed for the first time to discuss the financial sanctions at the nuclear talks, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the U.S. negotiator, told reporters in Beijing.

DOJ_NMG_0089713

Hill said the talks could resume as early as November or December. "We took a step today toward getting this process back on track," he said. But, he added, "We are a long way from our goal still. ... I have not broken out the cigars and champagne quite yet."

White House press secretary Tony Snow sought to play down U.S. concessions. He insisted that the United States made no promises to link the financial-sanctions dispute to the nuclear one, only agreeing that "issues like that may be discussable at some future time."

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack said he was sure there would be "an opportunity for us to have direct talks" with North Korean negotiators in the context of the six-party framework. He said the negotiations would probably take place in Beijing.

The six-party talks had originally been intended to persuade Pyongyang to abandon its nuclear ambitions. But its nuclear test changed the debate and the stakes.

"No one wants North Korea to continue its nuclear weapons program, particularly after the North Koreans tested a nuclear device," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview on CNBC. She said the U.S. wanted "concrete steps" toward denuclearizing the Korean peninsula. "It really doesn't make sense again for us just to go back and talk," Rice said.

The Security Council voted unanimously on Oct. 14 to impose sanctions on Pyongyang, including a ban on major weapons shipments and restrictions on sales of luxury goods.

"The big question now is, will we meet and will we have anything new to talk about? The North still doesn't trust us, and we don't trust North Korea," said John Wolfstahl, a former nonproliferation official with the U.S. Energy Department.

Sen. Carl Levin, the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the development was heartening, but that the next round of talks would be much tougher because North Korea has now tested a nuclear weapon. "I'm afraid North Korea comes back stronger," Levin said in an interview.

North Korea To Resume Six-Party Nuclear Talks (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

BEIJING -- North Korea agreed Tuesday to return to negotiations aimed at halting its nuclear weapons program, three weeks after the regime conducted its first nuclear test.

Washington, Beijing, Tokyo and other negotiating partners get what they want -- a North Korean regime back at the table talking with the outside world rather than posturing and threatening from its isolated corner. But the move threatens to widen the differences among other partners in the talks, made up of the U.S., China, Japan, the two Koreas and Russia, which in the immediate wake of the test Oct. 9 were relatively unified.

China and South Korea will be more tempted to oppose further sanctions at the U.N. Security Council amid concerns that pushing North Korea too far could create an expensive and destabilizing refugee crisis on their shared borders.

After North Korea's announcement that it had done an underground test of a nuclear device, the Security Council imposed sanctions last month that restricted trade with North Korea in missile technology and luxury goods.

Washington and Tokyo feel it is more important to keep pressure on Pyongyang, not only to exact a cost for its action but also to serve as a deterrent for others, especially Iran.

North Korea set no conditions for its return to the bargaining table with sessions expected to begin next month, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill told reporters.

The talks will take as their starting point the September 2005 Beijing joint statement agreed upon by the negotiating parties shortly before Pyongyang walked out. A key goal in the statement is the eventual denuclearization of the Korean peninsula.

North Korea on Tuesday dropped its demand that the U.S. end financial sanctions linked to counterfeiting, money laundering and weapons proliferation before the isolated Stalinist state would return to the bargaining table. Instead, the U.S. financial squeeze, which involves $24 million in a Macau bank, will be considered as a side issue within the six-party framework.

"We need (North Korea) to get out of illicit activities," Hill said. "We didn't start this dance."

With a test under its belt, North Korea returns to the talks in a position of greater strength. This begs the question whether Pyongyang will pick up negotiations where it left them off 13 months ago or cling to a tougher stance reflecting its membership in the nuclear club.

The six-nation talks "can be endlessly gamed by the North Koreans," said Derek Mitchell, an Asia specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "We'll see if they're serious once they get there."

DOJ_NMG_0089714

In Washington, President Bush expressed pleasure that the talks would resume and praised the six-party format. In the lead up to next week's midterm election, the news could be used to counter criticism by Democrats of his refusal to hold bilateral talks with Pyongyang.

"I've always felt like it is important for the United States to be at the table with other partners when it comes time to addressing this important issue, and so I thank not only the Chinese but the South Koreans, the Japanese and the Russians for agreeing to come back to the table with North Korea," Bush said in televised comments.

China has a keen interest in resumption of six-party talks. The North's nuclear test, though of a very low yield, upset regional stability and at least temporarily discredited the talks as an institution.

Beijing also sees the format as a way to burnish its global credentials and remain on Washington's good side. Russia quickly welcomed the North's decision to return to the bargaining table.

"We unambiguously assess the informal meeting itself and the statement on resuming the six-sided negotiations as soon as possible as exceedingly positive," Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Alexeyev told the Russian news agency Interfax. "The six-sided talks have been given a chance."

China Pushes North Korea Back To Table For Nuclear Talks (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin And Calum Macleod

USA Today, November 1, 2006

Economic and political pressure from China was instrumental in prompting North Korea to say it would return to disarmament talks. North Korea's announcement Tuesday eased tensions that had escalated after its first nuclear weapons test three weeks ago.

“I am pleased, and I want to thank the Chinese,” President Bush said. He acknowledged, however, that new talks don't guarantee success.

China provides most of North Korea's fuel, and it sharply cut exports of diesel and heating oil to its impoverished neighbor in September, China's customs administration said. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao would not comment on the shipments. A senior Chinese official, Tang Jiaxuan, visited North Korea Oct. 19 and urged it to return to the negotiations.

The announcement also followed a day of meetings among top U.S., North Korean and Chinese negotiators in Beijing that included a private U.S.-North Korean session. The North Koreans had refused to return to negotiations without direct contact with U.S. officials. The meeting was arranged by China, said Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the lead U.S. negotiator.

An Oct. 14 resolution from the United Nations Security Council barred trade and financial transactions that could aid North Korea's nuclear and missile programs.

It was Chinese involvement, however, that was critical. “Today was a good day in the process of having China and the United States work together on this issue,” Hill said.

The Bush administration has been reluctant to deal directly with North Korea and has insisted on using a group of countries, arguing that they have more leverage. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., hailed Tuesday's developments as a victory for the administration's strategy.

Getting North Korea to the table is a diplomatic success, but negotiations will be tough. Shen Dingli, a Korea expert at Fudan University in Shanghai, said “negotiations will be more difficult” because North Korea will enter them as a “de facto nuclear state.”

Hill cautioned that much work needed to be done to prepare for talks. “We're a long way from our goals here,” he said. “I have not broken out the champagne and cigars yet.”

Hill said the six-nation negotiations, which include the two Koreas, Japan, Russia, China and the United States, could resume as early as this month or December.

North Korea may have enough radioactive material for a dozen bombs, according to the Institute for Science and International Security, a think tank.

The six-nation talks began in 2003. In September 2005, North Korea agreed to dismantle its nuclear program in return for energy aid and U.S. pledges not to attack the country. North Korea left the talks after rejecting U.S. demands that it eliminate its nuclear program before receiving civilian nuclear reactors.

North Korea was also angered because the U.S. government persuaded a bank in Macau a year ago to freeze $24 million in North Korean funds.

N. Korea Agrees To Six-party Talks (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

DOJ_NMG_0089715

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

North Korea agreed yesterday to return to six-nation talks on its nuclear programs after the United States said it will discuss financial sanctions against Pyongyang on the sidelines of the multilateral talks.

The Bush administration insisted, however, that it and other countries would continue working to implement trade restrictions imposed on the North by a U.N. Security Council resolution last month.

"I'm very pleased with the progress being made in the Far East," President Bush said after the North Koreans told U.S. and Chinese diplomats in Beijing they would end their yearlong boycott of the negotiations. No date was set for the resumption of talks.

The limited breakthrough in efforts to resume the talks was announced by the Chinese Foreign Ministry, which said North Korea had agreed in talks with the United States and China to soon resume the long-stalled six-party talks on its nuclear program. The ministry posted a statement to that effect on its Web site yesterday.

"We'll be sending teams to the region to work with our partners to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced, but also to make sure the talks are effective, that we achieve the results we want," Mr. Bush said.

That goal, he said, is to see the North abandon its pursuit of nuclear weapons "in a verifiable fashion."

The teams the president referred to will be led by State Department officials and will maintain political contacts with countries in Northeast Asia, said department spokesman Sean McCormack. He said the teams would not get involved in the practical daily implementation of Resolution 1718.

The U.N. measure was adopted unanimously by the 15-member council in response to North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test. It bans exports from and imports to the North of illicit materials and equipment that could be used to further its missile and weapons of mass destruction programs.

Mr. McCormack said the Chinese informed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice late last week that the North Koreans had requested a three-way meeting with the United States.

Miss Rice asked Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs and chief negotiator on North Korea, to go to Beijing and meet with his North Korean counterpart, Kim Gye-gwan. Mr. Hill was in Sydney at the time, having stayed in the region after Miss Rice's visit two weeks ago.

"We took a step today toward getting this process back on track. This process has suffered a lot in recent weeks by the actions" of North Korea, Mr. Hill told reporters in Beijing.

Mr. Hill said he first met with the Chinese and North Korean delegations together, and then bilaterally with Mr. Kim.

"I made it very clear that the United States does not accept [North Korea] as a nuclear power, and neither does China," he said.

Mr. Hill agreed to discuss financial penalties imposed on the North last year because of counterfeiting and other illegal activities, but he said Mr. Kim did not ask that those sanctions be lifted before the six-party talks can resume.

The talks also include Japan, South Korea and Russia.

Mr. McCormack said the United States hopes the talks will resume before year's end. The venue, as in the past, will most likely be Beijing, he said.

He also said Washington wants the talks to pick up where they left off at the last meeting in September 2005 -- with a joint statement committing all six countries to the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula.

"North Korea faced a qualitatively different geopolitical environment" after Resolution 1718, which was supported by its benefactor China, Mr. McCormack said. "Implementation of 1718 is going to continue."

Recent reports indicate China has taken a tougher stance toward the North than usual. Chinese trade statistics released Monday showed that China, the reclusive country's main energy supplier, did not sell any crude oil to North Korea in September.

Yesterday's announcement came a week before the U.S. midterm election, and both political parties offered speedy interpretations of the events. Republicans said Pyongyang's decision was a vindication for the Bush administration's rejection of bilateral negotiations. Democrats played down its significance, saying it was a small step forward.

"The announcement that North Korea will return to the six-party talks reinforces how effective the president's response to that crisis has been so far," said House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican.

"It may ultimately be a positive step forward, but it is clearly not sufficient to produce the goal we all want to achieve -- a halt to North Korea's nuclear weapons activities," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

Now Nuclear, North Korea Will Talk (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, November 1, 2006

BEIJING

DOJ_NMG_0089716

A surprise three-way meeting between US, Chinese, and North Korean diplomats here Tuesday has likely headed off the possibility of a second nuclear test by Pyongyang in the near future. It has also restored six-nation talks aimed at denuclearizing the Korean peninsula, bringing a modicum of stability to a region rocked Oct. 9 by an atomic blast from the cultish military regime of Kim Jong Il.

Given the bristling anger in northeast Asia after the nuclear blast, analysts say it is salutary that Mr. Kim is returning to the table to talk with his immediate neighbors. Talks could resume by late this month.

At a minimum, China and the US - neither of which anticipated the test - need to be seen in the region to be engaged in efforts to deal with Kim, says Ashton Carter at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government.

Yet most observers doubt that the North, having spent 40 years on its atomic program, is likely to give it up without dramatic achievement. Kim agreed to return to the talks without any "preconditions," including the lifting of US-led financial sanctions.

"There has been no real consensus on the main goal of the six-party talks," says Shi Yinhong of People's University in Beijing, who says that North Korea's return is an attempt to regain "strategic flexibility and undercut the hard-liners in the US.

"Now, North Korea has successfully maneuvered to bring the region back to its former status quo," he adds. "They have relieved the tension generated by the nuclear test; the only difference is that North Korea now has gained a nuclear ability."

It remains unclear what status North Korea will formally enjoy as it returns to an international arena of diplomacy that it walked out of last year. But there seems little doubt Pyongyang expects to think of itself as a bona fide nuclear-status nation as talks resume - and is likely to push others to do so as well.

Such a position is leagues from the kind of dismantlement the six-party talks are based on. "No nation that has tested a nuclear device has ever gone on to give up that device," points out Scott Snyder, a Korean specialist with the Asia Foundation. "South Africa gave up its program without having tested. So if I'm a US diplomat, I've got quite a steep uphill right now."

Some Chinese analysts say that Kim's move back to the table is a victory intended to create an aura of reasonability to his program and nuclear test, and to begin a campaign to win back the good graces of China and South Korea, which he isolated by his surprise test three weeks ago.

China's initial outrage over the North's test was quickly tempered by a lack of practical options to rein in the unpredictable Kim.

But its role in furthering North Korean diplomacy was underscored Tuesday when it served as host to what were apparently seven hours of talks between Chinese and North Korean envoys, and US special envoy Christopher Hill.

In the Oval office, President Bush immediately gave credit to China for playing an effective role. An Oct. 31 New York Times report pointed out that in September, according to Chinese trade statistics, China sold no oil to North Korea, whereas it had been averaging about 12,300 barrels a day prior to this.

On July 4, US time, despite warnings from China, North Korea tested a number of missiles, including a Taepodong 2 ballistic missiles capable of reaching US territory in Alaska.

Reaction from other members of the six-party talks was mixed. South Korea, which supports a policy of engagement, was supportive of the development, as was Russia, which said the news was "extremely positive." Japan, on the other hand, stated that it "does not intend to accept North Korea's return to the talks on the premise that it possesses nuclear weapons."

US envoy Hill also sounded a cautionary note, stating that "we're a long way from our goals here."

News of the return by the North to talks was posted in two sentences on the Chinese Foreign Ministry website at the end of Tuesday. Earlier in the day, Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said that Beijing was not engaged in a policy to cut aid or trade in order to force compliance by North Korea, and denied that a cut in oil signaled such a shift.

China is divided between traditionalists who cherish the revolutionary goals of the mid-20th-century communist spirit, and a more pragmatic and internationally minded new generation.

The Bush administration has long been divided on North Korea between hard- liners who feel that any discussions with a regime that grotesquely violates human rights at a mass level is immoral - and moderates who feel that negotiations are an imperfect but necessary tool.

What North Korea's test of a bomb shows, says Mr. Carter, is that the "six-party talks are a theory that doesn't fit the facts.

"The theory is that the US and China both highly value turning around the North Korean nuclear program," he says. "It turns out that China doesn't value that as highly as the US.

"The US would accept the continued existence of a nonnuclear North Korea," Carter says, but has been unable to achieve this through talks.

A US military official in Seoul argues that "the next round of six-party talks will not have any effect in getting Kim to abandon his nuclear program. But at least he will have to sit at the same table as Russia and China, eye to eye, and hear what his neighbors have to say."

North Korea Talks (WP)

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

NORTH KOREA'S decision to return to the "six party" negotiations on its nuclear program is, first and foremost, a victory for China and its strategy of preserving Kim Jong Il's totalitarian regime. Whether it will contribute to the cause of dismantling the North's atomic arsenal remains to be seen. Beijing hosts the talks, which also include the United States, South Korea, Russia and Japan; the North's refusal to attend for the past year, while testing a long-range missile and then a nuclear warhead, was an embarrassment to its chief patron. It appears China responded toughly: Though it supplies up to 90 percent of North Korea's oil, none was delivered in September. This blunt use of economic leverage -- if that's what it was -- is encouraging, and yesterday's announcement was evidence that it can get results.

The resumption of talks nevertheless falls well short of a breakthrough in the Bush administration's effort to disarm the Kim dictatorship. We hope Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, who conducted lengthy talks with his North Korean counterpart in recent days, is justified in expecting "substantial progress" from the new round. But history suggests that both North Korea and China may have achieved their objectives simply by making yesterday's announcement. Pyongyang no doubt expects that its attendance will result in the relaxation of whatever pressure China has applied and that South Korea will now hesitate to cut back on its own substantial subsidies. U.S. attempts to strictly apply recently approved U.N. sanctions and organize inspections of North Korean cargo ships might falter. While talks continue, China can deflect further pressure from the United States or Japan for steps that might ultimately destabilize a regime it prefers to preserve.

If Mr. Kim really is prepared to give up his nukes, a path has been laid. A "framework agreement" signed by the six parties more than a year ago called for North Korea to dismantle its program and receive aid and security guarantees in return, including normalization of relations with the United States. Critics who harp on the need for the Bush administration to strike a deal with Mr. Kim tend to overlook the fact that this deal has already been struck. The question is whether North Korea is serious about it or whether it agreed to the plan merely to mollify China and South Korea and buy more time to develop missiles and nuclear warheads. The evidence points to the latter explanation: Within weeks of agreeing, Mr. Kim broke off the talks, citing as a reason U.S. action against offshore bank accounts his government was using for criminal activity, including the massive counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

Mr. Hill said yesterday that the Bush administration had agreed to discuss the financial sanctions at the talks, thereby removing Mr. Kim's excuse. Now both he and his sponsors will be tested. If North Korea really wants to act on the framework agreement, that should quickly become clear: The accord calls for the regime to return "at an early date" to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and the international inspections it requires. If not, China will face a question: Is it willing to use its now proven clout with the North to put an end to its nuclear program -- or only to require that it attend meetings?

Keep The Pressure On North Korea (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

NORTH KOREA'S decision Tuesday to return to six-nation nuclear talks is a big diplomatic victory for Washington, and a bigger one for Beijing. Yet there are good reasons to be skeptical about Pyongyang's motives.

Kim Jong Il is a master at the art of weakening the resolve of diplomatic coalitions, and his decision to engage in talks once again may be nothing more than an attempt to stave off aggressive enforcement of U.N. Security Council sanctions. China and South Korea have in the past hesitated to embrace meaningful sanctions, but Kim faces a more united coalition in the aftermath of his nuclear test. The North Korean dictator may be hoping that his willingness to restart talks will erode Chinese and South Korean determination to stand firm and enforce the sanctions.

Such behavior is typical of rogue states eager to buy time or to capitalize on frictions within opposing coalitions. Saddam Hussein was adept at this game too, and nowadays Iran and Sudan seem to be mimicking Kim. The object is to feign flexibility and a willingness to negotiate in good faith — without actually giving anything up — so that those foreign powers most queasy about violating your sovereignty give up the fight to punish you. That's exactly what North Korea did last year, when it signed a broad framework calling for an end to its nuclear program in exchange for economic incentives, then refuted the agreement almost before the ink was dry.

China's support of sanctions in the aftermath of the nuclear test was a welcome departure from its usual nonintervention posture, though its power to influence its neighbor remains unclear. Much has been made, for example, of the fact that China substantially cut exports of heating oil to North Korea in September, widely seen as retaliation for a missile test in July. Yet that same month, China's exports of gasoline and other fuels rose, and the oil cutoff doesn't seem to have had any effect on Kim; he went ahead with his first nuclear test Oct. 9.

It is unquestionably better to hold talks, even with a suspect partner, than not to hold them at all. But no one — particularly the South Koreans, who have so far refused to join the U.S. effort to interdict ships containing potential materials for weapons of mass destruction — should take the agreement as a reason to avoid tough enforcement of existing sanctions. It's now abundantly clear that the South's attempt to woo Kim's regime with economic incentives and engagement has failed. Strong pressure combined with negotiations constitute the only practical way to curb North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

Rice Urges Major Powers To Speed Up Sanctions On Iran (AFP)

AFP, November 1, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called her major power counterparts in a bid to spur tough negotiations at the United Nations over a sanctions resolution against Iran, a senior US official said.

Rice urged the foreign ministers from the other permanent UN Security Council members -- Britain, China, France and Russia -- to overcome the differences that have prevented agreement on the sanctions package, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said.

"She put forward the proposal that we should try to work extremely hard to get that resolution passed as quickly as possible," Burns said.

"We are working very hard at the UN Security Council to push for a resolution," he said.

Iran faces the sanctions after rejecting an earlier UN resolution demanding it freeze a uranium enrichment program many fear is a cover for developing nuclear weapons.

Earlier another senior US official said North Korea's sudden decision Tuesday to give up its nuclear arsenal in the face of UN sanctions had provided a model for confronting Iran's uranium program.

"The Iranians certainly are watching whether or not the world was going to react to what North Korea did," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, referring to Pyongyang's first test of a nuclear weapon on October 9.

"The (UN) Security Council clearly did act, so I think in that sense it was a lesson for Iran in terms of the will of the international community to act," he said.

Diplomats at UN headquarters in New York meanwhile said another meeting of five veto-wielding Security Council members plus Germany to discuss the Iran sanctions resolution was unlikely to take place before Friday at the earliest.

The six are working on a draft resolution drawn up by Britain, France and Germany urging nuclear and missile-related sanctions against Tehran.

Washington has so far refrained from co-sponsoring the draft in a sign it is seeking tougher measures than those proposed by its European partners.

US officials have notably said they want clear guarantees that a nuclear power station being built in Iran by Russia will not give Tehran access to technology or materials that could be used in a weapons program.

Russia and China, both major trading partners of Iran, are for their part believed to be trying to soften the resolution.

Moscow May Back U.N. Sanctions On Iran (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

AP, November 1, 2006

Two senior Russian officials indicated Tuesday that Moscow could back a draft U.N. Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran, in an apparent sign of the Islamic Republic's growing isolation over its nuclear program.

The comments came after months of Russian opposition to sanctions and suggested that Moscow could reluctantly support punishment as a lever of influence over a stubborn Iran. Just last Thursday, the foreign minister said Moscow was opposed to the resolution being drafted by European powers.

On Tuesday, Yuri Volkov, a deputy speaker of the lower house of parliament, said Russia "will apparently have to join a new resolution on Iran proposed by Britain, Germany and France that envisages limited economic sanctions."

And Igor Ivanov, the head of Russia's presidential Security Council, made comments later that also suggested Moscow could support the draft European resolution.

"Resolutions and sanctions are not a goal in themselves. They are just one of the elements," Ivanov said at a news conference. "And if such a resolution is worked out, it will be first of all one of the elements aimed at assisting political negotiations, because only as a result of political negotiations and dialogue can a concrete result be achieved."

Russia and China, both veto-wielding Security Council members with strong commercial ties to Tehran, have consistently been reluctant to support sanctions. But, separately from the Russian comments, China issued muted criticism of Iran on Tuesday over its standoff with the Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0089719

Asked about the Iranian president's declaration that Tehran would oppose any sanctions, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said "the relevant parties should not take any measures that may lead to the escalation of the situation."

China has recently taken a stronger role in nuclear negotiations more generally, and on Tuesday the U.S. and Chinese governments announced jointly that North Korea had agreed to rejoin six-nation nuclear disarmament talks.

Karen Hughes, the top U.S. envoy for public diplomacy, on Tuesday urged Iran to choose the path of negotiations.

"We're working with our international partners to send a message to Iran that the international community is opposed to Iran obtaining nuclear weapons," Hughes told The Associated Press in Dubai.

"Sanctions against Iran are being discussed. There is a path for negotiations and we hope they choose that path," she said.

Volkov, the Russian lawmaker, has played a low-key role in the past and made no statements on global politics, although he is in charge of inter-parliamentary contacts with Iran. Like most members of the Duma, he belongs to the Kremlin-controlled United Russia faction.

It was unclear whether Volkov has any access to Kremlin decision-making, but Ivanov is a former foreign minister amd longtime diplomatic insider whose security advisory body answers to President Vladimir Putin.

"Any decision in the Security Council must be aimed not at punishing Iran but at achieving our goals through political means," Ivanov said. The goal, he said, is to preserve Iran's right to peaceful nuclear energy while ensuring it does not develop nuclear weapons.

Ivanov's comments suggested that Russia — which is wary of angering Iran by appearing to join the West in calls for punishment and has warned that harsh measures could scuttle chances for a resolution of the crisis — could cast support for limited sanctions as a path toward further talks.

"Russia continues to call for a political settlement," he said.

His remarks left plenty of room for wrangling in the Security Council, and may have been intended more as a signal to a stubborn Iran that Russia's opposition to sanctions has its limits than as a telegraph of its plans for a council vote.

Volkov said "the Iranian leadership's refusal to freeze uranium enrichment activities and engage in a constructive dialogue with leading global powers leaves no chance for a quick diplomatic solution of the Iranian nuclear problem."

At the same time, he said Russia would continue efforts to encourage talks between Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "so that Iran isn't driven into a corner." He also repeated Russia's firm opposition to any decisions that could lead to the use of military force against Iran.

Moscow has been frustrated in its efforts to persuade Tehran to halt enrichment — including by offering to enrich uranium on Russian soil for a peaceful Iranian nuclear program. But Russian officials have repeatedly warned that harsh punishment could make Iran even more recalcitrant and scuttle the chances for a negotiated solution to the crisis.

Syria Still Arming Hezbollah, Politician Says (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

Syria has continued to funnel arms to the Shi'ite Hezbollah militia in defiance of international demands, thus undermining hopes for peace and stability in Lebanon, a Lebanese political leader said yesterday.

Walid Jumblatt, longtime leader of the minority Druze community, is the most senior Lebanese politician to visit Washington since Israel's inconclusive monthlong war with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon.

The conflict devastated large areas of the country and scrambled Lebanon's already complicated political landscape.

"As long as the Syria-Lebanon border is not being monitored effectively, the flow of weapons will continue and there will be instability," Mr. Jumblatt said in an address to the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

Israeli forces pummeled Hezbollah positions during the war but failed to deliver a knockout blow to the Islamic militia, which has resisted demands from other Lebanese factions and from the United Nations to disarm.

The complaint from Mr. Jumblatt, a key figure in the anti-Syrian coalition that dominates Lebanon's parliament, came a day after John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said at a Security Council meeting that Syria and Iran -- Hezbollah's two main sponsors -- were "actively trying to destabilize the democratically elected government of Lebanon" by re-arming Hezbollah.

Syria has denied the charge.

Israel complains that the Lebanese government and a beefed-up U.N. peacekeeping force now in southern Lebanon have failed to carry out key parts of the accord that ended the fighting in the summer, including disarming Hezbollah and enforcing an arms embargo.

DOJ_NMG_0089720

Israeli fighter planes yesterday flew at low altitude over parts of the capital, Beirut, and southern Lebanon to monitor what Israeli defense officials say are continuing violations of the arms embargo by Hezbollah.

Mr. Jumblatt, head of Lebanon's Progressive Socialist Party, has been a central figure in Lebanon's sectarian politics for three decades as the leader of the country's Druze community, an offshoot of Islam. He first supported Syria's military presence in Lebanon but broke with Damascus after the death of Syrian President Hafez Assad in 2000.

He was a key player in the anti-Syrian Cedar Revolution that followed the February 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Many blamed Damascus for the attack, and protests forced Syrian troops to withdraw from Lebanon.

Mr. Jumblatt acknowledged yesterday that the image of Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah had soared in the Arab and Muslim world because of the tough resistance his fighters put up against Israel. But Mr. Jumblatt said demands by Hezbollah and its allies inside Lebanon for more seats in a proposed "national unity government" could backfire.

"We have the majority, not Hezbollah," Mr. Jumblatt said. "If they topple the government, there would be chaos and disorder that could lead anywhere.

"If Nasrallah was ordered by the Syrian regime not to agree to national unity, it is a very risky game he is playing."

Israel Fighter Jets Stage Mock Raids (AP)

By Anna Johnson

AP, November 1, 2006

Israel's fighter jets roared over Hezbollah strongholds Tuesday, staging mock raids in its strongest show of force since its war with the guerrilla group ended more than two months ago.

The flyovers, which startled many Lebanese with fresh memories of the war, highlight the unsettled tensions between Israel and its northern neighbor, whose political situation has grown increasingly more uncertain.

The Israeli fighter jets swooped low over south Beirut at least six times in the morning before soaring back into the sky, Lebanese security officials said. The jets could be heard throughout the city, and residents climbed on roofs and balconies to watch.

One woman on her way to work at a clothing store said her hands were shaking after she heard the warplanes because they brought flashbacks of the Israeli airstrikes that pounded her south Beirut neighborhood during the war.

In south Lebanon, officials and witnesses reported Israeli planes staging mock raids over the towns of Nabatiyeh and Tyre. Eight Israeli jets crossed the border and dispersed over southern and central Lebanon, said the officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to give press statements.

The Lebanese army issued a statement saying its gunners fired anti-aircraft artillery at the planes in south Lebanon to try to drive them away.

An Israeli military official said the flights were part of routine reconnaissance activity.

"It was not to send any message. We do this on a regular basis," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of military regulations.

The mock raids came only hours after U.N. envoy Terje Roed-Larsen told the Security Council that the Lebanese government had reported that arms were being smuggled into Lebanon from Syria since the end of the 34-day Israel-Hezbollah war.

The 34-day fighting left more than 1,000 people dead on both sides, according to the U.N. and Israeli and Lebanese officials. Lebanon's Higher Relief Council, a government group, says the vast majority of those were Lebanese civilians. UNICEF also says most of those killed were civilians, and about a third of them were children.

Of the total deaths, 159 were in Israel, including 39 soldiers.

Israel claimed 800 Hezbollah fighters were killed but that figure was not substantiated, with the group only acknowledging 70 of its fighters were killed.

Lebanon and the U.N. have called on Israel to halt military flights over Lebanese territory, calling them a clear violation of the cease-fire.

Geir Pederson, personal representative in Lebanon of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, expressed concern about the overflights that "constitute a breach of Lebanese sovereignty" and of the U.N. resolution that ended the war.

But Israel contends the flights must continue because arms are still smuggled to Hezbollah, the group has armed personnel in south Lebanon, and the two soldiers whose capture by guerrillas sparked the Israeli offensive have not been released, said Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev.

"In the absence of the implementation of these obligations, Israel is forced to continue intelligence flights over Lebanon to monitor these infringements. If there's not a mechanism to prevent illicit arms transfers, we have to monitor arms transfers. If the Hezbollah presence is not removed, there is a need to observe that presence," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0089721

American and European officials have stepped up their demands for Hezbollah to disarm in accordance to the U.N.-brokered cease-fire, but the militant group has repeatedly refused to lay down its arms. The refusal has caused internal struggles as the Lebanese army tries to take control of the south, which has been under Hezbollah's control for decades.

Neither an increased U.N. peacekeeping mission, which currently numbers about 7,300, nor some 15,000 Lebanese troops patrolling a buffer zone in south Lebanon have the mandate or the political will to take Hezbollah's weapons by force.

Tuesday's overflights also came hours before Hezbollah's leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah made a rare televised appearance on the guerrilla group's TV channel Al-Manar in which he said the United States has failed in Iraq and that animosity in the Arab world against Washington should not be blamed on Islamic extremism.

Nasrallah, in his first appearance since speaking at a Sept. 22 "victory" rally in south Beirut, accused the United States of being responsible for continued violence in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said America's plans in the Middle East face "failure, frustration and a state of collapse," and predicted the U.S. would be forced to leave the region "within years, not months."

The U.S. has "no future" in the region, Nasrallah said in a taped interview on Hezbollah's television station Al-Manar. "They will leave the Mideast, Arab and Islamic worlds just as they left Vietnam, and I advise those who are counting on them to draw conclusion from the Vietnam experience."

Blair In Secret Overture To Damascus (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And James Blitz

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister, has launched a secret diplomatic move to prise Syria away from its support for radical Middle East groups and policies.

In an initiative that departs from the US policy of isolating Syria, Mr Blair this week sent Sir Nigel Sheinwald, his most senior foreign policy adviser, to Damascus where he met Bashar al-Assad, the president, and other senior figures in the regime.

Downing Street and the Syrian government confirmed on Tuesday night that Sir Nigel, one of Mr Blair's closest aides, met Mr Assad on Monday.

The UK and Syria have maintained diplomatic relations but Sir Nigel's visit is the most high-level encounter between the UK government and the Assad regime since the Iraq war in 2003. The mission precedes a visit to the region that Mr Blair hopes to make before the year's end.

Downing Street insisted the visit did not mark any change of strategy by the UK towards Syria. The US and the UK continue to believe Mr Assad is backing insurgent groups in Iraq, and meddling in Lebanon and the occupied Palestinian territories – charges Syria denies.

However, Mr Blair – now in the final months of his premiership – wishes to use these "back channel" talks to test whether the Syrian regime is serious about seeking to play a constructive role in Middle East peace negotiations with Israel. Britain would also like to see Syria rethink its close alliance with Iran.

Mr Blair once placed high hopes on the British-educated Mr Assad but the UK has found Syria an unwilling ally in its Middle East goals. Damascus has backed the Hamas leaders who have been accused of obstructing plans for a Palestinian national unity government.

In Beirut, Lebanese officials say Syria is supplying arms to Lebanon's Hizbollah and working to undermine its government.

The initiative puts Britain out of step with current Bush administration thinking, though the US said it had been advised in advance of Mr Sheinwald's visit.

The US pulled its ambassador out of Damascus last year. But a congressional committee headed by James Baker, a former secretary of state, is now looking at US options in Iraq and may recommend renewed contact with Syria over Iraq's future.

Engagement with Syria became fashionable again this summer during the month-long conflict between Israel and Hizbollah. European officials have been arguing for engagement to try to move Damascus away from its alliance with Tehran.

Western relations with Syria reached a new low last year after the assassination of Rafiq Hariri, Lebanon's former prime minister and an opponent of Syria. A United Nations probe is looking at Syria's alleged role in the killing.

International pressure forced Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon and left it isolated, even within the Arab world.

Politicians in Beirut say Damascus will demand the dropping of the UN investigation in return for changing its foreign policies – a price the west may find too high.

The US and UK continue to insist that Syria live up to its obligations under three UN Security Council resolutions concerning Lebanon, a US official said.

"We remain deeply concerned by indications that Syria is seeking to destabilise Lebanon's democratically elected government," the official added.

Israel Defense Minister Eyes Arab Plan (AP-Y)

By Aron Heller

AP, November 1, 2006

Israel's defense minister said Tuesday that a dormant Saudi initiative for Mideast peace could be a "basis for negotiation," indicating a new possibility for talks with the Palestinians after years of stalemate.

The Saudi plan calls for a comprehensive peace between Israel and the Arab world, based on a complete Israeli withdrawal from lands it captured in the 1967 Mideast war — the West Bank, Gaza Strip, east Jerusalem and Golan Heights.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz said he was not endorsing the plan. But he was the most senior Israeli official even to publicly consider it.

"We could see the Saudi initiative as the basis for negotiation. This does not mean that we are adopting the Saudi initiative, but it can serve as a basis," Peretz said at an academic conference at Tel Aviv University.

The Saudi initiative was adopted at an Arab League summit in Beirut, Lebanon, in March 2002. For the first time, it offered Israel normal relations with the entire Arab world in exchange for a complete withdrawal from captured territory.

Israel reacted skeptically at the time, rejecting an addition by Saudi Arabia requiring Israel to recognize the demand to take back Palestinian refugees from the 1948-49 war that followed creation of the Jewish state, as well as their descendants — an estimated 4 million people.

Israel has offered compensation instead, maintaining that demanding a "right of return" is a way of undermining the Jewish character of the state and destroying it from within.

Israel also questioned the meaning of "normal relations" and rejected a total withdrawal from all the territories.

In various unsuccessful rounds of peace talks, Israel has offered an almost complete pullout from the West Bank and Golan Heights, and last year it withdrew unilaterally from the Gaza Strip. However, it maintains that the pre-1967 cease-fire lines are not a border, and it wants to adjust the line to include main West Bank Jewish settlement blocks in Israel.

At the time, Israel asked Saudi Arabia to send an envoy to clarify the proposal, but that did not happen.

In 2003, the Saudi initiative was overtaken by the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, which called for establishment of a Palestinian state in a three-stage process and mentioned the Saudi initiative as part of the basis for the solution.

However, the plan was frozen from the outset when neither side implemented its initial steps. Israel failed to dismantle dozens of unauthorized West Bank settlement outposts, and the Palestinians declined to disarm violent groups.

Peace moves have been stalled since 2000, when the outbreak of Palestinian violence followed a failed summit meeting of Israeli and Palestinian leaders in the United States.

Israel's official position has been that the "road map" is the only plan on the table now, but Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev indicated the Saudi plan could be the basis for talks.

"Israel has never accepted the Saudi initiative but would see positive elements in the initiative, particularly the call for reconciliation and the call for establishing normalized realizations between Israel and her Arab neighbors," Regev told The Associated Press.

Though Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's election platform this year called for a unilateral Israeli pullout from much of the West Bank, he shelved the proposal in the aftermath of the unpopular, inconclusive war with Lebanese Hezbollah guerrillas in the summer.

The addition this week of an ultra-hawkish party to shore up Olmert's governing coalition made a new peace drive unlikely.

In violence Tuesday, Israeli troops shot and killed three Hamas militants in the Gaza Strip as the army pressed ahead with a 4-month-old offensive, Palestinian officials said.

Israel has indicated it would expand its offensive, aiming to stop arms smuggling through tunnels from Egypt to Gaza and rocket fire by Palestinian militants at Israeli towns and villages.

Pause For Peace (NYT)

By Ahmed Yousef

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

Gaza

HERE in Gaza, few dream of peace. For now, most dare only to dream of a lack of war. It is for this reason that Hamas proposes a long-term truce during which the Israeli and Palestinian peoples can try to negotiate a lasting peace.

A truce is referred to in Arabic as a “hudna.” Typically covering 10 years, a hudna is recognized in Islamic jurisprudence as a legitimate and binding contract. A hudna extends beyond the Western concept of a cease-fire and obliges the parties to use the period to seek a permanent, nonviolent resolution to their differences. The Koran finds great merit in such efforts at promoting understanding among different people. Whereas war dehumanizes the enemy and makes it easier to kill, a hudna affords the opportunity to humanize one's opponents and understand their position with the goal of resolving the intertribal or international dispute.

Such a concept — a period of nonwar but only partial resolution of a conflict — is foreign to the West and has been greeted with much suspicion. Many Westerners I speak to wonder how one can stop the violence without ending the conflict.

I would argue, however, that this concept is not as foreign as it might seem. After all, the Irish Republican Army agreed to halt its military struggle to free Northern Ireland from British rule without recognizing British sovereignty. Irish Republicans continue to aspire to a united Ireland free of British rule, but rely upon peaceful methods. Had the I.R.A. been forced to renounce its vision of reuniting Ireland before negotiations could occur, peace would never have prevailed. Why should more be demanded of the Palestinians, particularly when the spirit of our people will never permit it?

When Hamas gives its word to an international agreement, it does so in the name of God and will therefore keep its word. Hamas has honored its previous cease-fires, as Israelis grudgingly note with the oft-heard words, "At least with Hamas they mean what they say."

This offer of hudna is no ruse, as some assert, to strengthen our military machine, to buy time to organize better or to consolidate our hold on the Palestinian Authority. Indeed, faith-based political movements in Algeria, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Malaysia, Morocco, Turkey and Yemen have used hudna-like strategies to avoid expanding conflict. Hamas will conduct itself just as wisely and honorably.

We Palestinians are prepared to enter into a hudna to bring about an immediate end to the occupation and to initiate a period of peaceful coexistence during which both sides would refrain from any form of military aggression or provocation. During this period of calm and negotiation we can address the important issues like the right of return and the release of prisoners. If the negotiations fail to achieve a durable settlement, the next generation of Palestinians and Israelis will have to decide whether or not to renew the hudna and the search for a negotiated peace.

There can be no comprehensive solution of the conflict today, this week, this month, or even this year. A conflict that has festered for so long may, however, be resolved through a decade of peaceful coexistence and negotiations. This is the only sensible alternative to the current situation. A hudna will lead to an end to the occupation and create the space and the calm necessary to resolve all outstanding issues.

Few in Gaza dream. For most of the past six months it's been difficult to even sleep. Yet hope is not dead. And when we dare to hope, this is what we see: a 10-year hudna during which, inshallah (God willing), we will learn again to dream of peace.

US Launches Review Of Stalled Policy On Ending Darfur Violence (AFP)

AFP, November 1, 2006

President George W. Bush announced a review of US policy on the Darfur crisis as Sudan persists in refusing the deployment of UN peacekeepers to halt catastrophic violence in the region.

The United States was a principal backer of a United Nations resolution in August demanding the deployment of some 20,000 UN peacekeepers to Darfur, where at least 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million left homeless during three years of civil war.

But the government of President Omar al-Beshir has rejected the peacekeepers and rebuffed a recent initiative to break the deadlock by Bush's personal envoy for Darfur, Andrew Natsios.

Meeting with Natsios at the White House Tuesday, Bush said the diplomat had delivered a "grim report" about the humanitarian situation in Darfur, where government-armed Arab militia have been blamed for much of the violence against civilians.

"The United States is going to work with the international community to come up with a single plan on how to address this issue and save lives," Bush said.

He provided few details, other than to insist that the plan would include deployment of a "credible and effective international force to go into Darfur to save lives".

"The government of Sudan must understand that we're serious," he said.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution on August 31 calling for the deployment of 20,000 peacekeepers to replace an under-funded African Union (AU) contingent of 7,000 that has failed to end violence which the US has called genocide.

The conflict began in 2003 with rebellion by Darfur's mainly black African population seeking autonomy from the Arab-dominated government in Khartoum.

The government responded by arming Arab militia known as the Janjaweed, who have destroyed hundreds of villages in a scorched-earth policy.

DOJ_NMG_0089724

Beshir's regime has consistently rejected the deployment of UN forces, charging that the plan was part of a US-engineered plot to invade his country and plunder its resources.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said that following up on Natsios's mission to Khartoum, the Bush administration was mulling "what new or different policy proposals we might make" to end the deadlock.

He declined to provide details, but said discussions were going on both within the US administration, and with Washington's international partners, including Arab states with influence in Khartoum.

"What all that does is underscore the fact that we want to try to get something done on this issue," he said. "There's too much suffering going on there."

Westerners' Arrests Put Yemen On Spot (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

The arrests in Yemen of six Westerners said to be members of al Qaeda has highlighted concerns that the region remains a "transmission belt" for Islamic converts looking for a way to join jihadi terrorist groups.

But analysts caution that the facts of the case remain murky and warned that Yemenis had many reasons to try to burnish their counterterrorism credentials by exaggerating the importance of the arrests.

Authorities in Yemen told local reporters over at the weekend that they arrested three Australians, a Dane, a German, a Briton and two other foreigners Oct. 16 and charged them with trying to smuggle weapons to Islamic militias in neighboring Somalia.

"Preliminary investigations indicate that they are members of al Qaeda," an Interior Ministry official said in a statement carried by the state-run news agency, Saba.

A U.S. intelligence official agreed in an interview, saying, "This was a pretty good wrap-up of a group of bad guys."

U.S. and European counterterrorism officials have long been concerned about the possible terrorist recruitment of people with European or Australian nationality. They can travel much more freely than recruits from Middle Eastern nations.

The concern is accentuated in chaotic, failing states such as Yemen, where intelligence gathering and interdiction are more difficult.

Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer told the Australian Parliament on Monday that two of the men were native-born Australians, while the third was a Polish-born immigrant who had become an Australian citizen in the 1980s.

No information was immediately available about the other suspects, but the Yemen Times, citing unidentified sources, reported that the eight were all students at the Al-Iman religious university in the capital Sana'a, headed by Sheik Abd al-Majid al-Zindani.

Al-Zindani has been named a "Specially Designated Global Terrorist" by the U.S. Treasury Department, which said he had "a long history of working with [al Qaeda leader Osama] bin Laden, notably serving as one of his spiritual leaders."

Karin Von Hippel, a former U.N. official and regional analyst, told UPI that there were well-documented arms transfers to Somalia from Yemen.

"It is very plausible that Islamic extremists in Yemen might be trying to get arms" to the Islamic Courts Union, the umbrella group for Islamic militias that have seized control of most of Somalia.

Bernard Haykel, professor of Islamic law and history at New York University and a Yemen analyst, added that Yemen had in the past served as a "transmission belt country," for jihadist recruitment of Westerners, but many come to learn Arabic and study the Koran legitimately.

"The [Yemeni] government has a history of trying to prove they are hunting al Qaeda," he said, however, in reality they have an arrangement with the group. "As long as they don't stage attacks in Yemen, they are left alone."

The U.S. intelligence official said the arrests were appropriate. "This was not for show," the official said.

The Yemeni government was embarrassed in February when 13 al Qaeda militants including the leaders of the attacks on the USS Cole and the French oil tanker Limburg were among 23 inmates who escaped by tunneling out of their prison to a nearby mosque.

Egypt Sends Sadat's Nephew To Prison For Defaming Military (NYT)

By Jano Charbel And Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 31 — Talaat el-Sadat, the nephew of President Anwar el-Sadat and an opposition member of Parliament, was sentenced by a military court on Tuesday to one year in prison on charges that he defamed the military by essentially blaming it for having a hand in his uncle's death.

DOJ_NMG_0089725

The case, while attracting less attention than the trial of a former presidential candidate, Ayman Nour, who is serving a five-year prison term on charges widely viewed as politically motivated, comes as Egyptian authorities have shown less and less tolerance for critical opposition.

With increasing frequency, members of the Muslim Brotherhood, a banned Islamic organization that amounts to the only organized political opposition in Egypt, have been arrested and held without charge under a law intended to fight terrorism.

In Mr. Sadat's case, he was stripped of parliamentary immunity on a national holiday by the speaker of Parliament, Fathi Sorour, a prominent member of the governing National Democratic Party.

The papers stripping Mr. Sadat of his immunity were signed the day after his appearance on a satellite television show, an action the speaker has said was perfectly legal.

On Tuesday, a military judge, Brig. Gen. Abbas Attiya al-Nagdy, sentenced Mr. Sadat to a year in jail after a six-day trial. Mr. Sadat was convicted of defaming the armed forces, of spreading false information and of suggesting that the government never executed President Sadat's assassin, Khaled el-Islambolli, and instead conspired to let him go free.

"Talaat el-Sadat is a victim," said Mohammad Abdel Wahab, one of his defense lawyers who also served on the team that defended Mr. Nour. "He was targeted because he is a popular opposition figure who received a staggering 33,000 votes during the last parliamentary elections."

Government and party officials said the case had nothing to do with politics and was based solely on comments Mr. Sadat made on satellite television in which, among other things, he blamed the military for negligence in his uncle's assassination.

"This guy is a loose cannon; he is a populist and he enjoys being a celebrity," Muhammad Kamal, a member of the upper house of Parliament and a frequent spokesman for the governing party, said in an interview when the trial began. He added, "If someone claimed that Bush was behind Sept. 11, this would be investigated. So what is happening is normal."

Mr. Sadat, the often outlandish and outspoken son of President Sadat's half-brother, Esmat, has long been a harsh critic of the governing party and has a reputation for espousing outrageous conspiracy theories, including charges that his uncle was killed as part of an international plot.

But he also has caused deep embarrassment to powerful figures — from leaders of the governing National Democratic Party, whom he publicly accused of corruption, to the Interior Ministry, which he showed at his trial had arrested the wrong person in connection with the killing of 10 people.

A group of Egyptian human rights groups have criticized the decision to bring a civilian before a closed military court and what they said was a violation of his freedom of speech.

Others have said the decision to prosecute Mr. Sadat — regardless of how outrageous his comments may have been — should be viewed as part of a broad political suppression in the country.

"The message is that no one is immune, not journalists, not judges, not parliamentarians," said Wael el-Ebrashi, editor in chief of Sawt el Umma, a weekly independent newspaper.

Mr. Ebrashi will himself face trial next month for printing a list of judges whom his newspaper accused of helping to rig parliamentary elections last year.

During those elections, government security forces surrounded polling places, beating and shooting would-be voters, in an effort to prevent opposition candidates from winning. Even so, independent candidates affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood won 88 seats out of 454 in Parliament.

Egypt's political elite is in a state of anxiety. The president, Hosni Mubarak, is 78, and while there is no clear successor in sight, it appears the president has begun to hand the reins of state over to his son, Gamal Mubarak. At the same time, regional crises — from the war between Lebanon and Israel to the rise of Iran as a regional power — have further undermined the leadership's credibility on the street, political analysts said.

In that environment, the leadership has taken a harder line with its critics.

The United States at one time talked about Egypt as leading the way toward democratic reform in the Middle East. But with the chaos in the region, and the political uncertainty in Egypt, officials in Egypt said the United States had dropped all pressure to make democratic reforms.

Leaders of the governing party, like the younger Mubarak and Mr. Kamal, have said the party intended to move forward with democratic reforms.

Mr. Sorour, for example, announced Tuesday that Parliament would move forward with a plan to amend the Constitution to ensure that in the next presidential election there will be candidates from more than just the governing party.

However, critics, including those within the party, say the plan for making it easier to get opposition members on the ballot is insufficient, because after years of political atrophy there are no credible or effective opposition parties.

The new law is expected to do nothing to pave the way for independent candidates to get on the ballot, which would mean those affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood would be shut out.

DOJ_NMG_0089726

Mr. Sadat was taken into custody straight from the courtroom in northeastern Cairo.
He is not allowed to appeal and his only recourse would be to ask President Mubarak for a pardon.
He was also fined about $35.

Security Council Seat Tied To Aid (WP)

By Colum Lynch
The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- Republican and Democratic administrations have insisted for decades they do not engage in the grubby vote-buying practices that are common in elections for key U.N. posts.

Yet poor countries that serve on the influential Security Council typically receive substantially more U.S. aid dollars and find it easier to obtain loans or grants from financial institutions that are strongly influenced by the United States and other economic powerhouses, according to recent academic studies.

Officials from the United States and several international agencies questioned the findings, insisting that they direct assistance on the basis of need, not in pursuit of votes on the Security Council. They said there are scores of factors that drive the distribution of loans and aid budgets that the research did not consider.

Still, the findings underscore the importance the United States places on cultivating even the weakest members of the Security Council, the lone international body with the power to impose universally binding economic sanctions and grant legitimacy to military adventures. They also suggest a possible price tag.

A two-year seat on the Security Council, for instance, can generate a 59 percent spike in U.S. assistance, according to a study by two Harvard University scholars that tracked U.S. economic and military assistance from 1946 to 2001. In times of crisis, U.S. aid to some member countries has increased by as much as 170 percent. Those aid levels tend to recede after the country leaves the 15-nation council.

United Nations aid agencies such as the Children's Fund, which has always been headed by a U.S. national, have also directed extra money toward disadvantaged children from countries that serve on the U.N. council, the study shows. In an important year, defined as a period that has attracted intensive news coverage, council members experienced a 63 percent increase in overseas development assistance, the study found.

"On average the typical developing country serving on the council can anticipate an additional $16 million from the United States and $1 million from the U.N.," wrote Harvard economics graduate student Ilyana Kuziemko and Eric Werker, an assistant professor at the Harvard Business School. "During important years, these numbers rise to $45 million from the U.S. and $8 million from the U.N."

Kuziemko said the study did not uncover "smoking gun" proof that the United States has used aid to buy influence. But she said the investigation uncovered a statistical pattern "that is very consistent with vote buying."

A UNICEF spokesman, Geoffrey Keele, challenged the report's conclusions. He said the U.N. agency's "funding is always based on very basic indicators of children's health."

Keele presented a chart showing that funding for some countries on the council increased while that for others declined. He said assistance to Congo -- which received more than a doubling of U.S. contributions through UNICEF -- increased because a 2003 peace accord provided greater international access to a country already desperately needing help.

A review by The Washington Post of the U.S. Agency for International Development's "greenbook," which compiles figures on U.S. economic and military assistance, showed a more nuanced picture in the year leading up to the U.S.- led invasion of Iraq in March 2003, a period of intense diplomatic activity in the Security Council.

U.S. economic aid to Angola nearly doubled from $81.6 million in 2001 to $160.5 million in 2003, before dropping by more than $40 million in 2004. Assistance to Cameroon more than tripled, from $5 million in 2001 to $16 million in 2003, before falling by about $3.5 million in 2004.

But U.S. aid to Guinea dropped by $10 million during the same period. Bulgaria, a close U.S. ally in Eastern Europe, got less U.S. economic assistance but registered a doubling of U.S. military aid in 2003.

The U.S. mission to the United Nations and USAID declined requests to comment on the findings. Former U.S. officials insist, though, that the U.S. delegation has sought to steer clear of vote buying.

"I'm not aware of the United States actively molding its aid relationship based on upcoming votes," said Peter Burleigh, the acting U.S. ambassador to the United Nations in 1998 and 1999.

Burleigh said countries seeking membership on the council will often increase their own aid contributions "as a kind of sweetener" for potential supporters. During the 1990s, Iraq and Kuwait frequently stepped up aid or trade pledges on the eve of critical votes in the Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0089727

"Usually we give aid because there is need rather than because in fact we want to try to buy somebody," said Thomas R. Pickering, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations during the Persian Gulf War. But he said that politics can sometimes creep into U.S. calculations on aid and that membership on the council may tip the balance in favor of a country under consideration for aid.

Pickering recalled then-Secretary of State James A. Baker III telling Yemen, after it voted against a U.S.-backed resolution authorizing the 1991 war, that "it was the most expensive vote they'd ever cast, when in fact their assistance disappeared."

The largesse has extended to U.N. financial institutions, primarily the International Monetary Fund, where the United States holds sway. Romania, Zimbabwe, Ecuador and other countries that frequently backed resolutions sanctioning Iraq for its 1990 invasion of Kuwait received sizable IMF loans, according to a study by a political scientist and two scholars at a Swiss university.

Tanzania and Gabon, meanwhile, did not receive an IMF loan in the first 15 and 18 years, respectively, after their independence. That changed after they announced their bid to join the Security Council in the 1970s, a Chicago University study shows.

Tanzania, which launched its campaign for a council seat in 1974, received more than $10 million in loans in 1974 and 1975. The East African government voted alongside the IMF's most influential members -- the United States, Japan, Britain and France -- on every resolution in 1975.

The relationship grew rockier after Tanzania showed a streak of independence in its voting record in 1976, when it supported resolutions condemning aggression against Angola by U.S. Cold War ally South Africa and calling for Indonesia to withdraw from East Timor. The IMF subsequently declined to disburse more than $10 million in additional funds for Tanzania.

IMF spokesman William Murry said that "the evidence is anecdotal and circumstantial," and that the authors did not adequately consider other possible explanations for the loans.

For instance, he said, Tanzanian loans were driven in large part by the oil crisis after the Arab oil embargo. He said the IMF's support of Romania owed more to the fact the former East Bloc country was looking to the West for help after the Soviet Union's collapse.

China Acts To Reduce High Rate Of Executions (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 31 — Responding to domestic and international criticism of its extensive use of capital punishment, China adopted new rules on Tuesday requiring review of all death sentences by the Supreme People's Court, state news media reported.

The move, which goes into effect on Jan. 1, restores a power that was stripped from the Supreme Court in 1983 and given to provincial courts as part of a major crackdown on crime. The authorities are facing mounting criticism from human rights groups and Chinese legal scholars for what they say is the widespread and arbitrary use of the death penalty.

China executes more people every year than all other nations combined, by some Chinese estimates, up to 10,000 a year. Chinese courts have been embarrassed in recent years by a number of executions of people who were later proved innocent.

China's legislature, the National People's Congress, approved the amendment to the law, which "is believed to be the most important reform of capital punishment in China in more than two decades," the official New China News Agency said in a brief report.

The state news media have estimated that the number of executions could drop by as much as 30 percent under the new system, though they have not said how they arrived at that figure.

Human rights groups welcomed the change, saying it was likely to lead to fewer executions, but they urged the authorities to take further action. "I think this is a positive step, but it falls well short of what is needed," said Nicholas Bequelin, a researcher for Human Rights Watch who is based in Hong Kong.

Chinese political leaders strongly defend capital punishment as an essential tool to fight crime and preserve social order in a country of 1.3 billion that is undergoing wrenching economic and social changes. The authorities also argue that the death penalty is an important deterrent to official corruption, which has emerged as a major threat to the reputation of the governing Communist Party.

However, legal experts say that as living standards rise and China becomes an important international power, the country's senior leadership is uncomfortable that the death penalty is so readily applied.

They say the reform can also be seen as part of President Hu Jintao's commitment to "build a harmonious society," which covers a range of social concerns, including pollution, growing inequality and access to education and health care. The public has long chafed under a legal system that is widely perceived as favoring the wealthy and politically connected.

DOJ_NMG_0089728

China does not disclose the number of executions it carries out under the criminal code, where almost 70 offenses carry the death penalty.

Citing publicly available reports, Amnesty International estimates that at least 1,770 people were executed in 2005 — more than 80 percent of the world's total — and 3,900 were sentenced to death. In 2004, Amnesty said, 3,400 were executed in China out of 3,797 it documented in the world that year.

Local courts had been given the power to impose the death penalty by Deng Xiaoping, who was angry about a wave of crime and corruption that threatened his economic reform program, which was still in its infancy. From the early 1980s until now, they have operated with virtually no oversight, a situation that has led to the widespread and, legal experts say, indiscriminate use of capital punishment.

In a report on Sept. 21, Amnesty said shortcomings in the legal system for people sentenced to death included a lack of prompt access to lawyers, the absence of the presumption of innocence, political interference in the courts and the use of evidence obtained by torture.

"No one who is sentenced to death in China receives a fair trial in line with international human rights standards," Amnesty said in the report.

The Chinese authorities have already recruited 200 judges for the top court and opened new courtrooms to handle the extra work arising from the change, according to the Chinese news reports.

Some Chinese legal scholars say lower courts will now have to be more careful in imposing the death penalty, handing down more long prison terms instead to avoid the scrutiny of the high court.

Human rights groups and supporters of legal change in China are now urging the government to introduce more sweeping changes, including the establishment of an independent judiciary.

"So far, the leadership is not willing to take on real reform," Mr. Bequelin said.

P. W. Botha, Defender Of Apartheid, Is Dead (NYT)

By Joseph R. Gregory

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

P. W. Botha, the South African leader who struggled vainly to preserve apartheid rule in a tide of domestic racial violence and global condemnation, died yesterday at his home in South Africa. He was 90.

His death was reported by The South African Press Association in Cape Town, quoting the security staff at Mr. Botha's home on the southern Cape coast.

Mr. Botha was a combative, irascible son of a well-to-do Afrikaner farm family who dropped out of college to work for the right-wing National Party, then rose through the ranks of South Africa's political establishment, gaining a reputation as the "Old Crocodile" for his ability to charm, outwit and crush his opponents.

In 1978, Mr. Botha became prime minister and proceeded to engineer the creation of a new Constitution, one that held out the promise of limited reform of apartheid policies. When the Constitution came into effect in 1984, Mr. Botha became president. "We must adapt or die," Mr. Botha told his constituents after becoming prime minister.

But the Constitution only roiled the battle over race. Though it allowed Asians and people of mixed race to be represented in a white-controlled Parliament, it continued to exclude the nation's black majority. Some apartheid laws, like a prohibition on mixed marriages and a requirement that blacks carry special passes, were relaxed. But the measures only fueled the anger of apartheid's opponents. One opposition leader, Frederik van Zyl Slabbert, said Mr. Botha's reforms were the political equivalent of rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic.

Holding out the promise that apartheid would eventually be dismantled, he opened negotiations with Nelson Mandela, the imprisoned leader of the African National Congress. The talks went nowhere, and Mr. Mandela remained confined.

At the same time, Mr. Botha, who first achieved national prominence as secretary of defense, gave the police and military unprecedented power. His government repressed dissent, encouraged rivalries among Zulu, Xhosa and other tribes and ethnic groups, and tried to destabilize neighboring countries opposed to the system of white rule.

Mr. Botha used the climate of the cold war to justify his actions. He portrayed a growing Marxist threat in southern Africa and warned that Communists had infiltrated the anti-apartheid movement at home. South Africa, he said, was engaged in a "total war" and must develop a "total strategy" to fight the battle.

As opposition to apartheid spread, Mr. Botha's room to maneuver shrank. "He was caught in a bind between wanting to show the international community that he was not inflexible, and not wishing to appear weak within his own country," the journalist Allister Sparks wrote in his 1995 account of the end of apartheid, "Tomorrow Is Another Country: The Inside Story of South Africa's Road to Change."

DOJ_NMG_0089729

Yet for a while Mr. Botha's methods seemed to belie Alexis de Toqueville's dictum that "the most perilous moment for bad government is when it seeks to mend its ways." Mr. Botha was re-elected in 1987. Two years later, as opposition to his intransigent style grew within his own party, the president suffered a stroke and resigned. He was succeeded by F. W. de Klerk, who legalized opposition parties, freed Mr. Mandela and other political prisoners, and made the agreements that eventually brought apartheid down.

Pieter Willem Botha was born on Jan. 12, 1916, in the Orange Free State to a Afrikaner farm family with deep roots in southern Africa's "White Tribe" — descendants of mainly Dutch settlers who had been living on the continent's southern tip for more than three centuries.

Beleaguered, stubborn and insular, they saw themselves as heirs to a promised land watered with the blood of their ancestors in wars against Zulu, Ndebele and other tribes.

The Afrikaners and the British, with their imperial aims, were also old enemies, rivals for land, diamonds and gold. Their enmity culminated in the Boer War of 1899-1901, which ended in a British victory and the eventual consolidation of the country under the empire. Mr. Botha's father fought the British, who burned his mother's family farm. She and her family fled but were eventually captured and interned. Their experiences forged their son's attitudes. Raised in the traditions of the Bible and the gun, he learned to ride and shoot and to embrace the embattled but beneficent self-image of the Afrikaner.

"I grew up on a farm where I came to know black people very well," Mr. Botha told Joseph Lelyveld of The New York Times in an interview in Mr. Lelyveld's 1985 book "Move Your Shadow: South Africa, Black and White." "I played with them, I worked with them. I was taught by my father to be strict with them, but just."

As World War II approached, tensions mounted among those who believed that South Africa should side with Britain, those who advocated neutrality and those who sympathized with the Nazis. Mr. Botha sided with the last, joining the right-wing Afrikaner nationalists in the Ossewabrandwag, or Ox Wagon Fire Guard, which was closely related to Daniel F. Malan's Reunited National Party. A paramilitary group within the Guard, modeled after the Nazi Brownshirts, agitated against the pro-Allied government of Jan Christian Smuts.

But Mr. Botha, who in 1935 had left the University of the Orange Free State to become an organizer for the Nationalists, did not like the Guard's "emphasis on national socialism instead of Christian nationalism," a South African biographer, Brian Pottinger, wrote in 1988 in "The Imperial Presidency: P. W. Botha, the First 10 Years." "With some courage and a fine nose for the prevailing wind," Mr. Pottinger wrote, Mr. Botha publicly condemned the Ossewabrandwag, charging it with "interference" in national politics.

By 1944, with Allied victory looming in Europe, the Guard had become an embarrassment to Mr. Malan, and he banned National Party members from associating with it.

A year earlier, Mr. Botha married Anna Elizabeth Rossouw, who went by the name Elise and who died in 1977. They had two sons, Rossouw and Pieter Willem, and three daughters, Elanza, Amelia and Rozanne. He married Barbara Robertson in 1998.

In the postwar years, economic and social uncertainty eroded the popular base of the Smuts government, which had advocated a comparatively liberal approach toward race relations. In the 1948 general election, Mr. Malan's Nationalists, campaigning on a platform of white supremacy and racial segregation, were swept to power. Mr. Botha, who had become secretary of the party's National Youth League in 1946, won a seat in Parliament.

Over the next six years under Mr. Malan's leadership, the foundations of the apartheid state were laid. The Nationalists enforced segregation on almost all aspects of South African life. They passed laws prohibiting mixed marriages and extramarital sex between races and regulated almost all other social relations. Freedom of movement was limited: most blacks were required to carry passbooks. And "independent" homelands, or tribe-based states, were created to make the various African ethnic groups easier to control.

Throughout the 1950s there were protests and other forms of passive resistance. In 1960, about 70 protesters were killed and nearly 200 wounded when the police opened fire on a demonstration in Sharpeville, near Johannesburg. The climate changed after that.

Within the African National Congress, founded in 1912 to advance the cause of blacks, the leadership diverged, with men like Nelson Mandela advocating violent opposition to the racist state. By 1970, many anti-apartheid leaders, including Mr. Mandela, were either in jail or living in exile.

Meanwhile, Mr. Botha rose through the government ranks. In 1961, he became the minister of colored affairs; in 1966, minister of defense. His rise coincided with the country's deepening political isolation. In 1961, South Africa left the Commonwealth of Nations, as other members strongly criticized apartheid policies. As the country's neighbors achieved independence from colonial rule in the 1960s and '70s, many cut off diplomatic, cultural and commercial ties with South Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0089730

In 1974, the United Nations took away South Africa's seat in the General Assembly. Three years later, it imposed a weapons embargo. In the West, particularly in the United States, debate over imposing trade sanctions on South Africa reached a fever pitch.

But the disciples of apartheid hung tough. Huge reserves of gold and diamonds fueled the Afrikaners' ability to circumvent economic embargoes and political sanctions. As defense minister, Mr. Botha increased military spending to 20 percent of the budget, conducted a clandestine weapons trade with Israel and other states and pushed for the development of nuclear weapons.

In the early 1980s, Mr. Botha's government carried out military strikes on forces of the African National Congress and other insurgent groups in neighboring countries where they had taken sanctuary. Air and ground forces struck at targets in Angola, and South African commandos conducted raids in Botswana, Lesotho, Mozambique, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

South African forces also equipped and trained rebel movements against the left-leaning governments that had taken power in the former Portuguese colonies of Angola and Mozambique. Moreover, under the direction of the State Security Council, created in 1972, Mr. Botha's government carried out a program to murder anti-apartheid activists.

Racial violence and political protests continued to rise. Increasing numbers of white South Africans joined anti-apartheid demonstrations. Although Mr. Botha had come to power with the pledge to uphold apartheid as well as improve race relations, the two goals were mutually exclusive. Despite a seeming willingness to relax some apartheid laws, he remained adamant in his refusal to grant blacks political power.

The situation deteriorated. Police stations and other government installations were attacked. In 1985, the government announced an indefinite state of emergency. In 1986, the Anglican anti-apartheid campaigner Archbishop Desmond Tutu addressed the United Nations and urged further sanctions against South Africa.

Mr. Botha grew defiant. "We are not a nation of jellyfish," he declared in a party speech in 1986. An aide, Hendrik Jacobus Coetsee, recalled: "The Old Crocodile was obsessed with looking tough and in control. He never wanted to show any sign of weakness."

But even within the Botha government, pressure was growing for negotiations with the African National Congress. Clandestine overtures were made to Mr. Mandela, who had been in prison since 1963. The Botha government, hoping to appear reasonable to the world, was looking for a way to free Mr. Mandela without appearing weak to its own Afrikaner constituency.

In March 1989, Mr. Mandela offered to negotiate a political settlement, reversing the Congress's commitment to overthrowing the white government by force. Mr. Botha, who had had a stroke that January, replied that the two men should meet. They did so on July 5, 1989. In the end, the encounter turned out to be little more than a courtesy call. "Yet, in some subtle way a line had been crossed," Mr. Sparks wrote. "After that there was no stopping the process. It was just a matter of time and the man."

Mr. Botha's days in office were numbered. Increasingly ill-tempered and authoritarian, he remained reluctant to move on with reform. In February 1989, a month after his stroke, for reasons that are unclear, he had renounced his position as National Party leader while keeping the presidency. The move left him open to younger rivals. That August, at a cabinet meeting, his successor as party leader, Mr. de Klerk, followed by other ministers, suggested that he step down. That night, in an angry, rambling broadcast, the president announced that he would resign.

Under the new government, led by Mr. de Klerk, apartheid unraveled. In 1990, Mr. Mandela was freed after 27 years in prison and the African National Congress became a legal political party. In April 1994, the republic's first multiracial election was held, the Congress won an overwhelming victory and Mr. Mandela became president. In May 1996, a new national Constitution was adopted.

Apartheid was finished. In the late 1990's, the brutal methods that had been used to prolong its existence were exposed during hearings of South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Actions by the country's security forces and police during Mr. Botha's years in power had killed 4,000 people; as many as 50,000 others were held without trial.

The aging Mr. Botha derided the commission as a witch hunt. After failing to attend a hearing in Cape Town on Dec. 19, 1997, he was found guilty of contempt of the law, fined and sentenced to a suspended 12-month prison term. The conviction was overturned on appeal, and the Old Crocodile remained as intransigent as ever.

"I have nothing to apologize for," he said. ''I will never ask for amnesty. Not now, not tomorrow, not after tomorrow."

P.W. Botha; President Of Apartheid-Era South Africa (WP)

By Adam Bernstein

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089731

P.W. Botha, 90, the unapologetic leader of apartheid-era South Africa who led his country into deepening political crisis and racial violence as head of state from 1978 to 1989, died Oct. 31 at his home in Wilderness, a southern coastal town. No cause of death was reported.

"Peevee" Botha was the bald, bespectacled mandarin of the ultra-right Nationalist Party. His trademark was a finger-wagging belligerence that earned him the nickname the "Groot Krokodil," or great crocodile, in Afrikaans, the Dutch language that was his native tongue.

He held a variety of portfolios before becoming defense minister in 1966. During the next decade, he engineered massive increases in the military budget to minimize the effects of the international arms embargo against the apartheid government.

He also saw the militarization of his country as a way to safeguard South Africa from foreign invasion and internal subversion. To international derision, he undertook incursions into Angola and South West Africa (later renamed Namibia) to end leftist guerrilla uprisings and what he called the "forces of chaos, communism and socialism."

As prime minister and then state president, he veered wildly between upholding and reforming apartheid, the system of racial segregation that his party initiated after coming to power in 1948. He understood its inevitable decline amid uncontrollable protests but was unwilling to appear weak to his followers.

Years after he left office and a new, black-led leadership emerged, Mr. Botha remained defiant during investigations into his regime's hard-line racial policies that led to killings, tortures and disappearances. On a technicality, he successfully evaded testifying before South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission, formed to probe apartheid-era crimes.

"I did not authorize murders," he said to reporters at the time. "I will not ask forgiveness for fighting the Marxist revolutionary onslaught."

Pieter Willem Botha was born Jan. 12, 1916, at his family's farm in the Paul Roux district of the Orange Free State. The area was deeply conservative and populated largely by Afrikaners, the white descendants of 17th-century settlers who were mostly Dutch.

In his teens, Mr. Botha became a member of the National Party, then a minority political group. During the Depression, he abandoned his law school studies at the University of the Orange Free State and began his mentorship under the Nationalist leader D.F. Malan. Mr. Botha was a political organizer, a job that sometimes required thuggery and other forms of intimidation.

During World War II, he helped form the Cape branch of the Ossewabrandwag, or Ox-Wagon Fire Guard, a pro-Nazi paramilitary group that opposed his country's support for the British and other Allied powers. His involvement ended when he was threatened with internment.

In 1948, his party won the general election in a surge of Afrikaner nationalism, and Mr. Botha was elected to the lower house of Parliament.

During his first decade in office, he became his party's chief secretary. Under prime minister H.F. Verwoerd, he was minister of colored affairs; minister of community development and housing; and minister of public works.

In this period, he sometimes fought against the most outrageously racist voices in his party on social and land issues. As defense minister, he championed a liberalization of the military that brought women and those of mixed race into fighting units.

Elected prime minister in 1978, he advocated a program of "adapt or die" that surprised many white South Africans for its reformist ring. This approach was partly because of the moderating influences of a strong political challenger during the election. However, to many blacks, Mr. Botha's efforts appeared cosmetic, and many in his white base charged him with surrendering needlessly.

Radical elements within his party abandoned him in 1982 to form another political party. Soon after, Mr. Botha helped craft a new national constitution that bestowed greater authority to himself by changing his title to state president. During the next few years, he repealed some restrictive laws, including a ban on interracial marriage and a passport system that prevented blacks from living freely away from their designated townships.

He allowed participation by Asians and those of mixed race in Parliament and the national cabinet, but blacks were still excluded from government. A goodwill tour of Europe in 1984 had little effect of changing the country's pariah status, although some Western governments and businesses maintained economic ties. He also eased his diplomatic relations with neighboring countries, nearly all of which were under black rule after having gained independence years earlier.

As rioting continued, he declared a state of emergency in 1986, curbing press freedoms and arresting black political leaders.

After a stroke in 1989, Mr. Botha resisted calls within his own party to resign. "I am not a sulking old man," he said.

In a matter of months, he arranged a meeting at his official Cape Town home with Nelson Mandela, a leader with the banned African National Congress who was serving a long prison sentence.

Mandela later wrote in a memoir that Mr. Botha broke all expectations of the "old-fashioned, stiff-necked, stubborn Afrikaner who did not so much discuss matters with black leaders as dictate to them." He said the president was amicable and smiling and "completely disarmed me," although he declined to agree to the unconditional release of Mandela and other political prisoners.

Within months, Mr. Botha resigned from the presidency and his party. Mandela was released from prison in 1990 and worked with Mr. Botha's successor, F.W. de Klerk, to hold fair elections. In 1994, Mandela became the first black president of South Africa.

During the new era, Mr. Botha was not allowed to retire quietly. Anglican Archbishop and Nobel laureate Desmond Tutu, who headed the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, personally asked Mr. Botha to testify about allegations of bombing campaigns against black rights groups during his presidency.

Mr. Botha declined to recognize the commission's authority to compel him to testify. Instead, he gave the commission 1,700 pages of answers to their questions.

This led to a court's finding him guilty of contempt and sentencing him to either a year in jail or a fine of $1,600. He avoided the penalty when a higher court said the commission's legal mandate to exist was due to expire before he was called to testify.

At the time, Mr. Botha told reporters he was more worried about the lawlessness he saw around him under the new government. "I'm still concerned about the onslaught," he said. "What I prophesied came true."

He wrote an autobiography, "Voice in the Wilderness."

His first wife, Elize Rossouw, whom he married in 1943, died in 1997. The next year, he married Barbara Robertson, a legal secretary 25 years his junior. She survives him, along with five children from his first marriage.

Former S African President PW Botha Dies (FT)

By Victor Mallet

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

Pieter Willem Botha, the former South African president who died at the age of 90, was a godfearing Afrikaner nationalist who saw the failings of apartheid and reformed the system but could not bring himself to abolish it completely. That task fell to his successor F.W. de Klerk, who earned Botha's scorn by negotiating the transfer of power from the white minority to the African National Congress.

Universally known as “PW” from his initials, Botha was a career politician in the National party which ran South Africa from 1948 until the first, all-race election in 1994. Although he was a hardliner by instinct, he dimly sensed that he was presiding over the final phase of white rule and famously told whites after he became prime minister in 1978 to “adapt or die”.

Yet the curmudgeonly Botha, who earned the nickname “Die Groot Krokodil” (the great crocodile) and had a habit of wagging his finger menacingly at his critics, could never reconcile himself to the inevitable. He resented the liberals and left-wingers in South Africa and abroad who had helped destroy apartheid. He never apologised for the torture, the killings and the poverty inflicted on South Africans and on the inhabitants of neighbouring states by his regime.

“We are a small country, but I am not going to be buggered about,” he told Herman Nickel, the US ambassador, in 1986. “I'd rather fight.” Even in retirement in 1998, Botha refused to testify before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which was investigating the crimes committed by both sides during the apartheid era. He called it a “circus” and a “witch-hunt” against Afrikaners.

He was born on January 12, 1916 on a farm in what was then the Afrikaner stronghold of the Orange Free State, but spent most of his political life in the Cape. In the years before the National party's 1948 election victory (when he began his 36-year stint as MP for the George constituency), he was a successful party organiser with a reputation for breaking up meetings of Jan Smuts's United party with thuggery and heckling.

Nothing in his early years suggested he would become a reformer. He briefly joined the right-wing Ossewabrandwag, which rejected support for Britain in the fight against Nazi Germany in the second world war.

As defence minister for 14 years from 1966, as prime minister from 1978 to 1984 (for a while he held both posts), and then in the newly created post of executive state president from 1984 until he was removed after suffering a stroke in 1989, he favoured military solutions to South Africa's foreign and domestic political problems.

During the cold war, Botha subscribed to the view that his government faced a “total onslaught” from Communist guerrillas and their allies, and must fight them with a “total strategy”. He presided over a 20-fold increase in the country's defence budget, nurtured Armscor, a home-grown military equipment group which had some success in bypassing economic sanctions, and oversaw an invasion of Angola in 1975. He turned the State Security Council, which had been an advisory body, into a powerful and secretive inner cabinet.

But it would wrong to portray him, as his enemies often did, as no more than a tyrannical right-winger. For Botha undermined the very foundations of apartheid. He legalised the black trade unions that were to become a motor of political change; he abolished the Mixed Marriages Act outlawing inter-racial weddings; he negotiated South Africa's withdrawal from southern Angola and Namibia, paving the way for Namibian independence; he repealed the “pass laws” preventing blacks from entering “white” urban areas; he opened secret talks with the jailed ANC leader Nelson Mandela; and he gave coloureds (people of mixed race) and Indians the vote.

It was this half-hearted concession to the rights of other races in the mid-1980s that accelerated the end of white rule. Although Botha survived a split in his National party over the new constitution and its tricameral parliament (the breakaway right-wing Conservative party was formed in 1982), the still unenfranchised black majority took to the streets in a violent uprising that ultimately destroyed apartheid.

Botha never understood the forces that he had unleashed. Thousands of South Africans were subsequently killed in riots by troops and police, or in clashes between rival political groups. Some victims accused of being traitors or informers were burnt alive in motor-tyre “necklaces” by the young revolutionary “comrades” who paid allegiance to the United Democratic Front, a sort of internal wing of the ANC created out of a common hatred of the new constitution.

The government imposed a partial state of emergency in 1985 and a full one the following year, thinking it could crush the uprising. Even when he accepted the idea of political negotiations, Botha deluded himself that he could strike a deal with “moderate” blacks who would demand something less than full political rights. Likewise, he thought he could divide the nationalists from the Communists in the ANC (many ANC members were both) and assumed that he could eventually release Mandela to prevent him dying in jail a martyr without seeing him become president.

He was wrong on all counts. The defining moment of Botha's presidency was when he made the famous “Rubicon” speech in August 1985. Pik Botha, his foreign minister (and no relation), raised international expectations to a fever pitch that P.W. Botha would “cross the Rubicon” by outlining fundamental reforms and promising to free Mandela.

P.W. Botha did make significant concessions, but, obstinate as ever, he refused to deliver the speech prepared for him and spoke to the waiting world in a hectoring tone and in coded political phrases that only South Africans could understand. Foreign opinion was horrified. The rand plunged and South Africa was obliged to declare a moratorium on repayments of its foreign debt. From that day on, it was clear that Botha would not be the man to lead South Africa into the post-apartheid era.

He was twice married, first, in 1943, to Anna Elizabeth Rossouw, with whom he had two sons and three daughters. She died in 1997. The following year at the age of 82 he married Barbara Robertson, a secretary 25 years his junior.

Former South Africa President Dies At 90 (AP)

By Clare Nullis

AP, November 1, 2006

P.W. Botha, the apartheid-era president who led South Africa through its worst racial violence and deepest international isolation, died Tuesday. He was 90.

Botha died at his home on the southern Cape coast at 8 p.m., according to the South African Press Association. "Botha died at home, peacefully," Capt. Frikkie Lucas was quoted as saying.

The African National Congress issued a statement expressing condolences and wishing his family "strength and comfort at this difficult time."

Nicknamed the "Old Crocodile" for his feared temper and sometimes ruthless manner, Botha served as head of the white racist government from 1978 to 1989.

Throughout his leadership he resisted mounting pressure to free South Africa's most famous political prisoner, Nelson Mandela. Mandela was released by Botha's successor, F.W. de Klerk in 1990.

Botha liked to depict himself as the first South African leader to pursue race reform, but he tenaciously defended the framework of apartheid, sharply restricting the activities of black political organizations and detaining more than 30,000 people.

Through a series of liberalizing moves, Botha sought support among the Asian and mixed-race communities by creating separate parliamentary chambers. He lifted restrictions on interracial sex and marriage. He met with Mandela during his last year as president.

But after each step forward, there was a backlash, resulting in the 1986 state of emergency declaration and the worst reprisals of more than four decades of apartheid.

Botha's intransigence on releasing Mandela led the anti-apartheid Johannesburg Daily, Business Day, to write: "The government is now the prisoner of its prisoner; it cannot escape his embrace."

Within a year after Botha stepped down, de Klerk released Mandela after 27 years in prison and put South Africa on the road to its first all-race elections in 1994, when Mandela became president.

In December 1997, Botha stubbornly resisted appearing before a panel investigating apartheid-era crimes. He risked criminal penalties by repeatedly defying subpoenas from the Truth and Reconciliation Commission to testify about the State Security Council that he headed.

DOJ_NMG_0089734

The council was believed to have sanctioned the killing and torture of anti-apartheid activists, and the panel wanted to know what Botha's involvement was.

Born Jan. 12, 1916, the son of a farmer in the rural Orange Free State province, Botha never served in the military or graduated from college. He quit university in 1935 to become a National Party organizer.

During World War II, Botha joined the Ossewabrandwag (Ox Wagon Fire Guard), a group that was sympathetic to the Nazis and opposed South Africa's participation on the Allied side.

Botha won election to Parliament in 1948, the year the National Party came to power and began codifying apartheid legislation. He joined the Cabinet in 1961 and became defense minister in 1966.

As head of the white-minority government in 1978, Botha repeatedly stressed the paramount importance of national security. He charged that the anti-apartheid struggle was a "total onslaught" on South Africa instigated by communist forces.

During a series of gradual race reforms, he told white South Africans they must "adapt or die." A new constitution in 1983 gave Asians and mixed-race people a limited voice in government, but continued to exclude blacks.

The new law also drastically increased Botha's powers, changing his title from prime minister to president. He declared a national emergency in 1986 after widespread violence erupted in black areas, where anger focused on the new constitution.

State security forces brutally quelled the opposition, and one of his former lieutenants — police minister Adriaan Vlok — told the Truth Commission that Botha had personally congratulated Vlok for successfully bombing a building thought to harbor anti-apartheid activists and weapons.

But in documents submitted to the panel, Botha denied knowledge of the killings, torture and bombings.

Botha's reprisals against the black majority drew international economic sanctions against South Africa during the 1980s that contributed to apartheid's fall.

In July 1989, Mandela went from prison to Botha's official residence for a conversation, which increased speculation that Botha would free Mandela.

Mandela recalled going into the meeting thinking he was seeing "the very model of the old-fashioned, stiff-necked, stubborn Afrikaner who did not so much discuss matters with black leaders as dictate to them."

He found Botha holding out his hand and smiling broadly "and in fact, from that very first moment, he completely disarmed me," Mandela wrote in his autobiography.

Mandela said the only tense moment was when he asked Botha to release all political prisoners — including himself — unconditionally.

"Mr. Botha said that he was afraid he could not do that," Mandela wrote.

The meeting was one of Botha's last acts before he was ousted as National Party leader by de Klerk in September 1989.

Botha refused to attend a farewell banquet held in his honor by the party he had served for 54 years. After 1990, he quit the National Party.

Botha's foremost loyalties were to his fellow Afrikaners, yet his moves to extend limited political power to nonwhites prompted a mass defection of hard-line segregationists from the National Party in 1982.

Beeld, an Afrikaans-language daily that supported Botha for many years, said, "The last image that will linger ... is that of a blind Samson who with his last strength tried to overturn the pillars of his party on himself and his own companions."

Migrants' Money Is Imperfect Cure For Poor Nations (WSJ)

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

CIUDAD BARRIOS, El Salvador -- This lively mountain town survives on money sent from its sons and daughters living in the U.S. On days payments arrive, lines at the local credit union can reach 150 deep. The crowds then hail motorcycle taxis and head for the town's open-air market to stock up on food and clothing, or browse tiny appliance stores stuffed with blaring televisions and stereos.

It's the sort of scene that many development economists believe could transform some of the world's most impoverished regions, by putting cash directly in the pockets of the poor. With tens of millions of migrants around the globe sending remittances home, the flood of money has grown immense -- $167 billion last year, according to the World Bank.

But Ciudad Barrios also demonstrates why reliance on remittances may turn out to be the latest development fad that fails to live up to its hype. The downside: a cycle of continued poverty, as dependence on remittances turns the town into a kind of ward of the U.S. Those with entrepreneurial ambition head north, emptying out the town of its talent. Only a tiny fraction of the money they send home is invested in industry or agriculture that could produce jobs. And with the breadwinners away, organized thugs pounce on a place where money pours in from outside. All of that leaves little opportunity for the next generation except to follow their predecessors north, if they can.

"As soon as people go home and see what their salaries are [there], they come back to the U.S. again," says Israel Hernández, 38 years old, who left Ciudad Barrios in 1998 and has been cleaning houses in Washington, D.C. He has sent enough cash home to his grandmother for her to buy a house. She misses him, she says, but urges him to stay up north.

For countries to reduce poverty on a sustained basis and to create a middle class, they need to grow rapidly over years. Though remittances fuel some spending, there isn't much evidence they have added to sustained growth. Instead, the infusions of outside cash often distort the local economy and may diminish the long-term prospects for gains.

The flood of money from abroad can raise the value of local currencies, making it harder for exporters to compete because the effective price of their goods goes up. Meanwhile, about 85% of the money goes to pay the daily bills of the people left behind, with little left over for savings and investment. Migrants eventually return to retire in their home nations, not to help build their economies.

"Remittances are a band-aid on fundamental development problems," says Dean Yang, a public-policy professor at the University of Michigan. "Labor export and remittances won't turn El Salvador, the Philippines and other poor countries into the next development tigers." Even the World Bank, which has pushed the development potential of remittances, is having second thoughts. In a report on Latin America released yesterday, the bank says that remittances are "neither 'manna from heaven,' nor a substitute for sound development policies."

Remittances have received increasingly widespread attention in recent years as a way to boost aid without spending government money, as other formulas for growth have failed to produce widespread gains. In the 1970s and early 1980s, many nations tried closing their borders to protect their local industries from competition, which boosted growth for a while but led to high prices and monopoly control. Then they tried the opposite approach, free trade and market liberalization, with limited effect so far except in Asia. Meanwhile, foreign aid has been too small and inefficient to make much of a difference, while private investment has been targeted at a limited number of countries and industries.

Remittances do directly help many poor families feed themselves and educate their children. Money sent home from abroad accounts for about 60% of the income of the poorest households in Guatemala, and has helped reduce the number of people living in poverty by 11 percentage points in Uganda and six percentage points in Bangladesh, according to World Bank studies.

Nevertheless, a look at El Salvador shows the ways in which the cash also can hinder impoverished nations. The nation of seven million has revamped its economy since the civil war ended in 1992 in a so-far elusive effort to spur rapid growth. El Salvador abolished price controls, privatized industries, slashed tariffs that were as high as 290% and adopted the dollar as its currency in 2001 to limit inflation. Earlier this year, it joined a regional free-trade bloc with the U.S.

Salvadorans started to flee the country in great numbers in the 1980s as the civil war there intensified. Now one in six Salvadorans -- 1.5 million people -- live abroad, many of them illegally in the U.S. They send home nearly $3 billion annually, equal to about 16% of the country's gross domestic product.

Ciudad Barrios, a remote town 100 miles east of San Salvador, ping-ponged between guerrilla and government control during the civil war. José Edgardo Díaz Cordero worked in the town's hospital pharmacy in 1990 when guerrillas demanded that he give them medicines to treat their wounded. Then, he says, he received an anonymous message from a right-wing death squad accusing him of being a guerrilla ally and warning him to leave the country.

Mr. Díaz made his way to the Washington, D.C., area where many others from his town had settled, attracted by a booming construction industry. He started sending home several hundred dollars a month to his wife to care for their five children. He has been home just once, for about a year in 1995, but wages were too low to make a go of it, says Mr. Díaz, who is now 54. He returned to the U.S. and was later joined by two sons who became his partners in a flooring business. Another burst of Ciudad Barrios natives, who worked in the region's coffee fields, headed for the U.S. starting in 2000 when coffee prices plummeted.

Francisco Membreño, once a Ciudad Barrios coffee farmer, left his pregnant wife in 2000, worried that he wouldn't be able to support his newborn. He hasn't ever been back to meet their son, Ronald, who's now 6 years old. Mr. Membreño works two jobs cleaning offices in Washington, D.C., making $575 on a good week, and sharing an apartment with another Salvadoran.

Each month he sends home about $300 to his wife, Ernestina Argueta, who moved with Ronald to her parents' sweltering concrete house lit by a single light bulb. The money goes for food and medicine mostly, says Ms. Argueta, with a little left over to save to expand a tiny plot of land her husband purchased and hopes someday to cultivate. Though her elderly mother dreams of a new sewing machine, Ms. Argueta says, "For now, we're not buying anything, until he comes back."

About one-third of the 40,000 residents of Ciudad Barrios and surrounding hamlets receive remittances, estimates Claudia Rodríguez-Alas, an American University researcher who has studied the town. Salvadorans abroad typically share apartments, keep each other current on job openings and lend relatives at home the $5,000 or so necessary to pay "coyotes" to guide them illicitly across Mexico to the U.S.

In Ciudad Barrios, monthly remittances average about $157 a household, according to Ms. Rodríguez-Alas. That's slightly more than the government calculates is enough to feed a family of four. But it often doesn't pull families above the official poverty line of $275 a month. Essentially, remittances are sufficient to push families out of extreme poverty, but not much higher.

The extra cash does have beneficial effects. It gives even the most destitute families the means to pay for food at the town's markets, and is extra disposable income for those who work. Salvadoran families that receive remittances are more likely to keep their children in school than other families, according to a study by two economists, Alejandra Cox of California State University, Long Beach, and Manuelita Ureta of Texas A&M.

Better-off Salvadorans abroad often send two checks a month -- one for their family's daily expenses, and another to save up to buy small homes with luxuries such as glass windows, electricity in every room, steel gratings on the doors and windows, and tile floors.

A small consumption boom fed by the checks has doubled the number of businesses registered with the Ciudad Barrios City Hall to 220 since 2000, and even helped prompt the opening of a "cyber cafe." Around the town's central square are five financial institutions that handle remittances, including Western Union, which also advertises on highway overpasses on the way to town.

One hardware store, Agro Ferreteria Rivera, has carved out an unusual niche: The couple that owns the store travels monthly to Maryland to take orders for homes sketched out by migrants, who wire payments to their families. A separate appliance store takes orders by cellphone from abroad, while a city council member sells solar panels for homes built in fields that lack electricity hook-ups. Some of the new homeowners also get their fences electrified for extra security.

The gains in consumption financed from abroad could fuel the economy. But paradoxically, the easy money from remittances leads to a fall, rather than a rise, in domestic savings as a percentage of gross domestic product. The investment rate as a percentage of GDP stagnates as well.

The result: The country makes little progress. Between 1999 and 2005, remittances doubled to $2.8 billion, but the country limped along at an annual growth rate of just 2.4% -- far too low for a poor country to advance much. The tide of money from abroad boosted the value of its currency compared with that of its neighbors by nearly 50% between 1992 and 2001, which damaged exports. El Salvador has since adopted the dollar as its currency, but competition from China has intensified and other Central American nations have kept their currencies undervalued, so Salvadoran exporters haven't recovered.

Soaring remittances have boosted real-estate prices to levels that locals without outside help can't afford, while reducing the incentive of remittance recipients to work at home -- since wages are a pittance compared with what their relatives make in the U.S. In Ciudad Barrios, the coffee-growing cooperative recruits Nicaraguans and Hondurans to work the fields, because they can't find enough Salvadorans to fill jobs that pay between $5.50 and $8 a day.

Elsewhere, the same pattern occurs. Examining Mexican labor data, economists Catalina Amuedo-Dorantes of San Diego State University and Susan Pozo of Western Michigan University say that a boost in remittances prompts men to cut back their hours at salaried jobs and fill in with informal work.

Groups of Salvadorans abroad do form associations to help finance municipal improvements back home. In Chinameca, a town near Ciudad Barrios, for instance, migrants have helped to pay for the town's water tower and for the roof on a local church. But the efforts have fallen well far short of the need.

Economists say that El Salvador and other remittance-receiving nations must figure out ways to route money from abroad into domestic investments. The Salvadoran government, for instance, wants to create investment vehicles for Salvadorans abroad to bankroll domestic projects or industries.

In that vein, Salvadoran developers are holding fairs around the U.S. to try to make it easier for migrants to buy real estate. A Washington, D.C., financial company, Microfinance International Corp., is starting to offer Salvadorans transnational loans, which they can use to make investments in El Salvador and make payments in the U.S. -- and avoid having to pay fees on money wired home. Since many Salvadorans don't use banks or credit cards, the company's customers can use their remittance history to prove their creditworthiness.

In Ciudad Barrios, Lorena Romero, the acting manager of a local credit union, says only a tiny percentage of remittance receivers take out business loans. Even those often use the proceeds to pay coyotes to take them to the U.S. instead of opening businesses locally. Another credit union called AMC, which does business throughout eastern El Salvador in conjunction with Microfinance International, says just 1% of its remittance customers take out loans for businesses.

Wilson Salmerón, AMC's general manager, says many migrants don't invest in El Salvador because they're afraid their families will become targets of gang violence. One of the reasons that many nations have come to depend so heavily on remittances -- Haiti, Bosnia, Serbia, Honduras, Nicaragua -- is because people were frightened away by war, and their nations are still torn by violence.

In Ciudad Barrios, many remittance recipients try to avoid calling attention to themselves. Some pick up their cash in neighboring towns where they aren't known. Others pace their purchases of appliances, so their neighbors don't notice. The latest gang tactic is to call remittance receivers on their cellphones and extort cash instead of doing it in person. Some in Ciudad Barrios won't answer calls from numbers they don't know.

The fear damps local investment, too. Mr. Salmerón says his credit managers are afraid to travel into the countryside where gang influence is strong. A number of migrants say they wouldn't start a business in Ciudad Barrios for fear they'll draw unwanted attention. "You'll be robbed," says Dora Ruiz, a cook at a Washington, D.C., McDonald's restaurant, who wires $200 a month to care for her four children who live with her sister-in-law. "People will come in through the windows if need be."

At Ciudad Barrios' sole high school, students recognize one important benefit of remittances: They aren't forced to drop out of school to work, as their parents were. The senior class this year is triple the size of a decade ago, says the school's assistant principal, Lex Marvin. But some now leave early to join parents abroad, and few see much opportunity in El Salvador after graduation. José Ines Aguilar Osorio is a shy, slender senior whose father works as a mason in the U.S. "If I don't find work here," he says, "I'm leaving."

Germany's Army (NYT)

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

Germany has made it official: it is prepared to move out of its postwar pacifist mode and undertake a greater role in global security. Good. There has been no good reason for some time why Germany should not do its share of global peacekeeping and peacemaking. Defending Germany's borders, to which its army was restricted after World War II, is hardly a consuming mission in today's Europe.

Berlin's new position paper on international security, issued last week, points to a welcome expansion of Germany's role in conflict prevention, peacekeeping and antiterrorist actions. That is especially important now, when the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and multiple peacekeeping missions in Africa have strained the military resources of America and its leading NATO allies.

Military ties to the United States will remain at the heart of Berlin's defense policy. But larger and more robust troop contributions from the most populous European NATO country can help restore a measure of political balance to an alliance increasingly distorted by Washington's military role.

The taboos against deploying German troops overseas have been steadily falling away at least since 1992, when a few German medics were dispatched to Cambodia. Today, Germany has about 10,000 soldiers serving on missions in Afghanistan, the Balkans and Congo, and German warships are patrolling the Lebanese coast. But the Germans have usually avoided roles that could involve combat. Those in Afghanistan, for example, are involved in reconstruction. Under the new policy, Germany would presumably engage in all aspects of peacekeeping operations.

The specter of German militarism, once terrifying, is a thing of the past. Contemporary Germans are, if anything, more sensitive than their neighbors to episodes of military wrongdoing. Last week's publication of photographs of German soldiers in Afghanistan toying with a skull prompted a suitably anguished public reaction. But it should not raise questions about transforming the Bundeswehr into a global intervention force. There's a lot of work to be done, and it's time the Germans joined in.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Perle Slams Administration Over Nuclear Terror Attack Precautions. The Washington Post's Al Kamen (11/1), in his "In The Loop" column, writes, "Eyebrows popped up last week when none other than Richard Perle , former Reagan assistant secretary of defense, former Bush brain-truster on the Defense Policy Board, and a key promoter of the war to find Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, blistered the administration as 'dysfunctional' when it comes to stopping someone from bringing 'a nuclear weapon or even nuclear material into the United States.' … But President Bush , Perle emphasized, is not to blame for this sorry state of affairs. 'I haven't the slightest doubt that if one could…put this proposition to the president, he would first be shocked to learn that we don't have the capability. Secondly, [he] would immediately order that we develop it.'"

72 Muslim Workers At Paris Airport Lose Access Badges. The New York Times (11/1, Bennhold, 1.21M) reports, "The French authorities charged with assessing security risks at Charles de Gaulle airport have stripped 72 Muslim workers of their access badges because they had traveled to Pakistan or Afghanistan, or were suspected of having links to extremists," according to Jacques Lebrot, who oversees the airport. Lebrot, who said a number of the workers "are suspected of having trained in terrorist camps," added that one of the workers "was a friend of Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber." Joanna Gonzalez, a spokeswoman for the US Department of Homeland Security, declined to comment on the incident, stating that it is "the government of France's jurisdiction."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Washington State Inmate To Face Federal Charges Over Bomb Threat. KXLY-TV Spokane (10/31) reported on its Web site, "A man who threatened to blow up a Spokane DSHS facility earlier this summer will face federal charges, an FBI sgent confirmed Tuesday afternoon. Anthony Garver will face federal charges for possession or receipt of firearms or ammunition by a person adjudicated as mentally defective, according to FBI Special Agent Norm Brown. The charges stem from the relevation earlier this summer after Garver told a fellow inmate at the Spokane County Jail about his plan to blow up the DSHS office." The inmate "tipped off authorities who later found during their investigation that Garver had a variety of items including ammunition, knives, a GPS unit, police scanner and bomb-making recipes saved on a computer, which was enough for the FBI to launch an investigation into Garver."

Alleged Utah Library Bomber May Have Written Letter About Plot. KTVX-TV Salt Lake City (10/31, Jones) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "The man accused of bombing the Salt Lake City Library in September may have also written a letter to police claiming responsibility for the crime. The author also promises more attacks in the future according to the FBI. The letter was addressed to Chief of Police Chris Burbank one week ago." Thomas Zajac "is behind bars in Illinois awaiting extradition to Salt Lake City to face bombing charges here, police are trying to find out if he was the one who wrote the letter. In the letter, the author gives details about the materials used to construct the bomb. The letter writer also tells police someone close to him was a victim of police brutality in Salt Lake City, he or she goes on to say if they see more cases of police brutality they will return and bomb again."

Zajac Possible Suspect In Chicago Bombing. The Salt Lake Tribune (11/1, Carlisle) reports, "Investigators are probing whether the suspect in a Salt Lake City library bombing is linked to an explosion at a train station in suburban Chicago, a federal agent said Tuesday." Salt Lake City ATF Agent in Charge Lori Dyer "said Thomas Zajac's fingerprints are being tested against evidence connected to a bomb that detonated in Hinsdale, Ill. That bomb exploded Sept. 1 -- the same month as the library bomb -- in a trash can at a commuter train station, according to the Daily Herald in suburban Chicago. No one was injured." The Tribune notes, "The FBI arrested Zajac Friday at his home in Oakbrook Terrace, Ill. He is awaiting extradition to Utah."

Defense Lawyer Says LANL Contractor Planned No Espionage. The AP (11/1, Baker) reports, "The woman who lived in a home where classified material from Los Alamos National Laboratory was seized by authorities wasn't a spy -- she was just trying to do her job for the lab, her lawyer said Tuesday. The FBI began investigating a security breach at the nuclear weapons laboratory after police seized three portable computer storage drives during a drug bust at Jessica Quintana's home on Oct.

17." Attorney Stephen Aarons said, "It's not espionage. It's a 22-year-old ... that mishandled documents, and it doesn't appear that third parties got hold of them. Her only intent was to work with these documents herself, and to get them indexed in a timely fashion. ... She was working with these documents and she shouldn't have left the facility with them, but apparently she did."

"Intellipedia" Allows US Intelligence Officials To Air Views On Sensitive Topics. The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Miller, 918K) reports a new computer system being used by US intelligence agencies, referred to as Intellipedia "because it is built on open-source software from the Wikipedia Web site," was discussed "in detail" for the first time yesterday by US officials. "After being criticized for downplaying dissenting views on Iraq's alleged weapons programs, 'we're trying to transform the way we do business,' said Michele Weslander, a senior official overseeing the initiative for the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte. The system allows analysts from all 16 US intelligence agencies to weigh in on debates on North Korea's nuclear program and other sensitive topics, creating internal Web sites that are constantly updated with new information and analysis, officials said."

Markey Says TSA Should Alter Procedures In Response To Fake Boarding Pass Site. The Washington Post (11/1, D1, Krebs, 748K) reports Christopher Soghoian, whose Web site allowing users to create fake boarding passes prompted a visit from the FBI over the weekend, "has stirred a national tempest and renewed concerns about passenger screening procedures." Wendy Osborne, a special agent with the FBI's Indianapolis field office, said the bureau "would investigate jointly with the Transportation Security Administration and then decide whether charges would be filed." Meanwhile, "Amy Kudwa, a spokeswoman for the TSA, declined to say whether the agency was considering changing check-in procedures because of the incident." Rep. Edward J. Markey, who praised Soghoian's actions Sunday for calling "attention to a security weakness," indicated Tuesday that "Congress might have to act if the TSA doesn't."

Katrina Evacuees From New Orleans Create Problems For Schools. The New York Times (11/1, Nossiter, 1.21M) reports students at John McDonogh High School have "in the last six weeks…assaulted guards, a teacher and a police officer." The attacks are presented as part of "a far-reaching phenomenon after Hurricane Katrina" wherein "teenagers in the city are living alone or with older siblings or relatives, separated by hundreds of miles from their displaced parents" and "they are angry." Principal Donald Jackson "estimated that up to a fifth of the 775 students live without parents."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Supports Allocation Of Additional $1 Billion For Iraq's Military. The AP (11/1, Burns) reports Defense Secretary Rumsfeld "endorsed a proposal to spend at least $1 billion to expand the size and accelerate the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces." According to the AP, "Rumsfeld's support underscores the Bush administration's effort to shift more of the burden of Iraq's security to that country's forces." Rumsfeld is quoted as saying, "I'm very comfortable with the increases they've proposed and the accelerations in achievement of some of their targets. … Now it's simply a matter of our pressing forward and getting our portion of the funding from the Congress and working to see that it's executed."

The CBS Evening News (10/31, story 3, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Now more about that story David Martin broke here last night that US troops may have to stay in Iraq a lot longer to train 100,000 more Iraqi security forces. Today…Rumsfeld conceded it's true." CBS added, "Today…Rumsfeld confirmed the mission is about to get bigger and take longer. Saying he expects to approve a recommendation from General George Casey, the American commander in Iraq, to increase the size of the Iraqi security forces." CBS noted Rumsfeld "refused to say exactly how big an increase. But other Pentagon officials predict the current goal of fielding 325,000 Iraqi soldiers and police will be increased by a minimum of 30,000 and a maximum of 100,000. Rumsfeld said that while American trainers and advisers will have to stay longer, combat troops could start coming home before then." NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 4, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Many people believe this now means Americans will have to stay in Iraq longer than first expected. NBC added, "Rumsfeld also confirmed to what many was already obvious. Iraq needs a bigger army. Pentagon officials say with a deadly rise in sectarian violence, there was no other choice but to increase the number of Iraqi security forces. … The Pentagon has already spent $10 billion training and equipping Iraqi forces and now expects to ask Congress for even more. But simply increasing the number of Iraqi forces is still no guarantee that they'll soon be able to take on the fight, the enemy, all by themselves and that substantial numbers of American troops can start coming home."

Election Outcome Could Influence Timing Of Rumsfeld Departure. The Financial Times (11/1, Sevastopulo, Dinmore) reports The midterm elections next week could help decide the fate of" Rumsfeld. According to the Times, "A former senior administration official said Mr Rumsfeld might leave if the Iraq Study Group…comes up with radical policy suggestions for Iraq. Another influential Republican with close ties to the White House said the consensus among Republican insiders was that Mr Rumsfeld would remain only until next summer. That would provide enough time after the elections to avoid the impression he was going because of the war, and also allow time for the situation on the ground to improve."

CentCom Briefing Reportedly Describes Iraq As "Edging Toward Chaos." The New York Times (11/1, Gordon, 1.21M) reports, "A classified briefing prepared two weeks ago by the United States Central Command portrays Iraq as edging toward chaos, in a chart that the military is using as a barometer of civil conflict. A one-page slide shown at the Oct. 18 briefing" shows "a color-coded bar chart that is used to illustrate an 'Index of Civil Conflict.' It shows a sharp escalation in sectarian violence since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February. … In fashioning the index, the military is weighing factors like the ineffectual Iraqi police and the dwindling influence of moderate religious and political figures, rather than more traditional military measures such as the enemy's fighting strength and the control of territory. The conclusions the Central Command has drawn from these trends are not encouraging, according to a copy of the slide that was obtained by The New York Times. The slide shows Iraq as moving sharply away from 'peace,' an ideal on the far left side of the chart, to a point much closer to the right side of the spectrum, a red zone marked 'chaos.'"

Most US Soldiers Killed This Month Were Killed Outside Of Baghdad. The New York Times (11/1, Shanker, Cloud, 1.21M) reports, "About two-thirds of the deaths among American troops in Iraq in October occurred outside Baghdad, even with a sharp increase in combat deaths in the capital. … Forty American soldiers were killed in and around Baghdad in October, double the number there just two months ago, a review of casualty reports shows. Military officers and civilian analysts said the rise in October resulted in part from more aggressive American security operations in Baghdad, which exposed larger numbers of troops to danger. The security operation in the capital put American troops on the streets not only in greater numbers, but more often on foot patrols outside their armored vehicles, where they were more vulnerable to improvised bombs and a growing threat of snipers. The spike in violence in the capital was accompanied by higher tolls in other parts of the country, notably in Anbar Province, where 37 Americans died and deaths have climbed steadily since this summer."

Level Of Attacks On US Forces In October Called "Unprecedented." The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "October's death toll, the highest for American forces in nearly two years, came during a period without conventional battles or catastrophic helicopter crashes. Rather, the 103 troops killed in Baghdad and across Iraq were victims of a steady onslaught of assaults, primarily by their longtime nemeses, Sunni Arab insurgents. The number of attacks on American forces increased in October to unprecedented levels, U.S. military officials said.

Iraqi PM Ends Some Joint Checkpoints In Shiite Enclaves. The AP (11/1, Bodeen) reports, "Exploiting GOP vulnerability in the Nov. 7 elections, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki flexed his political muscle Tuesday and won US agreement to lift military blockades on Sadr City and another Shiite enclave where an American soldier was abducted. … The prime minister's challenge to US conduct of the war was the latest in a series of acts designed to force the American hand and test Washington's readiness to give him a greater say in securing the world's most violent capital."

ABC World News (10/31, story 3, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Malaki's decision "has put new strains on the Iraq government and the Bush Administration. The Prime Minister bowed to a request from Iraq's most powerful militia leader and lifted a blockade on a Shiite militia stronghold in Baghdad. And it raises questions about just how much influence the US now has over the Iraqi government."

ABC World News (10/31, story 4, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) also reported, "Bush Administration officials stress the US has to work with the Iraqi government. But the Prime Minister's action today puts the White House in something of a predicament." ABC (Raddatz) added, "The White House will say publicly there is no rift between the Prime Minister and the White House. But privately, many officials are saying they were taken completely by surprise by this move by Prime Minister Maliki. The United States wants him to succeed. But they are not seeing the progress they want to see. They are deeply troubled by what happened today."

The CBS Evening News (10/31, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) also portrayed the move as a sign "of growing tension between Washington and an Iraqi government." The Iraqi government, added ABC, seem "to be taking more of its clues these days or cues, rather, from a radical cleric." CBS (Logan) added, "This was an order US soldiers manning checkpoints in parts of Baghdad were not expecting -- pack up and go. And this was the Iraqi reaction: Celebrations on the streets of Sadr City, home to the powerful Mehdi Army militia. Through their leader, al-Sadr, they have been pushing hard to get rid of the US security barriers set up around their area to search for an American soldier abducted last Monday. Today, Sadr, perhaps the most powerful man in Iraq, got exactly what he wanted." NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 3, 2:05, Engel, 9.87M) said, "Al-Sadr rattled his cage to get the Americans out of his neighborhood and won."

The New York Times (11/1, Semple, 1.21M) reports, "Late Tuesday night, after hours of silence, a senior American Embassy official who had been delegated to return reporters' phone calls said the prime minister's order was 'the result of a meeting' between Mr. Maliki, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq. 'It was essentially something that Maliki wanted to do and Casey agreed to it,' the official said." But "Maliki's announcement may have been a foregone conclusion: the meeting was at 1 p.m., officials said, and the prime minister's office issued his press release at about 1:20 p.m."

USA Today (11/1, Jervis, 2.27M) notes "Al-Maliki's government, nominally a coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, is dominated by a Shiite majority bloc. Al-Sadr's political organization is among the most powerful groups within that bloc. … Al-Sadr had warned on Monday that his forces might retaliate in response to the security ring around Sadr City. 'If this siege continues for long, we will resort to action,' he said."

The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Ellingwood, 918K) reports, "Maliki's order to take down the roadblocks could help boost his political standing among Iraqis who have grown disappointed in his leadership and irritated over what they view as American meddling."

The Washington Times/AP (11/1, Bodeen) reports Democratic Sen. Jack Reed, "a member of the Armed Services Committee, said al-Maliki was yielding to sectarian pressure and undermining US efforts to curb attacks." Said Reed, "Today, the critical issue in Iraq is whether the Maliki government can muster the political will to confront those who use violence to destabilize Iraq."

Former US Advisor Describes Iraqi Troops' Deficiencies. The Washington Post (11/1, A12, Pincus, 748K) reports, "U.S. military advisers are confronting difficult behavior from Iraqi soldiers, who tend to fire all their ammunition in response to a single sniper shot or go on rampages even against civilians upon witnessing the death of a colleague, according to Lt. Col. Carl D. Grunow, a former adviser to an Iraqi army armored brigade." Grunow. in an article in the U.S. Army's Combined Arms Center's Military Review, "attributes that reaction to the Iraqi army's experience in the 'high-intensity Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, a war with clear battle lines fought with mass military formations.' At that time, Grunow writes, 'Iranian human-wave assaults presented Iraqi soldiers with a target rich environment' and 'battlefields covered with bodies following huge expenditures of ammunition.' His article, based on his year in Iraq, which ended in June, is in the July-August Military Review and is one of several in recent issues that have dealt forthrightly with concerns of military participants with the U.S. effort to rebuild Iraq's army during the ongoing war."

Syrian Foreign Minister May Visit Iraq This Month. The AP (11/1, Aji) reports Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem "is considering a visit to Baghdad in November — the first by a top Syrian official since the fall of Saddam Hussein and a major step toward restoring diplomatic relations, Iraqi and Syrian officials said Tuesday. President Bush has called on Syria to help quell sectarian violence in Iraq, and some in the U.S., including former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, have urged the White House to make overtures to Syria to enlist its help." An Iraqi Foreign Ministry official, "who spoke on condition of anonymity…said the ministries agreed 'in principal' that al-Moallem would visit Iraq in November."

Blair Ekes Out Win On Iraq War Inquiry Vote. AFP (11/1, Millard) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair's government "survived a potentially damaging vote in parliament on whether he should order an inquiry into how Britain joined the war in Iraq. Opposition parties had demanded an immediate investigation by a committee of senior members of parliament into the government's handling of the build-up to the US-led March 2003 invasion. However, the motion, proposed by the small Scottish and Welsh nationalist parties in the lower House of Commons, was defeated by 298 votes to 273, with Blair's 62-seat working majority cut to 25. The government later promised an inquiry once the situation permitted." The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Murphy, 918K) reports, "government ministers warned that launching an inquiry now would send a message of weakness to Britain's adversaries, threaten the morale of the troops and undermine support for Iraqi attempts to build a unified and democratic nation. … In a Guardian/ICM poll published Thursday, 61% of respondents said they wanted British forces to leave Iraq this year, even if they have not completed their mission, and even if the U.S. wants them to stay."

Iraq Has Experienced Post-Saddam Baby Boom. The Washington Times (11/1, Palmer, 88K) reports, "Iraq's maternity wards are experiencing an unlikely baby boom. … The birthrate in Iraq actually has increased since the U.S.-led invasion 43 months ago, according to the country's Health Ministry. The rate of births in the country has jumped from 29 births per 1,000 people in 2003 to 37 per 1,000 last year, according to government figures. In neighboring Iran, the birthrate is half that -- 21 per 1,000 population, while the average birthrate in the Middle East is 25, according to the World Bank."

Pro-US Iraqi Legislator Profiled. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/1, A18, 2.03M) "independent journalist" Heather Robinson profiles Mithal al-Alusi, "a 53-year-old Sunni Arab who won a seat in parliament last December after having served as director general of the National Commission on de-Baathification. Mr. al-Alusi ran on a platform of religious pluralism, human rights, free markets and a free press. He calls for an alliance among democracies -- including the U.S., Iraq, Israel and Turkey -- to fight terrorism." In February 2005 "assassins opened fire on Mr. al-Alusi's car as it approached his Baghdad home. He wasn't in the vehicle, but his sons, 30-year-old Ayman and 22-year-old Gamal, were. Both were killed as their father watched. Still, Mr. al-Alusi was unbowed." Robinson notes, "Polls suggest a majority of Americans think it was a mistake to enter Iraq. Mr. al-Alusi respectfully disagrees." Robinson concludes, "He has not given up the fight. How can we?"

NATO Forces Continue To Engage Taliban. The New York Times (11/1, Wafa, 1.21M) reports, "Clashes erupted in five provinces in eastern and southern Afghanistan on Monday and Tuesday, with roadside bombs, suicide bombings and gun battles killing four NATO soldiers and an estimated 67 Taliban fighters, NATO officials said." The violence "came as NATO forces continued a military operation started last week intended to put pressure on Taliban forces through the fall and winter, and to allow reconstruction and development to reach the country's restive south and east, NATO officials said. Taliban forces, meanwhile, continued to demonstrate their ability to carry out multiple roadside bombings and suicide attacks."

Musharraf Defends Strike Against Religious School. The New York Times (11/1, Masood, 1.21M) reports, "Faced with protests across the country, President Pervez Musharraf on Tuesday defended a military strike that killed 80 people at a religious school, and insisted that the dead were militants undergoing terrorist training." Musharraf's claim "came amid protests across the political spectrum, but especially by an alliance of Islamic parties and thousands of people in the semi-autonomous tribal areas straddling the Afghan border where the strike took place."

Pakistani Embassy Criticizes Depiction Of Musharraf. Akram Shaheedi, press minister at the Embassy of Pakistan in Washington, writes in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M), "Tunku Varadarajan, in his review of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's autobiography 'In the Line of Fire,' describes Gen. Musharraf as 'self-congratulatory, narcissistic and mendacious.' … Such words are unfair, reflecting the mindset of those determined to malign the president come what may."

Pentagon Seeks Translation Devices To Remedy Shortage Of Arabic Interpreters. On the front page of the Business section, the Washington Post (11/1, Merle, 748K) reports that "the goal of having a machine replace a human interpreter remains elusive, and the military is mounting a multimillion-dollar campaign to find a more capable successor, one that can translate both sides of a conversation, from English to Arabic and vice versa." A shortage of interpreters has forced the military "to rely increasingly on contractors -- 6,500 in Iraq and 1,500 in Afghanistan. It can be a dangerous job. Of the 648 contractors killed in Iraq since the war began in March 2003, 153 worked for the division of L-3 Communications Corp. that currently holds the linguist contract." The Post reports that progress on the device has been slow.

The Washington Times (11/1, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "The Army has invested $4.2 million in a Web-based software program to improve the foreign-language skills of overseas personnel. The program was created by Rosetta Stone, which provides training software in 30 languages." Army project manager Stan Davis is quoted as saying that "more than 64,000" troops are using the software.

Gonzales Takes Surprise Teaching Stint At George Washington Law School. In their "Reliable Source" column for the Washington Post (11/1), Amy Argetsinger and Roxanne Roberts write, "Alberto Gonzales dropped by GWU Law School yesterday, surprising 40 students in the criminal procedure class. The attorney general talked about military commissions, terrorist surveillance and the Patriot Act and took questions for 40 minutes -- before vanishing as mysteriously as he arrived." Argetsinger and Roberts add, "Turns out this was all his idea: Gonzales just got a hankering for legal chat with some students, and his staff tracked down a willing prof, former DOJ lawyer Renee Lerner . 'I guess he really likes teaching,' she said. 'The students, of course, were delighted to have him.' Is the AG mulling a move to academia? 'He is not ruling any options out in terms of future careers,' said Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos . Any more stealth visits to law schools planned? 'I wouldn't rule it out.'"

California Federal Prosecutor Ready For Iraq Duty. The Sacramento Bee (11/1, Ellis) reports, "Marlon Cobar so believes in the virtue of the rule of law that he has volunteered to go to Iraq and promote it." The Bee continues, "Cobar, an assistant U.S. attorney in Fresno, next month will start a one-year stint — with the option for a second — advising Iraqis as they work to put together a functioning legal system. … Many areas where Cobar will help already are second nature in the American legal system, such as how to make effective opening and closing arguments, how to pursue a line of questioning, how to preserve evidence and how to develop a chain of custody for prisoners." The Bee adds, "Cobar also will give advice about human rights and ethical issues that lawyers, prosecutors and judges in Iraq might face. … 'We're not going over there to take over,' Cobar said. 'We'll be assisting the Iraqis in taking the reins of their justice system any way they can.'" The Bee notes, "He will be stationed in an undisclosed province far from Baghdad and will be one of only eight such 'Resident Legal Advisers' in the war-torn country. These legal advisers advise the U.S. Embassy and Iraq's central and provincial courts. … In total, the Justice Department has more than 200 employees and contract personnel working on law enforcement, security and justice issues in Iraq. … To date, according to the Justice Department, nearly 500 Iraqi jurists and prosecutors have been trained on topics such as human rights, criminal process and the challenges presented prosecuting insurgency and terrorist cases."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Finds Former Cendant Chairman Guilty Of Conspiracy To Commit Securities Fraud, Making False Statements. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C3) reports a federal jury in the US District court in Bridgeport, CT found former Cendant Chairman Walter A Forbes "guilty of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and two counts of making false statements in a massive fraud scheme that inflated the travel and real-estate company's earnings and crippled the company's once-stellar reputation. … The conviction came in Mr. Forbes's third trial in three years, after juries deadlocked in trials earlier this year and in early 2005. The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate-accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years, but is one of the last to reach a conclusion." US Attorney Christopher J. Chirstie: "We are gratified by today's verdict. … The innocent victims of this $14 billion fraud engineered by Walter Forbes have waited a very long time for justice to be done. This is a great day for those who believe that everyone in our society must be held accountable for their conduct."

The New York Times (11/1, Stowe) reports, "Prosecutors said Mr. Forbes inflated the income at his original company, CUC International, which merged with HFS Inc. in 1997 to form Cendant — with holdings including the Avis and Budget car rental companies and the Century 21 and Coldwell Banker real estate brokerage firms, among other businesses." The Times adds, "The jury foreman, David Cunningham, a business analyst from Wilton, Conn., said the jury did not think that prosecutors proved their case on securities fraud. Asked if there had been a crucial piece of evidence that swayed the jury to vote to convict on other counts, Mr. Cunningham replied simply, 'We were just following the evidence.'

USA Today (11/1, Farrell) reports, "The victory proved sweet for federal prosecutors from New Jersey, who have been pursuing Forbes for eight years. Two previous efforts to convict Forbes for his role in the Cendant fraud ended in mistrials, although jurors in the first trial found Forbes' top lieutenant, E. Kirk Shelton, guilty of participating in the fraud. Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison."

The Washington Post (11/1, D1, Johnson) reports, "Forbes, 63, faces more than 10 years in prison on the charges, which stem from a $250 million earnings manipulation at CUC International Inc., which through a merger became the travel and real estate conglomerate known as Cendant. … Cendant's disclosure of accounting tricks eight years ago slashed the stock price in half and erased $14 billion in shareholder value, ultimately leading the company to hand over a $3.2 billion settlement to investors, which was a record at the time." The Post notes that the verdict "marked the third time in recent years that jurors rejected a top executive's claim that he failed to detect accounting tricks because he only breezily reviewed financial reports and delegated the details to subordinates who deceived him."

The AP (11/1, Press) reports, "The verdict could end what was, when it was first brought, the largest case of accounting fraud in the country. The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years. … The case was being tried after two previous juries deadlocked. … 'It's the third time and was worth all the effort,' said Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in New Jersey. 'We always believed fully in all the evidence against Mr. Forbes. We are extremely gratified by today's results.'" The AP adds, "Prosecutors say that Forbes participated in a scheme to inflate the stock of Cendant's predecessor, CUC International, by $500 million. The fraud was reported in 1998, causing Cendant's market value to drop by $14 billion in one day. … Forbes has argued he knew nothing about the fraud. His co-defendant, former Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted last year of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC."

SEC Regulators Investigate Triparty Repurchase Agreements. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C6, Ng, Zuckerman) reports that a "regulatory probe into possible manipulation of Treasury prices" is examining "a strategy that helps traders make certain bonds scarcer and more valuable, say people familiar with the matter." The SEC "is investigating whether UBS AG was involved in improper manipulation of Treasury-securities prices. Separately, a Credit Suisse Group bond trader recently left the firm amid regulatory scrutiny of the market. No regulator has alleged wrongdoing by any individual or at any specific bank. Regulators are focusing on a large and somewhat obscure corner of the market where investment banks, hedge funds, mutual funds and other investors use bonds as collateral for short-term cash loans. … People familiar with the government's investigation say some firms might be intentionally restraining supply in the repo market by borrowing scarce bonds and then entering deals that park a large proportion of those bonds with custodian banks, keeping them from being lent out to other traders. By constraining supply this way, traders can make their holdings -- or the holdings of clients -- more profitable." These deals, called "triparty repurchase agreements," are "part of normal trading activity, but regulators are concerned they are being abused."

Former McAfee Treasurer Agrees To Fine In Fraud Case. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C6) reports that Eric Borrmann, a former McAfee Inc. treasurer, "agreed to pay $758,000 and accept a five-year ban on serving as an officer of a public company to settle civil charges that he aided the computer-security company's multimillion-dollar fraud from mid-1999 until he left the company in July 2000, the Securities and Exchange Commission said." He "was accused of assisting McAfee's executives and senior managers in preparing and distributing false and misleading information about the company's financial results."

Professors Call For Greater Shareholder Empowerment. In a column in the Wall Street Journal (11/1), James Dow and Paolo Volpin, two professors of finance at the London Business School, write, "Executive compensation scandals are back, in Europe as well as in the U.S. Just think of the news during the last couple of weeks. … Economists have traditionally taken a benign view of stock options and generous executive compensation. Basic economic theory suggests that they align management interests with shareholders'. … But the excesses of the last few years have fueled the resurgence of the contrarian view: that high incentive pay can actually exacerbate conflicts between shareholder value and CEO interests." They explore the issue of CEO pay and corporate governance in Europe and the US, then write, "We have no doubt that shareholder empowerment is the way forward. We would like to see more mechanisms for shareholders to voice their claims as owners. … We disagree with the view that aggressive enforcement is the key to improved corporate governance. We'd certainly like to see blatant transgressors punished, but available evidence shows that relying on enforcement by securities regulators does not suffice. If there is one lesson to be learned from the options backdating scandal, it is that even the most devious lawmaker could never anticipate and prohibit all the devices that managers might conceive to abuse their shareholders."

SEC Closes Intuit Options Probe. The AP (11/1) reports, "Intuit Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission has closed its investigation into the software maker's stock option accounting practices without taking any punitive action." The AP continues, "The conclusion removes Mountain View-based Intuit from a long list of companies under SEC scrutiny as regulators examine whether employee stock options had been manipulated in a way that inflates profits and decreases tax bills. The SEC began its Intuit inquiry in June." The AP adds, 'Most of the problems to surface so far have revolved around 'backdating.' … Intuit, which makes the popular TurboTax and Quicken programs, had previously disclosed that it did not need to restate its past profits because an internal investigation found no evidence of stock options misconduct. … The U.S. Attorney's office subpoenaed Intuit for information pertaining to its stock options around the same time the SEC began its investigation. Intuit said the U.S. Attorney's office hasn't sought additional information since the company passed along the findings of its internal inquiry."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rising Florida Violent Crime Reflects National Trend. USA Today (11/1, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports that Orlando, Fla., and surrounding Orange County already have set annual records for murder this year, and "the escalating number of killings in the Orlando area has made it one of the most extreme examples of the increasing violent crime rates being reported in dozens of cities across the nation, according to a recent analysis by the Police Executive Research Forum, a police advocacy group. The FBI…has not released numbers for 2006," but the PERF "report led the Justice Department to launch a review of possible demographic and economic triggers for violence in cities from Philadelphia to Sacramento. Meanwhile, the FBI has directed more than 100 additional agents to help local authorities fight violent crime." USA adds, "Across Florida, police are reporting spikes in violence after a decade of historically low crime rates."

Florida Said To Have "Complex" Roots. In the article, USA Today singles out Florida where "the violence seems to have roots that are more complex." Ron Stucker, criminal investigations chief for the Orange County Sheriff's Department, "say that although traditional gangs have a presence here, most of the homicides in this area appear to have stemmed from robberies or drug-related disputes that suddenly turned violent."

Montgomery County Reports Increase In Violent Crime. The Washington Post (11/1, Londoño) reports, "Crime in Montgomery County increased by 7 percent during the year's second quarter, largely driven by a sharp rise in robberies, according to statistics released yesterday. Robberies increased by almost 68 percent during the reporting period, which ran from April to June. Another significant rise was in auto theft, which increased by 22 percent." Police Chief J. Thomas Manger "said the increase is part of a national trend. Across the country, violent crime is on the rise, partly driven by an increase in juvenile delinquency." The Post adds, "Other jurisdictions in the area, including Fairfax and Prince William counties, also recorded more robberies in the second quarter. But Prince George's County, which generally has a higher crime rate than Montgomery, says reported robberies fell significantly."

Libby's Lawyers Ask Judge To Bar Testimony Regarding Miller. The AP (11/1, Apuzzo) reports Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and Vice president Cheney's former Chief of Staff I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby "agree on something: keeping Libby's perjury trial in the CIA leak case focused solely on his actions. The two are separately asking a federal judge not to allow three years of politically charged backstory in the case to seep into Libby's trial starting in January. In new court documents, Fitzgerald argued that he shouldn't have to explain why Libby was charged while others, including the source of the leak, escaped prosecution. Libby said jurors shouldn't hear about New York Times reporter Judith Miller's 85-day jail term for refusing to discuss her conversations with him." Libby's attorneys "said it would be unfair for prosecutors to discuss Miller's refusal to testify. … 'The introduction of these issues would undoubtedly cause jurors to wonder whether Ms. Miller went to jail in an effort to shield Mr. Libby from liability, and whether Mr. Libby is to blame for her incarceration,' defense attorneys wrote."

The New York Sun (10/31, Gerstein) reports, "Prosecutors are asking a federal judge to preclude lawyers for a former White House aide facing trial for lying and obstruction of justice, I. Lewis Libby, from telling jurors that the government failed to charge Mr. Libby or anyone else in connection with the event that triggered the probe, the disclosure of the identity of a veteran CIA officer in 2003." The Sun continues, "Meanwhile, defense attorneys are seeking to prevent jurors from learning about any damage caused by the leak about the CIA operative, Valerie Plame. The defense also wants to keep the jury in the dark about the 85-day incarceration of a New York Times reporter, Judith Miller, after she was cited for contempt for refusing to testify about her contacts with Mr. Libby, who was then chief of staff to Vice President Cheney." The Sun adds, "The legal maneuvering came as the two sides faced a deadline yesterday to file motions aimed at restricting evidence or arguments to be presented at Mr. Libby's trial, which is set for January. … The special prosecutor assigned to the inquiry, Patrick Fitzgerald, asked Judge Reggie Walton to preclude defense attorneys from discussing during the trial why Mr. Libby was not charged with deliberately outing Ms. Plame. Mr. Fitzgerald also asked to exclude any evidence about why others were not charged in the case."

Influential Lobbyist Major Figure In Palm Beach Corruption Probe. The Palm Beach Post (11/1, Musgrave) reports, "William Boose, one of Palm Beach County's most influential lobbyists, is a central figure in the biggest corruption scandal to rock county government in nearly a century. A federal grand jury that indicted former County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti in a land-deal conspiracy also is looking at Boose. … When FBI agents started asking questions" in the Masilotti probe, "Boose falsified legal bills to disguise the fact that he didn't charge Masilotti full price for legal services, according to the court record. He worked on Masilotti's land deal while lobbying the county commission for other developer clients," without disclosing his relationship with Masilotti. The Post notes that although Boose has not been charged, "he has hired attorney Jack Goldberger -- a legal powerhouse who has a reputation for working with authorities to negotiate plea deals for high-profile clients."

FBI Sting Snares 35 In Philadelphia Medical Insurance Scam. The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/1, Clark, 399K) reports, "A Center City lawyer and 34 other people were charged with fraud yesterday in an elaborate sting operation that focused on personal injury claims from supposed vehicular accidents, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced. U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said his office and the FBI set up a bogus chiropractic clinic…in Northeast Philadelphia as the center of the sting, which was conducted over about three years. Officials said those charged were divided into three groups: the lawyer, Jordan B. Luber, who obtained a legal settlement on behalf of two FBI agents posing as injured patients from a vehicular accident; 31 'patients' who sought financial recovery based on false medical diagnoses and nonexistent medical treatment for supposed injuries from vehicle accidents; and 'runners' who received referral fees from Injury Associates for recruiting 'patients' to the clinic while knowing the clinic was a fraudulent operation." The Inquirer notes, "Officials said the fraudulent personal injury actions pursued by the defendants yielded more than $1.5 million in settlement demands and more than $350,000 in insurance company payments."

The Philadelphia Daily News (11/1, Hinkelman, 109K) reports, "Injury Associates was not just another chiropractic clinic. … It was part of an elaborate FBI sting carried out from 2003 to June 2006 that targeted individuals participating in phony personal-injury claims against auto insurers arising out of supposed car accidents." The Daily News notes, "Each individual sting operation began with a meeting between patients and undercover agents. … FBI agents then explained to potential patients how the scam worked. The meetings were both audio- and videotaped." US Attorney Patrick Meehan "said yesterday that the investigation is ongoing." The AP (11/1) also reports on the indictments.

Federal Investigators Find Big Dig Tunnel Design Had Minimal Safety Margin. The Boston Globe (11/1, Murphy, Allen, 425K) reports, "The Big Dig tunnel ceiling that collapsed in July was designed with a smaller margin of safety than other tunnel ceilings around the country, leaving nothing to prevent heavy concrete slabs from falling on a passing car when ceiling bolts fell out, according to a preliminary report by federal investigators obtained by the Globe." The NTSB report found that the "drop ceiling was held up by steel hangers, which were suspended from bolts that had been glued into the tunnel roof. But there were no beams attaching the ceiling to the walls, and the ceiling was constructed with half as many ceiling bolts as in the original design." The Globe adds, "The NTSB report also suggests that flaws in construction of the ceiling, carried out by Modern Continental Construction Co., may have made the design more hazardous. While offering few details, the report said FBI and State Police interviews with Modern Continental workers point to 'potential problems in the procedures used during installation.'"

High Court Considers Florida Death Row Appeal. The AP (11/1, Yost) reports, "A death row inmate's attorney argued Tuesday that the U.S. Supreme Court should allow the prisoner's appeal to continue despite a federal court ruling that he had missed a deadline for pursuing the case." The AP continues, "The lawyer for Gary Lawrence said Florida courts were to blame for the tardy appeal, not the inmate. …. Attorney Mary Bonner told the justices that Lawrence did not receive a court-appointed counsel to handle his appeal for 10 months, wiping out most of the time that he had under federal law to seek review of his death sentence." The AP adds, "The issue involves the interpretation of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, which places limits on the prolonged appeals process in capital punishment cases. It imposes a one-year deadline for petitioning federal courts in death cases after final judgments in state courts. … Under questioning by Chief Justice John Roberts, Bonner agreed with Roberts that her interpretation of the law would involve a process lasting up to six months. … The state of Florida said Lawrence had just one day remaining to petition the federal courts after the Florida Supreme Court ended the case on Nov. 18, 2002. The lawyer for the convicted killer says the deadline under the law did not expire until the U.S. Supreme Court refused to consider the case several months later."

US Gets More Time To Make Kansas Death Penalty Decision. The Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal (11/1, Fry) reports, "Frank Jerome 'Chicago' Robinson, a Topekan charged with starting a fire that killed Marvina Washington last summer, will have another month before learning whether he will face possible imposition of the death penalty." The Capital-Journal continues, "A federal district judge late last week gave federal prosecutors until Nov. 30 to decide whether to seek the federal death penalty against Robinson if he is convicted of a federal count of arson. … If Robinson is convicted, the maximum penalties for arson resulting in a death are life in prison or under certain circumstances, the death penalty, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office has said." The Capital-Journal adds, "Marvina Washington, 53, was killed during a fire that destroyed the apartment house she lived in at 427 S.W. Tyler. After the fire was extinguished on Aug. 8, Washington's body was recovered from her second-floor apartment. … U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson said the delay wouldn't prejudice Frank Robinson and gave prosecutors until the close of business on Nov. 30 to file notice of the prosecution's intent to seek the death penalty. Before the judge's ruling, the deadline to file the notice had been Oct. 30. … In the prosecution request for more time, U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren and assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Mattivi didn't anticipate a decision would be made by federal prosecutors by the Oct. 30 deadline. .. 'As the court is undoubtedly aware, the process within the Department of Justice for determining whether or not to seek the death penalty in a particular case is both lengthy and cumbersome,' the prosecution motion for more time said. … Any decision to seek the death penalty must be approved by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … The judge granted the postponement motion on Oct. 26. The judge will hear the motion on Dec. 18, and Frank Robinson is to be tried starting Feb. 6."

Bockting Appeal Could Potentially Re-Open "Thousands" Of Criminal Cases. The Christian Science Monitor (11/1, Richey) reports that the case of Marvin Bockting, who was "accused of sexually abusing his 6-year-old stepdaughter" and convicted when her "mother and the detective testified about what she had told them of the alleged sexual assault. Bockting was convicted and sentenced to life in prison," will be taken up in the Supreme Court this term. Bockting "is seeking to overturn his conviction based on a 2004 US Supreme Court decision in a case called Crawford v. Washington. In that case, the Supreme Court strongly reaffirmed the constitutional right to confront one's accusers in court. At the same time, the court struck down a rule that had allowed the introduction at trial of testimonial statements made by a potential witness prior to the trial." If the court decides to apply the Crawford rule retroactively to Bockting's case, "the case would also open the courthouse doors potentially for thousands of other individuals convicted under similar circumstances, where a key piece of testimonial evidence was allowed into the trial without the constitutional safeguard of cross-examination."

Two Found Guilty In D.C. Witness Killing. The Washington Post (11/1, Cauvin) reports that Franklin Thompson and Marquette Ward were convicted of murder yesterday in the slaying of "Jahkema 'Princess' Hansen," that the Post calls "as brazen a witness attack as the city had experienced." The trial "cast an unsettling light on the netherworld that Hansen -- and her killers -- inhabited. Just a seventh-grader, Hansen hung out with people a lot older, and she was out buying drugs with some of them at 3 a.m. when she saw a killing that later would cost her her life." The Post writes, "Yesterday, as the jury foreman answered guilty again and again -- 31 times in all -- Thompson, 24, and Ward, 31, betrayed no emotion as they sat behind their attorneys. Both were convicted of first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit murder, obstruction of justice and other offenses tied to Hansen's death."

DNA Evidence Clears Man Of Rape Charges. The New York Times/AP (11/1, Press) reports that Larry Fuller, who was "convicted of rape 25 years ago," was freed Tuesday "after a judge ruled that he would probably not have been found guilty if DNA testing been available." He "was sentenced to 50 years after jurors convicted him of aggravated rape in 1981, finding that he had broken into a woman's apartment and raped her, using a butcher knife to cut her thumb, neck and back as she struggled." The article adds, "Mr. Fuller's subsequent exoneration makes him the 10th Dallas County man in five years cleared by DNA testing. More than 20 men have been exonerated in Texas by such testing, according to the Innocence Project."

Duke Rape Case Overshadows Durham, NC, Prosecutor Election. The New York Times (11/1, Wilson) reports, "A week before Election Day, the race for Durham County district attorney is as odd a political campaign as anyone here can recall. The controversial lacrosse case looms over the incumbent, Michael B. Nifong. The opposition, under the banner of Anyone but Nifong, is fractured. … After all the accusations and commentary that the case has generated around the country, there is mostly silence at the heart of the campaign: little advertising, no debates and no platform by the leading opponent except that if he should win, the governor will pick somebody else. Still, to the extent there is any campaign at all, it is because of Mr. Nifong's handling of the case against the three players, all white, accused of rape by a black woman hired to strip at a team party in March."

Teen Student Arrested After Homemade Bomb Explodes. The Washington Post (11/1, Londoño) reports, "A 15-year-old Rockville student was arrested yesterday afternoon after a homemade 'bottle bomb' he was about to bring onto a school bus exploded as a teacher discarded it, Montgomery County Fire and Rescue Service officials said. A teacher at Mark Twain School who saw something suspicious approached the student -- whom authorities did not identify because he was charged as a juvenile -- as he was getting ready to board a school bus. As the teacher seized the two-liter bottle, its contents were activated by the movement, leading to an explosive chemical reaction. No one was injured."

California Commission Overpaid For Services, Failed To Follow State Contract Rules. The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Morain) reports, "A state commission chaired by Hollywood entertainer Rob Reiner suffered from lapses in its contracting, failed to properly award millions of dollars and did not adequately justify many of its payments, according to a state audit released today. The nonpartisan California Bureau of State

DOJ_NMG_0089753

Audits found that the California Children and Families Commission, also known as the California First 5 Commission, used tax money to overpay for some services and failed to follow state rules when it awarded some contracts.

Former Security Firm Chief Sentenced To Home Detention, Probation For Diverting Funds. The Washington Times (11/1, Mcelhatton) reports, Jeffrey N. Jackson, the former chief executive of Unlimited Security Inc., "a D.C. security firm that has become bankrupt," has been sentenced by the US District Court for DC to "eight months' home detention and five years' probation for illegally diverting hundreds of thousands of dollars from a payroll account." He was also ordered to pay $361,000 in restitution. The Times adds, "According to bankruptcy filings, the company's finances were entangled with Jackson's boxing-promotions business. Earlier this year, Jackson pleaded guilty to one count of bankruptcy fraud, admitting that in 2003, he illegally diverted more than $370,000 from a payroll account."

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Hears Tobacco Company's Appeal Of 1999 Penalty. USA Today (11/1, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "An attorney for a smoker's widow urged the Supreme Court on Tuesday to uphold a 1999 jury verdict that imposed a huge penalty on Philip Morris based on the tobacco giant's publicity campaign that played down the dangers of smoking." Robert Peck "told the justices that an Oregon jury that assessed punitive damages in the lung cancer death of Jesse Williams rightly considered how other smokers across the state were affected by Philip Morris' campaign." The Oregon Supreme Court "upheld the verdict, saying the huge punitive damages award was permissible because of Philip Morris' 'extraordinarily reprehensible' conduct." Philip Morris, "which makes Marlboros, contends the punitive damages were unconstitutionally excessive because they were so disproportionate to the actual damages and because jurors considered the company's impact on smokers not part of the case." The dispute "gives the justices a chance to clarify guidelines for awarding punitive damages."

The Washington Post (11/1, A9, Lane, 748K) also says the case "could illuminate the Roberts court's approach to tort reform." In recent years, the court "has helped the business community on the punitive-damages issue, ruling that excessive awards violate companies' constitutional rights. But yesterday's case may be especially significant because the firm seeking help is tobacco company Philip Morris, and it has been found liable not for bilking a consumer out of money, but for actually killing him." A ruling in Philip Morris's favor "would suggest that the court is so concerned about high punitive damages that it would protect even an unpopular corporate defendant. For their part, consumer and anti-smoking groups hope that the court will rule against Philip Morris -- and show that punitive-damage limits do not apply to especially reprehensible conduct." The Post ads, "By the end of oral arguments yesterday, however, it seemed that the court was reluctant to rule broadly in either direction. Instead, several members of the court, including some who had supported its recent limits on punitive damages, suggested that the best way to handle the case would be to send it back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification of technical state law issues."

The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A13, 2.03M) reports, "In the past decade, business has won two major rulings that rolled back blockbuster punitive damage awards, money intended to punish a defendant for its behavior and deter repetition. In each case, the court ruled the awards violated the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause."

The New York Times (11/1, Greenhouse, 1.21M) reports "there was general agreement during the argument, including by Mrs. Williams's lawyer…that awarding damages on the basis of injury to nonplaintiffs was impermissible under the Supreme Court's recent precedents." But "there was no agreement on whether that actually happened." Peck "argued that the Oregon courts had simply permitted the jury to consider harm to others, not to impose 'global punishment' but as part of its assessment of the 'reprehensibility' of the cigarette company's behavior, a factor that the Supreme Court's precedents permit juries in punitive damages cases to consider."

The Legal Times (11/1, Mauro) reports, "The Supreme Court's long-awaited oral argument in the 'Big Tobacco' punitive damages case appeared to fizzle on Tuesday, with several justices hinting that they'd like to kick the case back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification." The Times continues, "Instead of delving deeply into the contentious debate over the constitutionality of high punitive damages in the context of tobacco litigation, the justices seemed troubled over more technical matters during hourlong arguments in Philip Morris USA v. Williams. … But there were some signs that if the high court decides to keep the case and rule on it, the justices might be willing to uphold the large verdict in the Philip Morris case, in spite of Court precedents that point toward limiting punitive damages." The Times adds, "In the State Farm v. Campbell decision in 2003, the high court suggested that a 9-to-1 ratio between punitive and compensatory damages was the outer limit of acceptability under the Constitution, though it said some cases could warrant higher punitive damages. … But at oral argument Tuesday, there was scant mention of ratios and a greater climate of deference toward state courts and how they handle punitive damages without federal strictures. The result could be the Court tolerating a 'tobacco exception' to State Farm that would allow higher damages because of evidence of decades of industry fraud and deception over the dangers of smoking. … But much of the argument Tuesday was taken up with the smaller-gauge issue of jury instructions that were not allowed in the 1999 trial at issue in the case. Portland, Ore., jurors awarded Mayola Williams $821,485 in compensatory and $79.5 million in punitive damages levied against Philip Morris -- a 97-to-1 ratio between punitives and compensatories. Her husband, Jesse, died in 1997 after four decades of smoking Marlboros."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M) editorializes, "The outcome of this case could have ramifications far beyond tobacco. Whether a jury, in a case involving a single plaintiff, can impose extra damages on a defendant for harming other people who haven't brought suit is an issue that arises in product-liability cases of all kinds -- from autos to drugs. And the Justices yesterday seemed to agree that these pseudo-class actions might present problems of due process." The Journal adds, "When a plaintiffs lawyer is permitted to argue that damages directed at Merck or Toyota should reflect that their products harmed not only his lone client but (allegedly) everyone in the state, it raises the possibility of duplicative punishment. Even if a defendant prevails, what stops the next plaintiffs lawyer from making the same argument on behalf of another (and another and another) lone client? … This may be an even deeper due process violation than outrageous punitive damages because it goes directly to the powers of the jury, and the standards by which it imposes punishment. Some guiding restraint from the Supreme Court on the matter would be helpful."

The Washington Post (11/1, 748K) writes in an editorial, "Cancer rates in this country continue to decline, in large part because of measures such as smoking bans and cigarette taxes. If tobacco companies wanted to live up to their televised pronouncements, they would not hijack the initiative process in Arizona and Ohio, nor would they pour millions into defeating new tobacco taxes."

Also this morning, Robin S. Conrad, senior vice president of the National Chamber Litigation Center of the US Chamber of Commerce, writes in USA Today (11/1, 2.27M), "In Philip Morris v. Williams, in which the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday heard oral arguments, Oregon's Supreme Court upheld a $79.5 million punitive damages award that is nearly 100 times the amount of the plaintiff's compensatory damages. In its amicus brief, the National Chamber Litigation Center argued that the state supreme court ignored the Supreme Court's guidance in 2003's State Farm v. Campbell, recommending a single-digit ratio for most punitive damages awards. … Some argue that the judicial branch is not the proper place for punitive damages reform, but rather that irrational punitive damages awards are solely a problem for state legislatures and even Congress. We disagree. The Constitution prohibits the deprivation of property without 'due process of law,' and the essence of 'law' is rational and predictable standards. Courts thus have a fundamental obligation to ensure that the trial procedures employed in determining punitive damages include reasonable standards for measuring them."

DC Circuit Blocks "Light" Cigarettes Ruling.

The AP (11/1, Apuzzo) reports, "A federal appeals court blocked a landmark judgment against the tobacco industry Tuesday, clearing the way for the companies to continue selling 'light' and 'low tar' cigarettes until their appeals can be reviewed." The AP continues, "The decision by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit also allows the companies to continue for now the advertising campaigns that a federal judge in August ruled were misleading. … Without comment, the appeals court granted the tobacco companies' request to put Judge Gladys Kessler's order on hold. The companies have argued that her far-reaching ruling could cost them millions of dollars and lead to a loss of customers." The AP adds, "In mid-August, Kessler ruled that the companies had violated racketeering laws and conspired for decades to mislead the public about the health hazards of smoking. … The judge ordered the companies to publish in newspapers and on their Web sites 'corrective statements' on the adverse health effects and addictiveness of smoking and nicotine. … She also ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as 'low tar,' 'light,' 'ultra light' or 'mild,' since such cigarettes have been found to be no safer than others because of how people smoke them."

Bloomberg (11/1, McQuillen) reports, "Praising the appellate court's ruling, Altria's associate general counsel William Ohlemeyer said Kessler's decision 'is contrary to the law and facts presented during trial.' … Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller declined to comment."

Former McAfee Treasurer To Settle Civil Fraud Charges For $758,000. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C6, 2.03M) reports former McAfee Treasurer Eric Borrmann yesterday "agreed to pay $758,000 and accept a five-year ban on serving as an officer of a public company to settle civil charges that he aided the computer-security company's multimillion-dollar fraud from mid-1999 until he left the company in July 2000, the Securities and Exchange Commission said." He "was accused of assisting McAfee's executives and senior managers in preparing and distributing false and misleading information about the company's financial results."

Canadian Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison For Defrauding Merrill-Lynch. Bloomberg (11/1, Schneider) reports, "Michael Ritter, a Canadian who admitted helping ex-Merrill Lynch & Co. trader Daniel Gordon hide $43 million stolen from the securities firm, was sentenced to 10 years in prison." Ritter "was also ordered to forfeit $471,000." Bloomberg notes, "Ritter was indicted by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles for his role in aiding Larry Toshio Osaki in a Ponzi scheme in which early investors received returns above market rates from money deposited by later investors. … In exchange for his guilty plea…Ritter won't be extradited to the U.S. … Osaki was the ringleader, and Ritter deserved a lesser sentence, Thom Mrozek, spokesman at the U.S. Attorney's office in Los Angeles said in a telephone interview. 'It was a fair resolution to this matter,' Mrozek said."

California Man Sentenced To Four Years In Prison For Investment Scam. The San Francisco Chronicle (10/31, B3, Hoge, 405K) reported, "A Walnut Creek man has been sentenced to four years in federal prison for swindling investors out of $1.5 million by falsely claiming that Bill Gates and other magnates were buying shares in his company, prosecutors said Monday." Lal Bhatia "was convicted in February of 27 charges of mail fraud and money laundering. … Prosecutors said Lal Bhatia had shown forged documents to investors to support his claim that a Swiss banking entity, which didn't exist, was backing him." The Chronicle noted that US District Judge Claudia Wilken "also imposed a $100,000 fine and ordered him to pay $894,531 in restitution to his victims."

The Contra Costa Times (10/31, Avalos, 180K) reported, "The FBI and the IRS teamed up to track Bhatia's complex schemes, said Joseph Schadler, a spokesman for the FBI's Bay Area operations. 'The money trail is so convoluted that it really behooves us to have the financial expertise of the IRS on board,' Schadler said. In a separate case, Bhatia awaits trial over accusations that he and other suspects posed as wealthy financiers and a British noble as part of an alleged scam in which victims lost $1.9 million. The suspects convinced developers in Florida and Texas that they could arrange large loans for their projects in return for up-front fees to process the bogus loans, FBI investigators said." The AP (10/31) also reported on Bhatia's sentencing.

Texas Woman Sentenced To Probation For Katrina Relief Fraud. The AP (11/1) reports, "A 29-year-old woman who posed as a Hurricane Katrina evacuee to collect $2,000 in federal aid received three years probation Tuesday." Tomisha Embry of Longview, Texas, "must also pay back the money as restitution after being sentenced by U.S. District Judge Leonard Davis." The AP notes, "Last month, Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez said the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force has produced charges against more than 400 people in more than 30 federal judicial districts around the nation."

Kansas Women Plead Guilty To Health Care Fraud. The Kansas City Star (10/31, 278K) reported, "Two women pleaded guilty in federal court Monday for their roles in a scheme to defraud an employee health-care plan." Sandra Rivers of Kansas City and Delorise Jean Killiebrew of Independence "had been indicted in July with 11 others. Killiebrew acknowledged that Cheri Smith, an employee of Health Midwest Comprehensive Care's claim department, persuaded her to cash nine checks totaling more than $33,000." The Star noted, "A total of $121,284 was fraudulently paid out between January and August 2002, according to the charges." The Kansas City Business Journal (10/31) added, "Rivers admitted that she had learned about the health care fraud conspiracy from Killiebrew, a co-worker, and had agreed to accept checks in the summer of 2002. Rivers received two checks for a total of $5,516. After cashing each of the checks, Rivers kept $300 and gave the rest of the money to Killiebrew." The Journal noted, "Executive Assistant U.S. Attorney Roseann Ketchmark is prosecuting the case, which the FBI investigated."

3rd Circuit Revives Suit Against Asbestos Class Action Attorneys. The Legal Intelligencer (11/1, Duffy) reports, "The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has revived a proposed class action suit against a group of lawyers from southern states brought by more than 2,600 former clients from northern states who say they were cheated out of their fair share of $400 million in asbestos personal injury settlements in the Mississippi state courts when the lawyers gave larger payouts to southern plaintiffs." The LI continues, "Reversing a lower court's decision that dismissed the suit, Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Jane R. Roth issued a stern lecture to lawyers about the duty of loyalty. … 'We are embarrassed to have to explain a matter so elementary to the legal profession that it speaks for itself: All attorneys in a co-counsel relationship individually owe each and every client the duty of loyalty. For it to be otherwise is inconceivable,' Roth wrote in Huber v. Taylor." The LI adds, "The case provides a rare glimpse into the high-stakes world of asbestos litigation in which plaintiffs are termed "inventory" and settlements often involve hundreds or even thousands of cases. … The plaintiffs in Huber v. Taylor are steelworkers from Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana who joined a massive Mississippi asbestos suit. The defendants are lawyers from Mississippi, North Carolina and Texas. .. The suit, filed by attorneys Esther S. Trakinski and Irving Cohen of Cohen Pope in New York, alleges that the northern plaintiffs were never made aware of a complex series of agreements between and among the lawyers that, they say, ultimately led to their receiving smaller payouts than southern plaintiffs. … The northern plaintiffs had all retained lawyers in their home states -- referred to in the case as 'local counsel' -- who had in turn struck deals with a Texas lawyer who served as co-counsel. … But when the lawyers struck a series of settlements worth more than $400 million, the northern plaintiffs claim that their share was reduced because the southern lawyers wanted to allocate a greater percentage of aggregate settlements to southerners in order to minimize the percentages paid to the northern plaintiffs' local counsel."

Center For Digital Democracy Asks FTC To Investigate Online Advertisers. USA Today (11/1, Hopkins) reports that the Center for Digital Democracy "is expected to file a Federal Trade Commission complaint asking the agency to investigate online advertisers. It also wants the FTC to force companies to halt what it calls deceptive practices and encourage Congress to pass legislation bolstering consumer privacy protection." Jeff Chester, the center's executive director, "says hundreds of companies now track consumers online, gathering detailed dossiers about reading, spending and other habits that endanger personal privacy. Privacy policies published on websites don't adequately warn consumers, he says."

DOJ To Send Election Monitors To At Least 20 States. USA Today (11/1, Wolf, Johnson) reports, "Thousands of lawyers, election monitors and volunteers with video cameras will be mobilized on Election Day in an effort to guard against problems at the polls." USA continues, "The Justice Department will dispatch more than 800 observers, a record for a non-presidential election year, to look for evidence of discrimination, intimidation and other obstacles to voter accessibility in at least 20 states." USA adds, "The Democratic Party has a 50-state voter-protection effort and an estimated 7,000 lawyers at the ready. Liberal groups have set up hotlines for voters to call if they are denied the right to vote. And hundreds of people plan to film interviews at polling places where voters are being challenged that day. … Fueling the activity this year: dozens of close elections that could decide control of Congress and the potential for problems caused by electronic voting machines, statewide databases and identification requirements. … Republican and conservative interest groups are keeping a lower profile. The Republican National Committee is relying on its state parties for poll monitors and lawyers. Groups such as the Republican National Lawyers Association lack the manpower to match the NAACP, Common Cause and People for the American Way." USA notes, "Justice Department monitors will be deployed next week, partly based on close races for Congress and where questions have been raised about the integrity of the election process. That could include Baltimore, Chicago, Cleveland and other places that encountered problems during primaries this year. … Prosecutors will be on standby in each federal district across the country to pursue possible fraud cases or other election-related criminal activity. 'Everyone agrees that we want to make voting easier and fraud harder,' says Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim."

CNN.com (11/1, Frieden) reports, "The Justice Department plans to dispatch more than 800 federal observers and monitors to 20 states to protect voting rights in potentially troubled polling locations, officials announced Tuesday. … That is a record number of federal officials watching polling stations in an off-year election. … 'Yes, the anticipated closeness of races is one factor in our decisions about where we'll be sending people,' said Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Wan Kim." CNN continues, "Kim said he would not identify until Monday the more than 65 cities and counties to which the observers will be sent. … The locations where federal observers will be stationed are selected because of past polling problems, an uneasy history among ethnically or racially diverse groups, or where fears and allegations of potential violations are asserted. … The Justice Department is reluctant to make public plans for elections observers. One official said that is because observers are viewed, in part, as frontline collectors of data that could be used to construct cases against local jurisdictions."

NAACP To Monitor Election In St Landry Parish, LA. The Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (11/1, Burgess) reports, "The NAACP plans to organize poll watchers in St. Landry Parish to monitor what's expected to be a tight race between a black woman interim sheriff and her white male challenger." The Advocate continues, "Concerns of possible racial intimidation in the sheriff's election have also attracted the attention of the U.S. Justice Department, which monitored the parish's primary election on Sept. 30 and is expected to return next week. .. .The NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, working with local civil rights groups, hopes to assemble a team of 24 poll watchers to oversee the elections, said Kristen Clarke-Avery, assistant counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund." The Advocate adds, "Clarke-Avery said the group had 12 monitors for last month's elections. … 'All of us are out there to see to it that everybody can exercise their constitutional right to vote,' said Clifton Lemelle Sr., a retired educator from Eunice who is helping organize the poll watchers. … Lemelle said there were no confirmed reports of racial intimidation from the Sept. 30 election. … Federal monitors also reported no apparent violations."

DOJ Says States Will Not Be Penalized For Voting Systems Lapses. The AP (11/1, Jordan) reports, "The Justice Department isn't penalizing states that fail to upgrade voting systems by next week's elections, a requirement passed by Congress in 2002." The AP continues, "Federal efforts to combat election fraud and prevent voter intimidation on Nov. 7 are among the most rigorous ever, Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said Tuesday. He estimated 800 federal observers and monitors are headed next week to oversee elections in 20 states - selected in part because of close races there. … But prosecutors have not penalized states, or tried to hold them in contempt, if they failed to comply with the 2002 Help America Vote Act, Kim said. The law required states to plan for switching to electronic ballot machines and have a voter registration database up and working in time for the 2006 elections." The AP adds, "If states 'miss a deadline, or if they don't do something by a certain time, then obviously we would first go back to the table and try to figure out why, and how we can fix the problem,' Kim told reporters. … If a state still falls short, the Justice Department could go to court and seek a contempt order, which could carry penalties, Kim said. 'But that's something we don't like to do. It means a problem's broken and we can't fix it easily.' … Justice Department officials said it is unclear how many states have not fully updated their voting systems. The department has filed lawsuits against four states - Alabama, Maine, New Jersey and New York - and they have until sometime in 2007 to comply. … Other states are in varying degrees of compliance. They have escaped legal action because they have made good-faith efforts to meet the new standards. … But critics say the absence of electronic voting machines and outdated registration rolls can lead to major problems at the polls - and potentially skew election results."

GOP Challenges Westchester, NY, Voter Rolls. The New York Times (11/1, Santos) reports, "Republicans are challenging the right of thousands of registered voters in the local State Senate district to cast ballots on Nov. 7, charging that these voters do not live at the addresses listed with the Westchester County Board of Elections." The Times continues, "The dispute set off a war of words between the district's longtime incumbent, State Senator Nicholas A. Spano, and his Democratic rival, Andrea Stewart-Cousins, whom Mr. Spano beat by just 18 votes in 2004, after a contentious recount that lasted three months. … John Ciampoli, a Republican lawyer who handled the recount for Mr. Spano two years ago, said he found the discrepancies after checking postal change-of-address cards against district's voting rolls. On Friday, Mr. Ciampoli submitted the challenges to the Board of Elections, questioning the validity of 5,929 voter registrations and asking the board to send police officers to voters' homes to find out if any of them had moved." The Times adds, "Ms. Stewart-Cousins, a six-term county legislator, held a flurry of news conferences criticizing the challenges. In an interview, she called the idea of using officers to verify addresses as 'an attempt to intimidate voters before the voting even begins.' … Mr. Ciampoli, who lives on the outskirts of Albany, said he filed the challenges on behalf of the state's Republican Party and the Westchester Republican Committee. In 2004, he successfully challenged hundreds of paper ballots most likely cast for Ms. Stewart-Cousins in the 35th State Senate district race."

12 Charged In California Voter Fraud Case. The AP (11/1, Flaccus) reports, "Twelve people have been charged with tricking voters in Orange County (CA) into registering as Republicans, prosecutors said Monday." The AP continues, "The defendants, ranging in age from 19 to 52, were accused of fraudulently registering 37 voters as Republicans between August 2005 and February 2006. Democrats, Green Party members and a noncitizen were registered as Republicans, prosecutors said." The AP adds, "The suspects were hired to register new Republicans by private firms paid by the Orange County Republican Party, prosecutors said. The recruiters worked for the firm Bader & Associates, as well as a subcontractor, John Burkett. Both have said they no longer work on voter registration drives. … No charges were filed against the companies or the Republican Party." The AP notes, "The recruiters visited shopping centers and college campuses and were paid $10 a head for newly registered Republicans in a district represented by U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat, prosecutors said. … Voters were asked to sign petitions for lower taxes or stricter sex offender laws, then tricked into signing voter registration cards, Orange County prosecutor Anthony Rackauckas said. Other information was filled in using voters' driver's licenses, he said."

US Settles Racial Bias Complaint Against Milwaukee Nightclub. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (11/1, Barton) reports, "The federal government and the owner of a downtown Milwaukee nightclub have agreed to settle a civil rights suit in which the government accused the business of discriminating against African-Americans." The Sentinel continues, "The suit, filed by U.S. Attorney Steven M. Biskupic in late 2005, said that Eve, a club at 718 N. Milwaukee St., has discriminated against African-Americans since at least 2002, according to court records. The suit accused the owner of the club, Tom Wackman, of refusing entry to black patrons on the basis of race. Wackman contended that he runs an exclusive club that turns prospective patrons away for a number of reasons, but not race." The Sentinel adds, "The government contended that Eve gave 'false or pretextual reasons' for denying black people entry, 'such as inappropriate attire, exclusion due to a private party, or that Eve was already full, while similarly-situated white persons were admitted to Eve,' according to a Department of Justice news release." The Sentinel notes, "Eve did not admit wrongdoing and will not be sanctioned, according to Timothy Baldwin, attorney for Wackman. … 'We'll continue to do business as in the past, and the government will watch and make sure we're doing exactly what we said, which is maintaining a high-end, limited-access nightclub,' Baldwin said. … Wackman has contended that his goal was to run an exclusive club like those in Chicago and Los Angeles that grant or deny entry based on things such as clothing, attitude and fame."

DOJ Will Not Probe Death Of Virginia Man In Police Custody. The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance (11/1, Brown, Busse) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department says it lacks sufficient information to justify a civil rights investigation into the death of Clarence Lightfoot Beard Jr., who died Sept. 24 while in custody of Lynchburg police." The N&A continues, "The department's decision was outlined in an Oct. 25 letter to L. Garnell Stamps, a local civil rights activist who requested the investigation. … Stamps wrote an Oct. 6 letter to the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division expressing his concerns about the circumstances surrounding Beard's death." The N&A adds, "The matter is the focus of an ongoing investigation by the Virginia State Police and two separate investigations by the Lynchburg Police Department. … Meanwhile, city officials have refused to release public records about the incident, saying they are confidential because they deal with 'personnel matters' or an 'ongoing investigation.' … The lack of a public record weighed heavily on the justice department's decision not to proceed with a civil rights investigation. … 'The information which you furnished is insufficient to permit us to determine the existence of a possible violation of federal criminal civil rights statutes,' wrote Daniel Rosenholtz, a paralegal specialist for the Civil Rights Division's Criminal Section, to Stamps. 'Therefore, we are unable to authorize investigation of your complaint at this time.'"

Legal Challenge To Mississippi Judicial Election Withdrawn. The AP (11/1) reports from Jackson, MS, "The attorney for a group of black plaintiffs has withdrawn a federal complaint challenging how Mississippi will elect state circuit and chancery judges." The AP continues, "Attorney Carroll Rhodes of Hazlehurst, who filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in October, told Judge Henry T. Wingate that he was withdrawing the request after the Justice Department officially pre-cleared the election change Monday in a letter. .. 'Our complaint was that it should be submitted for pre-clearance,' Rhodes said. 'On Oct. 10, the state submitted it for pre-clearance and on Oct. 30, 2006, the attorney general tentatively gave pre-clearance.' … Rhodes told Wingate the request shouldn't go forward." The AP adds, "In the pre-clearance letter, the Justice Department said that for the remainder of the 60-day period the office has to review the matter under the Voting Rights Act, information can be submitted that could result in changes to the pre-clearance. .. .Rhodes said plaintiffs were never seeking to stop or postpone the election. Rhodes said he wanted the judiciary races under the election law before it was rewritten by the Legislature in 2005. … He said the new law was to take effect Jan. 1, 2007, not for the Nov. 7 general election."

Illinois Teen Shot By Police Stun Gun Dies. The AP (11/1) reports from Jerseyville, IL, "A teenager carrying a Bible and shouting 'I want Jesus' was shot twice with a police stun gun and later died at a St. Louis hospital, authorities said." The AP continues, "In a statement obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press, police in Jerseyville, about 40 miles north of St. Louis, said 17-year-old Roger Holyfield would not acknowledge officers who approached him and he continued yelling, 'I want Jesus.' … Police tried to calm the teen, but Holyfield became combative, according to the statement. Officers fired the stun gun at him after he ignored their warnings, then fired again when he continued struggling, police said." The AP adds, "Holyfield was flown to St. Louis' Cardinal Glennon Hospital after the confrontation Saturday; he died there Sunday, police said. … An autopsy was planned for Tuesday." The AP notes, "In a report released in March, international human rights group Amnesty International said it had logged at least 156 deaths across the country in the previous five years related to police stun guns. … The rise in deaths accompanies a marked increase in the number of U.S. law enforcement agencies employing devices made by Taser International Inc. of Scottsdale, Ariz. About 1,000 of the nation's 18,000 police agencies used Tasers in 2001; more than 7,000 departments had them last year, according to a government study. .. Police had used Tasers more than 70,000 times as of last year, Congress' Government Accountability Office said."

DOJ May Reopen Probe Of California Redistricting Plan. The Inland Valley (CA) Daily Bulletin (11/1, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department might reopen an inquiry into a claim that the 2001 redistricting plan for the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors discriminates against Latinos, officials said Tuesday." The Bulletin continues, "Latinos comprise 47 percent of the county's population but are represented by only one of the five supervisors. … Joaquin G. Avila, special counsel to the 1,070-member Los Angeles County Chicano Employees Association, recently provided the Justice Department with what he says is new evidence that indicates supervisors packed Latino voters into a single district when two districts could have been drawn." The Bulletin adds, "First District Supervisor Gloria Molina, whose district includes Pomona, represents most of the county's Latino residents. .. .Avila's filing seeks the creation of two supervisorial districts with Latino majorities that would give the Latino community an opportunity to elect a second candidate to the Board of Supervisors, said Alan Clayton, director of equal employment opportunity at the LACCEA."

Officials Investigate Man's Death After Scuffle With Deputies. The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Wride) reports, "Authorities today are investigating the death of a Long Beach man after a confrontation with Los Angeles County sheriff's deputies Sunday night. The 39-year-old man scuffled on a Lakewood corner with deputies who thought he had a handgun, according to the Sheriff's Department. What was thought to be a weapon turned out to be a cell phone, officials said." The man's name was not released.

South Dakota Abortion Vote Likely To Influence National Debate. The New York Times (11/1, Davey, 1.21M) reports the battle in South Dakota "over a statewide ballot measure to install one of the country's strictest anti-abortion laws is playing out in television commercials, yard signs and Sunday sermons. It is also drawing the attention of national advocates on both sides of the abortion debate, who are watching the campaign with deep intensity and even fear." Both sides "predict that the outcome of the vote in South Dakota could send the country's broader debate over abortion rights swerving in new directions, and will set the tone for the fate of similarly strict laws being considered in nearly a dozen other states." Nancy Keenan, the president of Naral Pro-Choice America, which opposes the South Dakota ban, said, "I think there's some sense out there that — 'By golly, if they can do it there, we're going to do it here.'" The Times adds Daniel McConchie, "the vice president of Americans United for Life, which favors passage of the measure, said a defeat at the polls on Nov. 7 could take the steam out of efforts to impose even less restrictive measures, like parental notification rules or waiting periods, that have been the focus of the anti-abortion movement in recent years."

NYTimes Accuses New York GOP Of Attempting To Suppress Minority Vote. The New York Times (11/1, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes, "One of the most deplorable political tactics — trying to suppress the votes of poor or minority citizens by raising the specter of voter fraud — is playing out this week in the city of Yonkers. Republican Party lawyers are calling for an 11th-hour purge of voter rolls in a clear effort to help their endangered state senator, Nicholas Spano. … If the Republicans were sincere about tidying the voter rolls, they could have raised the alarm long ago. Instead they dropped a bomb at the last minute — a conjectural list of possibly problematic names that the Board of Elections has no hope of clearing up before Nov. 7."
